

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

CLARA SCHUMANN.

BY FRANZ LISZT.

[Probably no other woman ever reached so high a place as an artist, in the sphere of pure, or instrumental music, (if we except, perhaps, the sister of MENDELSSOHN, whose death was the precursor of his own, and whose art was only exercised in private,) as the wife of the composer, ROBERT SCHUMANN, formerly celebrated as a pianist by her maiden name of CLARA WIECK. Since the melancholy illness of her husband (from which recent accounts encourage us to hope that he has recovered) she has again been making a concert tour through Germany. Our "Diary" has already reported of her in Berlin, in company with JOACHIM. She also played a few months since in Weimar, where LISZT was inspired to write about her a very long and glowing article in the Leipzig Neue Zeitschrift für Musik, for Dec. 1, 1854. We propose in two instalments to translate the latter half of it, the first half being altogether general and speculative.—ED.]

I.

There can be no more happy, more harmonious union in the world of Art conceivable, than that of the inventing husband with the executing wife; of the composer, representing the idea, with the fair virtuoso, realizing it; both standing on the highest steps of the Art, altar in regions to which the mists of commonness can never rise. Poets, both, by feeling; zealous cherishers of their faith, severe guardians of its purity, subtle expounders of its mystic rites; with loftily aspiring hearts; their souls glowing with the divine afflatus; with spotless nobility and a pride proper to their rank, and armed with personal character corresponding to this nobility and pride, they both, in the most shining moment of their youthful development, in the first bloom of endeavor, full of ecstatic ardor and enthusiastic dreams, felt themselves drawn to one another, and each saw in the other the most sympathetic, most beloved, most exalted image of the god of Art, before whom both bowed down in the same fervent adoration. In the traditions of Art ROBERT and CLARA SCHUMANN will remain a shining example of one of the finest bounties of nature, that did not separate by time and space these two artists and lovers, who only in and through each other could be happy upon earth, but gave them their being at a favorable moment in a common country, so that they might meet, unite their destinies in one stream, and merge their hearts in one sea of deep intuitions. In no relation will the annals of Art separate the memory of both, posterity cannot name them singly, the future will surround both heads with one golden halo, and over both brows cause one star to shine, as already in our day the profiles of the immortal pair have been united in one medallion by a celebrated sculptor, (RIETSCHEL.) But alas! only the excellencies of the one will after-times enjoy; those of the other they will only be able to estimate from the testimony of contemporaries. The works of Robert will remain, while Clara Schumann's talent only blooms for us! Have we not then all the more urgent occasion to pay the tribute of our homage, our admiration and our sympathy to the great artist, to the noble lady, who is consecrated by the fire-baptism of the holiest glow? the glow of Art and Poesy, whose flames played around her from her early youth, of love, whose noblest feelings lived in her, of quickening, efficacious virtue, and lastly of misfortune, sorrow? To characterize this singularly high individuality, it would be hard to find better words, than those with which her future husband, as editor of this very paper, noticed her first appearance in Leipzig: "Others make poetry—she is a poem." If one were to undertake to add anything to these words now, he might say: "If many make more noise, few give so much music."

We see too often in our day, unfortunately, parents, who, relying upon certain brilliant examples, and actuated by motives, which have actually nothing in common with the love of the Beautiful, wear out and exhaust their children, when they show a spark of talent, by merely mechanical studies, if the slightest prospect of their acquiring some facility affords them the least hope of gain. They waste all upon the attainment of a fruitless virtuosity, a for the most part soul-less, often senseless delivery of masterworks, which for sheer thumping and thrashing cannot be comprehended, or else of mediocre productions, which do not gain value by a momentary success. The fledglings remain strangers to all other intellectual development, and are in danger, if they be not prominently gifted, of running wild into a purely material sleight of hand. Clara Wieck is one of those who have come out unscathed from a training almost wholly absorbed in the practical learning of an instrument. She practised from her earliest childhood as long and often longer than her physical strength held out; but since she was one chosen among the many called, her sensibility did not become blunted in dry toiling after the necessary manual dexterity, or extinguished by too long dwelling in the rare atmosphere of Art, as flowers wilt in the beams of a too Southern sun before their opening; in spite of all this danger it acquired an early strength, and unfolded harmoniously, which in a feminine organization is to be deemed doubly fortunate. In the beginning it cost her painful efforts to compel herself to a persistent toil, repugnant to her as to all artist natures, which are afflicted with a roving imagination, an indolent and dreamy spirit, slow to digest its lessons. For a long time she had to battle courageously to avoid harsh reproaches, to which such tender, excitable, proud and introverted natures, which bear within them the mysterious birth-throes of a fair future, are doubly sensitive. We have been told that the young artist, to whom they left so little leisure in those years for the pleasant round of games and sports, which are the foremost charm of childhood's life, felt a partiality for kittens, and knew no greater joy than to possess several of these at a time, and devote every free moment to them; in short, so infatuated was she with these pets, that obliging friends frequently found themselves moved to help her to elude the watchfulness of the school tyrant, so that she gained a few free moments, when his back was turned, to take the little purring favorites into her lap and stroke them. When she came back, she would resume her scales with fresh indifference, without wasting a complaint over her fingers often bleeding from the caresses of her little play-fellows.

Through much playing, or rather in spite of much playing, there grew in her at last, instead of ennui and satiety, as one might well believe, an inward understanding of what she played. Without doubt she understood music very differently from the way in which they sought to teach it to her, and that saved her! Thenceforth her spirit strove to mount up ever higher into the mystic realm of poesy. Soon it required no more the presence of a master to keep her to her study; she had found the golden gate of everlasting dreams and plunged with ever growing rapture into the element, whose high attraction she had felt and known. She pressed more and more toward the equator, to breathe amid the flames of Art, at an age, which otherwise is little fitted to approach these flames without danger of being consumed by them. The singular energy of her constitution, which has held out since, in spite of such manifold trials, exertions and sacrifices, in spite of uninterrupted cares, allowed her even then, without injury to her health, to live continually and ever longer in the glowing tropics of the soul. Thus she grew up in the land of the Ideal, to which youthful spirits undertake dreamy excursions, unsuspected by the world around her, which is unacquainted with those spheres and does not know the imperceptible but sure signs, with which the travellers in that wonder-land are quite familiar. There in the silence of her earnest meditation was that highest wisdom hers, which suddenly discloses to the artist, what it is sought in vain to teach him after the prescriptions of the schools.

When we heard Clara Wieck in Vienna fifteen years ago, she drew her hearers after her into her poetic world, to which she floated upward in a magical car drawn by electric sparks and lifted by delicately prismatic but nervously throbbing winglets. The poets in this graceful apparition recognized a daughter of their Fatherland, educated on the same shores, and nourished on the same flower pollen; they strewed pearls and songs before her and fêted this Benjamin of their tribe, who gazing round with wandering and inspired look, strangely smiling, seemed like a silent Naiad, ill at home here in the land of prose. At her performance of the F minor Sonata of BEETHOVEN all the listeners believed what Grillparzer related:

A weird magician, weary of the world,
In sullen humor locked his charms all up
Within a diamond casket, firmly clasped,
And threw the key into the sea, and died.
The maunkins here tried with all their might;
In vain! no tool can pick the flinty lock,
His magic arts still slumber, like their master.
A shepherd's child, along the sea-shore playing,
Watches the waves, in hurrying, idle chase.
Dreaming and thoughtless, as young maidens are,
She dippeth her white fingers in the flood,
And grasps and lifts and holds it! 'Tis the key.
Up springs she, up, her heart still beating higher,
The casket glances as with eyes before her.
The key fits well, up flies the lid. The spirits
All mount aloft, then bow themselves submissive
To this their gracious, innocent sweet mistress,
Who with white fingers guides them in her play.

What other passion besides love could bring back to this earth a genius so naturalized and made at home upon the heights of musical thought and feeling? And for whom could she feel a love worthy of herself, her dreams and longings, except for an artist like herself, who silent, introverted, musing as she mused, was wont to wander through the balsam groves of the Ideal, to relate in the language of tones the wonders there revealed? Two souls in their essence so entirely kindred must have kneeled before each other on first meeting, as the chronicle relates of the first interview of Maria of Burgundy with Maximilian of Austria, which adds: tant émerveillés furent ils de leur moult grande beauté et gentillesse mutuelle. Did not our artists also, like that royal pair of lovers, inwardly exclaim after the first shock of wonder and amazement: "Oh, how beautiful!" And must they not, merging themselves in the concord of their two natures, have mutually dedicated and yielded themselves up to one another? Their destinies were fulfilled in this mutual love blossoming under the benign beams of Art, and thenceforth "his life was all for poetry, her poetry was in her life."

Madame Sontag.

It is now nearly five months since I left her tomb, and I am still as broken-hearted and miserable as on the day of her death. The generous but useless endeavors of my relations to alleviate my loss, and even the presence of my beloved children, sadden rather than console me, particularly when I think of the happiness their dear mother would have felt in witnessing the great success of her favorite daughter, whom all find so charming in those qualities of education, heart, and musical feeling, which my lamented Henriette made such efforts to develop under her own direction. All now is lost forever, to me, to my children, and to the world, which she knew how to charm as much as she did her own domestic circle, by a talent which was never more perfect than when the decree of Providence arrested it in its career. It is impossible for me to tell you what myself and my poor children suffer from a wound that time will scarcely heal; more especially my little Marie, who is only beginning to recover somewhat from the terrible blow given to her dearest and best affections. Pious as she is, (and permit me to add as I am myself,) we have appreciated in the highest degree the proof of affection shown by Mlle. Alphonsine Lemit (in the services at La Madeleine) in favor of one who had vowed to bestow upon her a mother's interest, and would have kept the vow if the Almighty had permitted her to realize the project of fixing her residence in Paris, as we had decided. Alas! it only remains for us now to honor her memory in our prayers, and to endeavor to stifle the bitter feelings which all of us experience in thinking of the fate of that unhappy mother who, as the price of her noble and indefatigable devotion, died, and died even at the moment when she was counting the days and the hours that would bring her back to her beloved children, and recompense her for all her troubles and anxieties. Let us hope, my dear and good friend, that Heaven, in its just mercy, has reserved for her the reward of her good works, in the enjoyment of a happiness of which we cannot measure the extent; and in truth it is not she, but ourselves, who are the most to be pitied.

I am waiting for the arrival at Hamburg of her dear mortal remains, in order to go there and meet them; I shall then accompany them to their last resting place, in the Convent of Maria Jhal, near Dresden, where her sister is a nun, and where, in consequence, the holy prayers of those who loved her most will not be wanting. I am having a small chapel built there, with two tombs, and, after satisfying this wish of my heart, I return to my family.

I shall meet you, no doubt, in the spring, but will not promise you that the pleasure of seeing you will be exempt from all sadness. It will be impossible for me to separate your presence from the remembrance of my dear Henriette; the idea of being able to talk of the angel whom I have lost with those who feel as you do, has, however, its consolation. Besides, it will be delightful to renew the friendship of Mlle. Alphonsine and my dear Marie, by bringing them together again for a short time.

Diary Abroad.—No. 14.

BERLIN, Feb. 9.—RUBINSTEIN again! Last evening in the concert hall of the theatre he gave his second concert with the following programme:

- PART I.
1. Third Concerto for piano-forte with Orchestra, by RUBINSTEIN.
2. Aria from Euryanthe, by Fraulein Valerius.
3. First and Second Preludes, by RUBINSTEIN.
4. Songs sung by Fraulein Valerius.
5. Nocturne and Caprice, both by RUBINSTEIN.
PART II.
6. Second Symphony in B flat, by RUBINSTEIN.

What to record of my impression I do not know. It seemed to me during the whole evening that I was carried back sixty years to one of BEETHOVEN's annual concerts in Vienna. The "pianism," to use a word of New York coinage, I believe, was of that immensely powerful, passionate character, which despising all the mere finenesses and niceties of the schools and salons, exerts its perfect command of the instrument, only for the purpose of expressing feelings and musical ideas. As with JOACHIM and his violin, so RUBINSTEIN has no more difficulties to conquer. One of our musicians of some note here found this, that and the other fault with RUBINSTEIN's playing. It came to the ears of one of the oldest and most distinguished professors. "Tell him," said he, "he may think himself happy when he begins to play like him!"

As to the first part of the concert all agree. The greatness of RUBINSTEIN's playing, the originality and depth of his musical thoughts, and the extreme skill with which upon the piano, he expresses them, admit of no dispute. For the first time in my life have I heard a pianist play his own compositions, without wishing he would leave this finger trash and give something from CHOPIN, MENDELSSOHN, or older composers. Because I speak of the immense power of his playing, do not imagine that he cannot be delicate—the softest zephyrs breathe after the terrific thunderstorm—I am generally more impressed with the little beauties than with the giant sublimity of Niagara.

As to the Symphony, it is hard to speak of it, after once hearing. There are those, and indeed of the first class, which are as well understood on the first hearing as on the hundredth; there are those which are beneath all rank, which are never understood. It is equally impossible to see the bottom of Lake Superior and of Lake Erie—the former is deep, the latter muddy. My companion was exceedingly pleased—he felt it to be entirely original—and indeed its power and originality seemed to be its grand characteristics. I agree with him in a great measure; he was perhaps most pleased with the Andante; I thought the most striking and original movement to be the Scherzo. REILSTADT's article upon the first concert contains much with which I must sympathize. It does seem as if Joachim was pursuing the wiser course in devoting himself to a most thorough study of the Orchestra, and gaining a wide experience in the art of expressing his ideas before coming before the public as composer on so grand a scale. At times I thought it not difficult to see, that RUBINSTEIN had not fully succeeded in making his idea clear, while the grandeur of the thought was evident. Beethoven at his age was again going through a thorough course of harmony and counterpoint with ALBRECHTSBERGER, and was three years older before he produced an orchestral work in public.

I have heard this winter many orchestral works of young, or at least not much known, composers; but nothing has approached in importance what was last night produced in the theatre hall. If he should not split upon the rock on which so many have been lost—a want of thorough, severe study in the grammar and rhetoric, so to speak, of music—in the technicalities of the Art, why may we not expect great things of him? I never think of him but as a young Beethoven—can there be a higher compliment?

Feb. 11.—One thing occurs to me, worthy of a place in my jottings, in connection with RUBINSTEIN's concert. And that is the conduct of the audience. A large proportion of those present came with free tickets, and showed their appreciation (!) of the concert giver by talking, laughing, going out before the close, and all that sort of thing, in a manner I had not dreamed of here. I had to leave the main floor and seek a place in the gallery, to hear at all. The worst behaved audience, by all odds, at the performance of good music, which I ever saw was that—mostly young women—which last winter and winter before I used to see (and hear) at the Philharmonic rehearsals in New York. But these were only rehearsals. RUBINSTEIN's audience bore the palm at regular concerts.

Ah, how the Germans love and appreciate music!

VERY CLASSICAL.—A recent number of the Musical Gazette has the following clever jeu d'esprit:

Not long since, as a gentleman who is well known in this city as a thorough musician and an accomplished artist, was contemplating from his parlor window the antics of a monkey, belonging to an organ grinder in the street, who was torturing his organ and our friend with a vindictive pertinacity, of which only organ grinders are capable, he—the tortured friend and musician—was surprised at the appearance of a dashing equipage threading the humble street in which he resided. So seldom was anything vehicular of more recherché and pretentious quality than the butcher's, baker's, or milkman's cart, seen in the street, that the appearance of the equipage caused much commotion among the simple-minded inhabitants, and completely eclipsed the organ grinder and his monkey, who indignantly retired; the latter taking its revenge in making hideous faces at the footman, who formed a portion of the new arrival. Our musical friend observed that the approaching establishment consisted of two spanking bay horses, arrayed in resplendent silver-plated harness; a fashionable and costly carriage; a sumptuously dressed and beautiful lady, half reclining on the cushions; a burly coachman on the box, and two footmen behind, adorned with dashing livery. Where, soliloquized our musical friend, where can this beautiful creature be going? He was answered by the carriage stopping before his own door; and before he could overcome the astonishment consequent thereupon, his servant-girl brought him a card, on which was inscribed the name of one of the richest ladies in New York. The lady sought him most unequivocally; and with mingled feelings of surprise and vanity, he awaited her approach, in his modest little parlor. She soon came. She hoped she had the pleasure of addressing Mr. SYMPHONY: she had. She was glad of it. She was going to give a classical musical soirée, on a scale of magnificence hitherto unprecedented, and utterly regardless of expense. It was to be strictly classical; and of course a strictly classical musical soirée could not well be given without the aid of Mr. Symphony and his band. Would Mr. Symphony and his band assist? The price was of no consequence; the utmost classicalness, at whatever cost, was to be secured. Mr. Symphony was charmed—equally with the good taste and the liberality of the lady; he would be happy—exceedingly happy to contribute his feeble aid, and he would also insure the attendance of his band. But when was the soirée to take place? Oh! it would take place very soon. But would Mr. Symphony be so kind as to call at the lady's residence, on the following Thursday, for the purpose of giving his valuable opinion as to the arrangement of the room so as to secure the best musical effects, etc.? Mr. Symphony would be happy to call. The lady retired; the carriage rolled away, and Mr. Symphony began to indulge in a brighter dream for musical Art in America. That lovely creature, so enthusiastic for the classical in music, and so regardless of expense, would certainly give Art an impetus, etc. Mr. Symphony permitted himself to cherish the wildest hopes, and ordered a barrel of lager-bier. Mr. Symphony was impatient for the arrival of Thursday. He said to himself that it would never come; but it did come, nevertheless, and with it came the carriage, coachman, and footman, and a note from the lady, informing Mr. Symphony that the carriage had been sent for him. What an honor! How considerate! Mr. Symphony entered the carriage, and soon arrived at the stupendous mansion of his fair patroness, in Fifth Avenue. He was ushered into an imposing and gorgeously furnished suit of rooms. The lady soon entered, as handsome and classical as ever, and seemingly as regardless of expense. She greeted Mr. Symphony cordially. She conducted him here; she conducted him there. How will this do? how will that do? Remember, Mr. Symphony, every thing is to be of the most classical order. O yes! Mr. Symphony keeps that constantly in mind, and ventures a compliment on the lady's taste. He then mentioned various compositions of Haydn, Mozart, Beethoven, and others, which he thinks it would be well to introduce; not the entire works, that would perhaps be too tiresome for such an occasion; but the most effective and best appreciated movements of them. Yes, certainly, that would be very nice. But the lady wished Mr. Symphony "to open the whole affair," and to commence the performances with something very classical. She had made a selection for him: the opening chorus of Ernani. Next, she would have played the sextet from Lucia; next, Jullien's Firemen's Quadrille; next—but here, to the astonishment of the lady, Mr. Symphony executed a fugue across the parlor, through the hall, out at the door, and down the avenue; and she has never been able to set eyes on him since.

Musical Correspondence.

From WASHINGTON, D. C.

MARCH 29.—For about a week past our city has been a wind-instrument, whose only music however has been a prevalent pneumatic coughing. Whether it is the President's vetoes, or the Soulé correspondence, or the Czar's death that have been sowing the wind, we have certainly been reaping the whirlwind. Under such circumstances, though I had heard some good music, and had read the Journal, it was impossible to have written a good-natured letter, as I wanted to,—even if there had been a possibility of getting it to the post office without being blown away.

Since I last wrote we have had two or three pretty fair concerts here,—the best of which was PAUL JULLIEN's; whose violin reminds you of that famous one whose maker caught in it the spirit of his dying mother, and which ever after gave forth a tone as of an imprisoned soul. But the latest thing is something which for originality, individuality, and all that sort of thing, beats even your own city of Isms and Eccentricities. This is no other than a Soirée of ROBERT HELLER's, held at Carusi's Saloon last week. Part 1; Piano-forte music. Part 2; three grand experiments necromantic! Heller's a genius. He saw what Washington wanted; he gave the supply, it brought him money and reputation.

The concert was opened with the Sonata Pathétique. I was agreeably surprised. Of all BEETHOVEN's music this was the last I should have associated with Heller. I had many Boston memories of Heller: of how at our afternoon concerts he used to come forth, sit down quickly and in nine cases out of ten play that little scherzo of MENDELSSOHN's youth—until once some of us raised a hiss, which attracted a gaze from the crowd similar to little Oliver when he asked for "more." It was clear Heller was not aware of the importance of our Wednesday afternoons. And then at the subscriptions he played concertos faithfully.

His fingers are manifestly in better plight now. And the Sonata was charming. The second part of the first movement, Allegro molto e con brio, was given to a wonder. But I trembled for the second. I had heard DRESEL play it, and supposed I should never hear it again. But Heller had studied it thoroughly, and the fascinating Adagio did not suffer. The other good music he had, consisted of the following Lieder ohne Worte: No. 1, first book; No. 6, third book; No. 6, fifth book. Rather ambitious certainly, but still such a treat to hear at all, that I had not the heart to criticize. THALBERG's Sonnambula Fantasia, and some selections from his own (Heller's) works attracted more applause than the others.

Heller is certainly a remarkable performer, chiefly so from his marvellous intrepidity, coolness. The most rapid prestidigitation (a phrase I remember you used to apply to him as apropos of his profession) does not seem to excite anything more than his knuckles. I rather suspect it was the lack of a better piano that made his performance of pieces that have so often penetrated me through and through, only enlist my admiration of his skill.

But of Heller's "Drum of the Spirits," "Marvellous Orange Tree," "Second-Sight Mystery," I have no words to express my admiration. The Second-Sight produces the greatest excitement here, and convinces many that Robert Heller is certainly a near friend of Robert le Diable.

I was better pleased with the first Song without Words, as I heard it two evenings afterward at Mr. L.'s, than as Heller performed it. Before the quartet assembled, it was performed on the piano and violoncello. I wish those beautiful arrangements of CZERNY's were more common. We also had on this occasion Mendelssohn's first and second Quartets. The first of these I have heard several times now. It has always struck me as more constrained than Mendelssohn's usual style; somewhat as the first Symphony of Beethoven has, as being not exactly individual and natural. We had, as a conclusion, the Eroica, which I listened to in the light of WAGNER's analysis; which, however, like every other analysis I ever read of Beethoven's music, did me no good, and was soon forgotten.

From ITALY.

LEGHORN, FEB. 12.—I promised to tell you something about what I had seen, or rather heard, in the musical way since I have been wandering in that land known, par excellence, as "the Land of Song." From my experience it appears rather a misnomer. Almost as much so as the hackneyed epithet of "sunny clime;" which the alternate storms of snow and rain, which have attended our Italian pilgrimage in search of sunshine, have most wofully belied.

In Venice, where we stopped some weeks, we heard a sufficient quantity of Opera, to be sure,—but it was VERDI—VERDI! The Venetians very naturally like to hear Idue Foscari, even when performed, as we heard it, by a tenor, who shouted through his nose in an exasperating manner—a basso, who reminded me of the man in the Picwick Papers that was requested to "send a boy home, to see if he had not left his voice under his pillow;" and a prima donna, who probably sang very well indeed ten years ago. National partiality and memory of the past may excuse the weakness which submits to be amused three times a week by a most doleful series of alternate inaudible solos and deafening choruses; but no tenable reason could, I opine, be alleged for the enthusiasm with which a certain production, calling itself an opera and denominated L'Ebreo (the Jew) was received. Perhaps the aspect of the beautiful Teatro la Fenice put the audience into good humor. Certainly, without exception it is the most beautiful theatre I have seen. The Berlin Opera House may be equal to it, but not superior. There are no dark rede, no deep greens, giving to a place of amusement the aspect of a misapplied cathedral. All is light, graceful, airy. The boxes are closed at the sides, which adds to the completeness of the aspect of the house, though it destroys the individuality of the groups in the boxes, only leaving visible the fair, flower-crowned heads, and graceful shoulders of the beautiful Venetian women. Beautiful they are, not with the airy grace of our lovely countrywomen; but with a certain heavy, monumental grandeur, that is quite as fascinating in its way.

They would be more agreeable neighbors at the Opera, however, if they came there to listen instead of to talk, which appears to be their sole object in coming. Then there are those insupportable white-coated Austrian officers, who go lounging about, talking in German, and, with the proverbial insolence of conquerors, utterly disregarding the hush! hush! which precedes the prima donna's grand effort, coolly continuing their audible observations on the ladies in the lower row, during the last dying speech and confession of the unlucky tenor—who sings away in the agonies of death, as is the wondrous fashion of that class of humanity—without in the least attracting their high and mighty attention. But I am forgetting L'Ebreo.

This opera is the production of an individual denominated Signor GIUSEPPE APOLLONI, who appears to have devoted his life to a diligent study of the works of that wonderful genius—Monsieur Verdi. Certainly Verdi is a very great man; he has founded a school—the clap-trap school of music! There is a great deal of talk about “the Age” just now. Some call it the age of Iron; some, the age of Paper; some, the age of Bronze. Were I to give it a name, I should call it the “Age of Noise.” Noise, noise, everywhere—from the heights of Sevastopol, to the boards of La Fenice. The highest praise that can be bestowed upon the crack scholar of a public school is the magniloquent prophecy—“That’s a fine boy! one of these days he will make a noise in the world!” But nowhere have the disastrous influences of this all-pervading feature of the present age been more apparent than in its effect upon that science, which is called, “the Science of Sounds,” but which bids fair ere long to become “the Art of Noise.”

The story of Signor Appolloni’s opera is taken from Bulwer’s novel, “Leila; or the Siege of Grenada.” The argument is briefly this:

Issachar is a Jew; has a daughter named Leila, in love with Adel Muza, a general in the army of Boabdil el Chico, king of the Moors. Said Issachar betrays the Moorish king to Ferdinand of Arragon, and leaves his daughter in the Spanish camp as a pledge of his fidelity. Leila becomes a convert to Christianity, and Issachar, happening, by one of those inconvenient chances common to operas, to be prowling about the Christian tents just as she is about being baptized, rushes in, and in the midst of an uproar perfectly indescribable, considerably stabs her to the heart—thus putting an end to her sufferings and those of the audience together. Of course the Odalisques, composing the harem of Boabdil el Chico, divert that monarch by dances. An Opera is nothing now-a-days without an interpolated ballet; which being generally performed by a set of incapables, who dare not appear in the regular ballet for fear of being hissed off the stage, is particularly agreeable and æsthetic in the highest degree. Of course Adel Muza sings a serenade behind the scenes. The part of the said Adel Muza was performed by Signor NIGRINI, the only individual on the stage whose voice was audible, except at intervals. How hoarse he must have been after the opera was over, I shudder to think! Of course Issachar curses his daughter upon discovering her affection for the Moorish general. It is the regular thing. Basso fathers always curse their daughters; it shows off the low notes. Of course Leila sings a bravura song after she has been mortally wounded. Of course there is a mysterious chorus of conspirators under ground. One could not be let off from that; it made too great a hit in Ernani. For the same reason it was imperatively necessary that the troops of the king of Arragon should march upon the stage, accompanied by a crashing, clashing, thundering military band, at the entrance of which I heard an unfortunate Frenchman behind me exclaim, “Mon Dieu, quel tapage!” O dear, it makes my head ache to think of it! Of course the orchestra drowned the singers upon every possible occasion. Of course the basso was inaudible—the prima donna spasmodic. Poor BARRIERI-NINI! how she struggled, and screamed, and threw up those ridiculous arms of hers in vain attempts to appear young and graceful! Of course every act closed in inexpressible noise and confusion.

Ah! the blessing of coming out into quiet moonlit Venice, and listening to the plash of the oars of the soft-rocking gondolas, after all that noise and glare! O, beautiful are those moonlight nights in Venice, and sweet is the sound of the Vesper chimes across the sea;—but never seems the white moonlight so soft and pure, and never is the sound of the Vesper bell so sadly sweet, as when the head is ringing, and the eyes swimming with the uproar and confusion of a modern opera!

There is one branch of music cultivated in Italy, which is sadly neglected everywhere else where I have ever been—that of chiming bells. O how soft, how clear, how rich, how beautiful they are! especially in Venice, where they sound amid that ghostly silence, across the sleeping sea. In Genoa they are beautifully clear; in Pisa wonderfully wild and deep; in Milan, soft and melancholy; but nowhere are they so lovely as in that strange, sea-girt city of silence, where they seem to sing an everlasting requiem for splendours dead, and for power and glory forever passed away! Listening one night to their wild music, I fancied I could trace the notes which suggested to BEETHOVEN that wondrous strain with which his last and greatest Symphony opens. Indeed that whole Symphony is full of the sound of bells. And so I have wandered home again, like a stray sheep, from Verdi and his clattering crew to Beethoven.

Poor Beethoven! how he would grieve could he hear the so-called music, which is now rife in Vienna, within hearing of the spot where his ashes rest.

O that miserable Don Giovanni at Vienna! How it was murdered! How the audience talked and chattered; how the orchestra—one trumpet excepted—went one way, and the singers another; while the trumpet aforesaid squeaked and howled entirely independent of both! How STRAUSS, Jr. played MENDELSSOHN’S Scherzo from the “Midsummer Night’s Dream,” to an accompaniment of talking, drinking, clattering of glasses and rattling of spoons, which would have driven the least musical frequenter of Liebig’s raving mad! J. went off in a perfectly incoherent rage. I didn’t mind it—it only made me laugh—until the Scherzo came; then I grew desperately angry certainly. Poor Beethoven! it is well he sleeps. No sound can awake him now. Better so.

I am afraid the Viennese are hopeless. Verdi is better than Strauss, at all events. However, the military music in Austria is irreproachable. The most beautiful brass bands I ever heard, I heard in Prague, Venice and Milan. The band which used to play on Thursdays in the Piazza San Marco, belonged to a Hungarian regiment, and played Mazurkas and Chardaschis in the most exquisite style. The music of the Hungarian dances is of the most enlivening character. Far different from the Russian music, in which there is always a hidden wail—however quick the movement may be. It is an oft repeated remark that the music of slaves is always sad.

I fear I am transcending your patience—so about an opera which I heard in the Carlo Felice, at Genoa, another time. I remain, truly yours,

Musical Chat-Chat.

The Courier des Etats Unis, (which, by the way, is one of the most agreeable journals in the country,) has been publishing some very pleasant feuilletons on “Contemporary Celebrities,” by M. Eugène de Mirvoix. From a very entertaining paper on SCRIBE, we extract this amusing sketch of the way in which the modern opera marries its “perfect music” unto “noble words.” It would be wrong, says Mirvoix, to suppose that music and poetry, these harmonious sisters, live on good terms with each other. Music rules poetry with a rod of iron, she maltreats her, clips her wings, cuts and slashes her, like a very Cinderella, till the poor thing has to run away and give place to vile prose, who puts on the spoils of the fugitive, and marches about like one of Macbeth’s witches in the robe of a Muse.

Your great musician wants no poet, but rather a prose writer with a “Rhyming dictionary” under his arm, who will dock off his verses or spin them out at the maestro’s sovereign will and pleasure. By working with Cherubini, Meyerbeer, Boieldieu, Rossini, Herold, Auber, and Carafa, Scribe has earned a round million of money: but that is really poor pay for the tortures to which those gentlemen have put him.

He used to say of Meyerbeer: “Confound him, he treats me like a she-ass!”

His hair has grown grey at this work, for he generally has to destroy on one day all that he had done the day before, and so on to the end of the chapter. “Here,” Meyerbeer would say to him, turning down a leaf of the libretto, “here, we must have a ballad!”

“Very well!” answers Scribe. “In what measure?”

“I should like octosyllabic verses, of four lines in a verse.”

Scribe goes to work, writes the ballad and sends it to the Maestro, who sends it back with a note:

“These four-lined verses are absurd, I want ten syllables to a line, to suit my music.”

It was a long piece of business they were upon, and as Scribe was a maker of metre, he must submit. He works over the ballad once, twice, twenty times, consumes a whole week at the work, and when he hands it to Meyerbeer is gratified at seeing it torn to pieces.

“What the devil is this! What made you imagine we wanted a ballad here?”

“I! I! why you imagined it!”

“Did I? Well then, we have made a mistake!”

Again, meeting Scribe on the boulevard, and taking his arm, Meyerbeer whispers mysteriously—

“I had a splendid idea, last evening, for an opera!”

“Yes! What was it?”

“I should like to have all the chief persons brought together in the fourth act, so as to have a Septuor!”

But that’s impossible!” cries Scribe. “The first three acts are already written. When you want such a situation as that, you must prepare the way for it from the beginning.”

“Oh! of course! It’s a tremendous thing to write it all over! But my Septuor! I must have the Septuor!”

“Well! well! I will arrange it,” says Scribe, with a sigh.

He gave six weeks to retouching the play. Meyerbeer took the libretto, kept it three years, and then handed it back to his friend: “On the whole, after reflecting upon the matter, I think our septuor won’t do!” I prefer a monologue!”

For the third time the whole piece must be recast! That day Scribe thought seriously of suicide.

All the other composers have treated him in like manner. Auber cutting the sense of a strophe clean in two, Boieldieu inverting the rhymes, and putting prosody to the rack, Hérold dislodging the cæsuras, and Carafa recklessly swelling a hexameter into fourteen feet.

The friend who has kindly furnished us the following extract from a letter from the sculptor, CRAWFORD, and who ought to know, assures us that the Statue of BEETHOVEN, intended for the Boston Music Hall, is an original work, and not a copy from the one in Bonn, (!) as lately stated in some of the papers. “It was finished two months ago. A musical ‘fête’ is to be held at Munich, in honor of the event of the Statue’s going to America. The Statue will be taken to the Odeon, placed upon a proper pedestal, and receive a certain inauguration by having some of Beethoven’s finest works performed for the occasion. This has been already announced in the Augsburg Gazette, and will create quite a sensation. The Statue will be sent, immediately after the ceremony, to Bremen, and thus reach Boston in the summer.”

It is unnecessary to point out the absurdity of the idea, that a man of Mr. Crawford’s fertility of imagination would set himself to work to make a copy of a modern German statue; and the still greater absurdity of supposing that an artist would receive such a commission from any person or persons. Mr. Crawford made four or five sketches for this statue before fixing upon one which satisfied him. They were very different one from the other, and none of them in the least resembling the Statue in Bonn.

Our old friend CARL BERGMANN walked into our sanctum yesterday, as fresh as life. He had come by lightning train from Chicago, sick enough of the West, and is engaged to conduct the last of the Philharmonic concerts for this season in New York, on the 21st instant, in place of Mr. EISFELD, who, we grieve to learn, is seriously ill. If Boston does not mean to yield its favorite conductor up to New York, Boston music-lovers must be stirring. Meanwhile we congratulate the Philharmonic.—Mr. WILLIAM SCHULTZE sailed last week for Europe, to revisit his friends in Germany. He intends to return to us in about three months.

English papers state that Sir HENRY R. BISHOP, husband of ANNA BISHOP, and composer of all those fine glees and English operas, is now living in a state of indigence, at the advanced age of three-score ten and odd. This, if true, is justly made a matter of reproach to so musical a country.

GUSTAV SATTER, whose piano-playing is just now all the talk, was born at Vienna in February, 1831, and is consequently but twenty-four years old. His father is a distinguished physician there, and he too would have been trained to that profession, but that his ruling passion, Music, battled hard against it, and with the aid of friends, prevailed. He had a very early love of the music of Mozart and Beethoven, and studied hard, even trying his hand at the composition of Sonatas, &c. The last time that LISZT played in Vienna, in 1846, our young pianist was inspired to new exertions, and practised with an assiduity that nothing but a severe illness could suspend. After the Revolution in '48, he visited France, England, Ireland, Belgium, and the principal cities of Germany, studying the compositions and the styles of playing of the renowned pianists. In Paris he made the acquaintance of CHOPIN, whose influence strengthened him in the determination to study to express the poetry of music, rather than to perform mere feats of miraculous execution. In 1851 he began his public career by the production of a Mass, Graduale, and Offertorium of his own composition, in the St. Charles Church in Vienna. Indeed he seems to have been extremely enterprising in early efforts at original composition. His first concert as a pianist was given in Vienna, on the 16th of May, in the same year, with a programme entirely of his own works, including, 1. Overture to "Julius Cæsar," for orchestra; 2. Trio, for piano, violin and 'cello; 3. Fantasia on the Prophète; 4. Overture to Schiller's "Ode to Joy." This successful debut was followed by concerts in Gratz, Klagenfurt, Laibach (where the Philharmonic Society gave him the honorary diploma), Trieste and Venice. A second visit to Paris was cut short by the imprisonment of his father for participation in the revolution in Vienna. In the year 1853-4 he composed a variety of works, both in classical and smaller forms, which were published in Vienna and met with a large sale. In the Summer he gave his farewell concert in Vienna, at which he played Beethoven's Sonata appassionata, Liszt's transcription of the "Tell" overture, and his own fantasia on the Freyschütz, and left Europe in September last for New York, where he has remained entirely quiet and unheralded, until his recent debut in the concert of the Philharmonic Society.

BOSTON, APRIL 7, 1855.

Mr. Gustav Satter's Concert.

The assembly at Chickering's on Monday evening, though of the most appreciative, was not so numerous as it should have been. This was in a measure owing, no doubt, to the freezing blast which swept through all our streets so violently all that day and night, and which even beleaguered the concert room, rattling the windows and moaning round the house with a wild and crazy sort of music, that vied in noise with the noisiest passages of the Liszt fantasia within. Doubtless too, it had its exasperating effect on the nerves of the young artist, lashing him into a more furious fortissimo and a more lightning-like velocity toward the conclusion of several of his pieces, sufficiently exciting in themselves. But it was nevertheless a very delightful and successful concert. The programme was remarkable, introducing the audience to more of the notable piano compositions, that were wholly new to them, than almost any concert that we can remember. It was indeed purely a piano-forte concert, no other instrument or voice intervening, except the strings in a single Trio. But with MOZART, BEETHOVEN, SCHUBERT, SCHUMANN, CHOPIN, LISZT, for composers, with so accomplished a virtuoso for interpreter, and so telling and tractable an instrument as that last noble Grand of the Messrs. Chickering, to do his bidding, there was spiritually and materially enough for a rare feast of Art.

Mr. Satter's playing satisfied us best that evening in the first two pieces. The first was in the E♭ Trio of FRANZ SCHUBERT, which he played with the brothers FRIES. This is the last of Schubert's two Trios, his hundredth work, written but soon before his early death, (Nov. 1828.) The other, in B♭, (which was intended to be given, and was so set down in the programme,) is supposed to have been written shortly before, and was posthumously brought to light. That is graceful, tender, dreamy in its character; but this more fiery and impetuous. Especially so the first movement, which is full of short, decided rhythms, in full chords, giving fine scope for the strong and crisp staccato of Mr. Satter, who certainly played it with the utmost neatness, clearness, and emphatic accent. The Adagio, too, is a deep, solemn, march-like movement, full of marvellous surprises in modulation, and surcharged with that strange magnetism, (as indeed the Allegro also,) with which Schubert's music seizes upon you almost as remarkably as Beethoven's. The Finale, in grandeur of sentiment, somewhat disappoints; it opens with a Haydn-like cheerfulness, and runs out to great length, with a continual return by all possible processes of modulation of a very bright and pleasing theme, which sang as sweet as silver bells in the exquisite upper octaves of that piano. The whole composition, however, is extremely interesting, and abounds with every variety of image and expression, (save that it has scarcely any slow cantabile;) so that Mr. Satter's mastery in execution and interpretation was displayed to the highest advantage. Schumann says of the E♭ Trio, that it is more active, manly, and dramatic, while that in B♭ on the contrary is passive, feminine, and lyrical.

But the most perfect of all Mr. Satter's renderings so far, was that of the little Minuet and Trio from Mozart's Symphony in E♭. It is comparatively a simple thing; but it required an artist to reproduce so faultlessly, so genially, the smooth, cool, limpid, even flow, and June-like atmosphere of that most Mozartean Allegretto. His playing, to say nothing of its exquisite mechanical perfection, expressed all that was in the music. Not so entirely with the Beethoven Minuetto, from the Sonata in E♭, (No. 3 of op. 29.) It seemed to us too fast, and not to contain all that we have whilom felt in connection with that music. We speak rather of the melodious Minuetto than of the Trio, with its smiting, flashing chords. The triplet of little pieces was completed rather heterogeneously by the Coronation March from the Prophète, a very brilliant and orchestrally crowded arrangement of Mr. Satter's own, which he made extremely effective.

Then came the grand piece of the evening, the Sonata appassionata of BEETHOVEN, in F minor, op. 57. SCHINDLER, in his life of the composer, says: "I asked him one day for a key to the two Sonatas, op. 57, and the one in D minor, op. 29, and he replied: read Shakspeare's 'Tempest.'" They certainly are alike in atmosphere and feeling, and are such music as one could fitly hear while reading or remembering the "Tempest." But the other is in a more gentle, graceful, feminine vein (we wish Mr. Satter would play it at his next Soirée); this, as its name denotes, is fiery, and impassioned to the last degree, a most exciting piece to play, or listen to. We thought the first movement was superbly executed, and it is immensely rapid, difficult and crowded. You feel all the lightnings and commotions of the elements in its wild and angry on-sweep, and its fitful pauses; and every little episode suggests the mingling of human tenderness with imaginations marvellous and awe-inspiring. The Andante, with its deep, wise, solemn theme, in manly, low chords, (Prospero, shall we fancy?), and its naturally evolving variations, might, it seemed to us, have been made more impressive; we could not feel sure that feeling and conception quite kept pace with execution there; and the wild, wind-like finale Presto was taken so extremely fast, although with perfect evenness and exactness, that the outline was hard to seize; besides that in strength, in vehemence, in loudness, it seemed also somewhat overdone. We could not but feel too, on the other hand, that some of the finer passages were treated with a little overniceness of style, rather than the downright earnestness of Beethoven. But we shall not have many chances to hear such great tone-poems of Beethoven rendered with such power and such independence of their extreme mechanical difficulties. It is only that acquaintance with Beethoven makes one's ideal terribly exacting. We should be but too glad to hear Mr. Satter play this Sonata again and repeatedly.

The next piece bore the following strange description on the programme.

Capricciol. Scenes mignonnes, on four notes.....SCHUMANN.

1. Preamble; 2. Pierrot; 3. Arlequin; 4. Valse noble;
5. Eusebius; 6. Florestan; 7. Coquette; 8. Replique;
9. Sphinxes; 10. Papillons; 11. Lettres dansantes;
12. Chiarina; 13. Chopin; 14. Estrella; 15. Reconnaissance;
16. Pantalon et Columbine; 17. Valse Allemande;
18. Paganini; 19. Aveu; 20. Promenade;
21. Pause; 22. March des "Davidbündler" contre les Philistines.

This must not be understood to be written literally on four notes. It is a queer medley of little pieces, of various styles and personal allusions, which Schumann in some freak of his younger days strung upon the chance suggestion of the four letters composing the name or residence of one of his lady friends. The letters are A, S, C, H; the H in German standing for our B natural, and S or es for E flat. Of course few of the allusions and little of the point of the joke can be understood here and now, and it seems hardly a piece for the concert room. Yet in so much as can be traced it possesses a certain historical interest, and illustrates a significant period in the recent developments of German music. The Leipzig Neue Zeitschrift für Musik, which was founded and for ten years edited by Schumann, grew out of a club of young musical protesters like himself, who used to meet almost every evening in the latter part of 1833, "ostensibly for social pleasure, but quite as much for the interchange of thoughts about that Art which was meat and drink to them—Music. The then musical state of Germany," (we quote from Schumann's preface to a collection of his writings,) "was not very edifying. Upon the stage still reigned Rossini, on the pianos almost exclusively Herz and Hüntten. And yet only a few years had flown, since Beethoven, Weber and Schubert lived among us. To be sure, Mendelssohn's star was in the ascendant, and wonderful things were whispered abroad of a Pole, Chopin, —but these first acquired a lasting influence later. One day the thought passed through our young hot heads:—Let us not look idly on; take hold, and make it better; take hold, and let the poesy of Art be held in honor once more. Hence arose the first sheets of the New Journal," &c. &c. Left alone in his editing, Schumann introduced criticisms from different points of view upon the same matters, under the assumed signatures of "Eusebius," and "Florestan," and a certain mediating "Meister Raro." These were supposed members of a certain "more than secret Bund (or confederacy), since it existed only in the brain of its founder," called the David Bund; a league in fact against the Philistines, which is the general term among German students, artists, poets, &c., for prosaic, narrow, hard, ungenial, commonplace respectabilities. This explains some of the allusions in the scenes mignonnes, especially the march at the end, which is as much as to say: Down with the old fogies! Chiarina (No. 12) is his own artist wife Clara, of whom he says in the preface above quoted: "These not unwelcome comrades (Eusebius, &c.) finally vanished altogether from the Zeitschrift, and ever since a 'Peri' led them off to climes remote, there has been nothing more heard of their literary labors."—Many of the little pieces too are quite piquant and charming in themselves, and passing in such rapid contrast, under the fleet fingers of such a player, who seemed quite to enter into the humor of the thing, they gave no little pleasure.

The Ballade by CHOPIN, in G minor, one of the most florid, dreamy, passion-fraught, and difficult of his compositions, was played with wonderful ease and brilliancy; but suffered, as we thought, somewhat like the Sonata, in being wrought up to too vehement a pitch toward the close. To say that this performance was so truly steeped in the delicate peculiar spirit and sentiment of Chopin, as some that we have heard, would be saying too much. Mr. Satter is as yet a very young man, exuberant with power, and enterprising, ready talent; ambitious too to take a high and really artistic stand; impressed with good maxims, and a zealous student of the real classics of his Art; but it would be too much to expect of him all that earnest depth of feeling, and of inward experience, all that maturity of conception, which should leave nothing to be desired in his interpretations of such poets as Chopin and Beethoven.

The Concert closed with another performance of Liszt's prodigious fantasia upon Mendelssohn's "Midsummer Night's Dream" music, which was indeed an amazing specimen of strength, delicacy, rapidity, and clearness in execution, and brought out the remarkable power and brilliancy of the instrument, in a manner that electrified the audience even more than at the concert of the Quintette Club. In those aerial fairy tremolos the peculiar beauty of the upper octaves of the piano was very striking. This was really music of the "prodigious school," and was well enough for once, since our young virtuoso would play all schools.—Mr. SATTER, it will be seen, announces two more concerts, for Tuesday and Friday next, with equally rare programmes. No one should lose these opportunities to hear such compositions played by one so very able.

MUSICAL EDUCATION SOCIETY.—The sixth and last of the pleasant miscellaneous Concerts by this Society was given on Thursday evening, in the Tremont Temple. The selections were as usual mostly from Oratorio music. Mr. KREISSMANN conducted and accompanied the solos on the piano, and Mr. MUELLER presided at the organ in the choruses. We were sorry to lose the "Hailstone" and another chorus from HANDEL's "Israel in Egypt;" but we listened with great pleasure to the correct, clear, and effective rendering of the two choruses from "Jephtha": No more to Ammon's God, and In glory high, which in its suggestion of the rolling sea is truly sublime. Also to two from "Joshua": May all the host of heaven and We with redoubled rage return.—See! the conquering hero comes, was progressing, as it seemed to us, too slowly, when we were obliged to leave, losing Mendelssohn's song: O, rest in the Lord, and two more choruses from "Joshua."

We have been often pleased, but this time were surprised, by the very effective singing of Miss DOANE; particularly in the pleading and impassioned song: Jerusalem! thou that killest, &c., from "St. Paul." Her pure soprano tones were more telling and penetrating than ever; really splendid sometimes was the emphatic note on the top of an ascending and dramatic passage. And what was best of all, we never in past times have heard her sing so uniformly true; this is a great gain, to which she adds another, of a pervading chaste expression.

In the other exquisite song by MENDELSSOHN, from his Forty-second Psalm; For my soul thirsteth for God, there were the same excellencies of voice and manner; but was not the piece taken much too slow?—The old air of STRADELLA, Pietà, Signor, was sung in English by Miss IDE, in some respects well, with even and distinct delivery, but coldly, and with a continual tendency to swerve from true intonation. We heard but the last strains of Mr. BROUGHTON's Lord, remember David;—enough to recognize a light, flexible, high tenor, of very sweet quality. The song about "The Church of our Fathers," sung by Mr. DRAPER, seemed to us rather a sentimental affair in itself, but it was very well sung and had to be repeated.

RUBINSTEIN.—We are tempted to translate part of an article by the distinguished Berlin critic, RELLSTAB, upon this young Russian virtuoso and composer, who is now causing something of a stir in Germany, and who seems to have made a great impression on our "Diarist." Rellstab says:

"The concert of Herr RUBENSTEIN was in some respects the most significant of the whole winter, since it made us acquainted with the ripe development of a talent, which we had already known in its first bud of great promise. It presented us an artist, who already has an estimable and a brilliant Present, and to whose Future we attach the greatest hopes . . . and fears! In the first part, we may say, that only the hopes smiled to us from the blossoming Present; in the second, for his Symphony, fears rose on the horizon. Yet is the sum of our impressions joy and thankfulness, that we once more may greet a genuine artist; not merely an astonishing virtuoso, but also a productive artist, whose creative power, if it does not strike into an unfortunate direction, will raise him, perhaps does already raise him, higher than the colossal height of virtuosity he now commands."

"He is the Hercules of the piano-forte, the Jupiter Tonans of the instrument, who however wears the majesty of repose, and guides the gleaming lightnings. Not always grows he from his stormy sky; O no, thou lovely blue, and thou mild sun, ye have your full Olympian rights with him. To speak somewhat more technically: His power in playing chords and passages is astonishing. Although the orchestra tried hard to drown him, yet he was heard above all in his penetrating chords. Yet we cannot say that there was any offensive overdoing; he preserves proportion, beauty, even with colossal strength. The hearers felt fresh and buoyant, only the instrument trembled under the hand of the strong master. I would rather be anything else than ever so wonderful a Sötker Flügel under those hands! But no! After the ruler had shown his strength, he let his gentleness prevail. He did not draw, but literally sucked the sweetest singing tone from the piano, or let it sound out with the clear ring of silver bells. . . ."

"In his grand Etude he reached the highest height as a virtuoso, and perhaps also as composer, in this particular department. The work is written with a splendor and a fire that carry you quite away, and the artist played it with the storm-sweep of the eagle, and yet with calm, controlling majesty. . . . All the pieces in the first part (his own compositions) filled us with joyful astonishment, that here again was born to us a really creative talent, which does not have to stretch itself upon the rack, to get up a semblance of genius. The Concerto is written in grandiose style; it was too richly instrumented for us, but so brilliant and genial, that we could only recognize in it a youthful exuberance of power, too lavish of its means. And in the thoughts themselves, with all the composer's fondness for the serious, the dark, the wild, for the sombre depths and piercing lightnings of dissonance, there is still perfect healthfulness, freshness and even heroic strength. The only weakness of the artist seemed to us his over-fulness, and that is a fault which time will cure."

"But in his Symphony, 'Ocean,' in the last movements, the false squandering of this power was too obvious, not to disturb again our fairest hopes. Until the close of the first part, we had the feeling that here stood an artist, capable some day, after earnest study, of becoming not an unsuccessful rival of MENDELSSOHN. But on the path which he had entered in this Symphony, we found that every step was carrying him farther from this high goal. Yet through this work too there flow rich and copious artistic veins. The only fault is that of over-much-ness, both in thought-combinations, and in the instrumentation especially; but it has this fault in the extremest degree. The instrumentation is no longer beautiful, because it tries continually to present the most beautiful. We have no contrasts, no alternation of light and shade, because the composer cannot deny himself enough to abstain from using all colors and all lights at once."

MUSIC IN NEW YORK.—Our usual New York correspondence has not come to hand in season for this week's paper. But we believe little of importance has occurred, although there is much in prospect. The German Opera at Niblo's, (our correspondent's account of which we were compelled by crowd of matter to cut short last week,) since the three representations of Der Freyschütz, with the continued success of Miss LEHMANN, has been suspended during Passion-Week. Meanwhile the various opera troupes, all of which seem to have found their way back at once to New York, have been giving concerts. Mlle. NAU, with Messrs. ST. ALBYN and IRVING, and the pianist GÖCKEL, gave operatic and sacred miscellany at Niblo's on Thursday. For Monday last and Monday next the PYNE and HARRISON troupe have had concerts announced, the programme of the next including a new operetta, "The Marriage of Georgette." Miss PYNE has fortunately recovered from the consequences of her fall in Philadelphia, and, it is said, will soon be in Boston for another round of English opera.

At the Academy of Music, Lucrezia Borgia was performed on Wednesday, by STEFFANONE, VESTVALI and Signori BRIGNOLI and BADIALI; and a sacred and miscellaneous concert by the whole troupe will take place to-night under the direction of MARETZEK. Among its attractions, says the Tribune, will be "an entirely new manuscript Oratorio, entitled the Stabat Mater, or The Crucifixion of Christ, in which several hundred performers will take part.—On Monday evening, ROSSINI's masterpiece, "William Tell," will be produced for the first time in America, at the Academy. We trust it will be done well enough to have a good run.

Madame the Baroness DE LA GRANGE, of whom we gave an account some time ago, as the most brilliant florid bravura singer perhaps now in Europe, is expected to arrive next week in the Baltic, and to commence immediately an engagement at Niblo's, in Italian and German Opera. This, if we are rightly informed, is Mr. ULLMAN's enterprise.

The Other Side.

NEW YORK, APRIL 2, 1855.

MR. DWIGHT: Dear Sir,—I am a constant reader of your paper, and generally it pleases me; but when I read that part of your New York correspondent's letter which speaks of Mr. Mason's playing of Chopin's Impromptu, I did not like that at all. I know that it is not a true account: I am well acquainted with this piece, and have heard it played many times, (tried it myself, and how I wish I could play it!) but never heard it so beautifully played as it was by Mr. Mason on that evening. More than this, my piano teacher, who has heard all the best Pianists abroad, says he never heard it played more distinctly and beautifully. The "confusion of sounds" must have been in your correspondent's own brain; for I am sure no one else felt it who was present, and I for one am confident I heard every note. As for the "looseness" complained of in Mr. Mason's playing, it is that freedom from stiff, solid, iron, mechanical precision, that pleases me so much when I listen to him. It is like a pleasant dream or delightful vision; I feel that I am not listening to a machine, but to a living soul. I excuse your correspondent somewhat, it is so natural for New Yorkers to be unwilling to appreciate native talent; but he (or she, is it not? I think the writer must be of my own sex) should not have found fault with what was really the best performance of the evening.

Yours truly, JUSTICE.

We gladly give place to the above, (although it is a better plan in such cases for writers to let us know their real names); because we like to hear good things, rather than the contrary, of all men, and especially of a young artist who has given us so much pleasure as William Mason; and because two honest statements, though of opposite impressions, help us to know the truth. If "Justice" has the right of it, it is not because our New York correspondent's tone of criticism is not as uniformly kindly as it is candid, but doubtless owing to some accidental difference in their listening conditions at the time referred to. Justice must remind "Justice," also, that said correspondent pronounced very high praise upon some of the other performances of Mr. M.

BOUND VOLUMES of the past three years will soon be ready for purchasers.

PARTICULAR REQUEST.—Our supply of No. 4, Vol. V., and No. 15, Vol. VI., has nearly run out. Any of our friends who do not file their Journals, and who can send us either number, will confer a very great favor.

CONCERTS AT HAND. This evening, at the Boston Music Hall, a Benefit Concert is to be given complimentary to Mr. J. P. GROVES, a young American violinist, who has grown up among us, his musical talent having been first recognized and put in the way of due improvement while he was a pupil at the Warren Street Chapel. For several years Mr. Groves has uniformly held a place in our best orchestras, and has sometimes played a concert solo very creditably. He is evidently a favorite among the musicians, from the fact that so many of them have volunteered their aid to make this concert a substantial benefit. The overtures and accompaniments are to be played by an orchestra of fifty performers, and Mrs. WENTWORTH and Mr. MALLARD also have volunteered to sing. The proceeds are to swell the sails that shall waft the young artist over to the old world, where he goes to seek improvement in his art under the best German masters. He is worthy of encouragement and furtherance in this design.

On Tuesday evening there will be two concerts, one by PAUL JULIEN, in the Music Hall; and one by Mr. SATTER, at Chickering's Saloon. Mr. S. will then show us Liszt's remarkable power of arranging a Beethoven Symphony for the piano, even for two hands, by playing his arrangement of the Pastorale. He will also play what may be called the companion piece to the Sonata appassionata of Beethoven, namely the one in D minor, op. 29. His last concert will be on Friday. On both these occasions he will be assisted by that sweet young singer, Miss LOUISE HENSLEK.

Mr. E. BRUCE, organist of the Bowdoin St Church, announces for Thursday evening a repetition of a concert recently given by him with his choir and pupils, which seems to have been very popular, consisting of choruses, &c., from different operas. And for the 19th inst. he announces a performance of HAYDN's Mass in D. Mr. WILCOX to officiate as organist on both occasions.

MUSICAL FUND SOCIETY.—The proposed Benefit Concert, which ought to enlist the efforts of all friends of good music, is fixed, we understand, for Saturday, 21st of April. There is some chance that Mr. SATTER the pianist, will assist and play the E flat Concerto of Beethoven. He certainly will do so, if his own concerts justify his stay.

BANGOR.—We are happy to learn, as we do by the following note, that we have two to credit instead of one, for the "Excellent Example" of which we spoke a fortnight since.

Bangor, Me., March 20, 1854.

Mr. Editor:—In the Journal of last week I observed a very friendly notice of musical affairs in this city. I cannot, however, claim to have accomplished all that for which you gave me credit. Mr. HORACE R. STREETER has been heart and hand in the work, and to him should be accorded an equal share.

Although the number interested in our Concerts is above 300, still, owing to the want of a proper room, the attendance has never been as large as stated by you.

Very respectfully yours,

JOHN W. TUTTS.

NEW AESTHETIC JOURNAL.THE CRAYON,

A Weekly Paper devoted to ART, offers itself to the attention of all who are interested in the elevating and refining influences of Beauty. Among the contributors to THE CRAYON already are BRYANT, LOWELL, STREET, REMBRANDT PEALE, A. B. DURAND, President of the National Academy of Design, DANIEL HUNTINGTON, HENRY K. BROWN, and amongst those engaged are LONGFELLOW, BAYARD TAYLOR, GEO. W. CURTIS, Rev. H. W. BEECHER, Rev. SAMUEL OSOOND, Rev. H. W. BELLOWES, Hon. CHARLES SUMNER, and others of our most eminent writers. A series of papers by RUSKIN, and essays left by the eminent sculptor, HORATIO GREENOUGH, add to the interest of The Crayon.

From the Christian Inquirer.

The first five numbers of this promising (and thus far performing) paper are now out. We look for its weekly issue with high and never disappointed expectation. Its leaders are laden in a double sense—weighty with thought as well as with typographical distinctness. They carry metal. We are much impressed with the seriousness and instructive aim of the editorial columns. Manifestly it is not to tickle the ear or please the fancy, but to enlighten the mind and improve the taste, that the leading article always aims. The writer has a real, well-considered, distinct, and decisive thought to convey to his readers' minds, and he goes about it patiently, unambitiously, and earnestly, and succeeds not in winning our admiration—a poor victory—but in leaving us wiser than he found us.

The Crayon has, we hope, a special mission—to purge and soberize the style of our journalizing, as well as the taste of our people in general. The heated, gaseous, and re-intillating style of our public press is becoming intolerable. The Crayon uses a cool, quiet and unobtrusive style, which is truly refreshing.

From the Cincinnati Gazette.

We have already strongly recommended THE CRAYON, and every succeeding number proves it to be more and more worthy of all we have said in its praise. No journal, devoted to Art, has ever been so ably conducted, in this country; and if it meets with the support it so richly deserves, we have no doubt that it will exert a most wholesome influence upon the taste of the country.

W. J. PARKERSON,
NO. 8 LA GRANGE PLACE, BOSTON.

Having resided thirteen years in Europe with a view of adapting the Italian style of Singing to the English voice, and of remedying weakness of the voice, and thoroughly correcting harsh, guttural, nasal, or other unpleasant peculiarities, proposes to give lessons on the Voice, and in Singing, in the Italian, French, and English Languages.

Many who have spent years of severe study to attain musical excellence, after struggling to conquer some guttural, nasal, or other unpleasant mannerism, abandon the pursuit from the belief that they are afflicted with a natural defectiveness: when, with a fractional part of the application which they bestow on the other branches of the musical education, and with much less physical effort (if properly directed) than they have been accustomed to use, their voices might be rendered comparatively beautiful.

To singers of eminence he would say, with a just appreciation of their high attainments, that a brief practical examination of his system will convince the most sceptical, that he can afford them such assistance in beautifying the voice, as might delight the most fastidious.

"Being acquainted with the course of vocal discipline pursued by Mr. W. J. PARKERSON in forming and developing the voice, I take pleasure in bearing my testimony to its excellence; believing it to be far preferable to any other method known to me."

From the New York Daily Tribune.

There is no better musical critic in the country than John S. Dwight, of Boston, and few men are able to express what they have to say about music in a manner at once so poetic and precise. His articles are sure to please the learned in music, and to delight its lovers. We commend his journal unreservedly to our musical friends as a work which will be an able running commentary upon musical events, extracting from each its significance, varying its critical notices of music and musicians, both new and old, with biographical and entertaining details; and always true to what is most interesting and commanding in this noblest of the Arts.

From the Boston Evening Transcript.

Wherever there is a piano-forte, this Journal ought to be lying on it.

From the Boston Atlas.

We need just such a paper. One which is subservient to no particular clique of book-makers, or society agents, or managerial interests. One which tells truly what is good and what is bad, in the honest convictions of the writer.... Mr. Dwight unites more qualifications to hold the judge's chair than any other writer with whose powers we are acquainted. His genial warmth of feeling is united to an acute perception of the beauties of executional Art; while a long and earnest study of the great composers of the world has rendered him familiar with, and an appreciator of, their noble works.

CLARA SCHUMANN.

BY FRANZ LISZT.

II.

As long ago as in 1837, in the Gazette Musicale of Paris, we designated ROBERT SCHUMANN as one of those individualities, who inscribe their names with a sharp burin on the pages of history; as a man, whose works must draw upon themselves the attention of contemporaries, not needing their consent to outlive them; as an author, who by the deep stamp of his character, independently of the degree of sympathy that he might share, would certainly compel respect. Then we could say this only with an anticipating look into a Future, which, now realizing our expectations, has assigned him so decidedly prominent a place among living composers. We mention his high merit here only to intimate, that the man, who of present composers is unquestionably the one who most thinks music, was inevitably called to exercise a great influence upon a female virtuoso gifted with a like propensity from birth. Since the relative equality of the two artists did not exclude a positive superiority of the husband to the wife, it necessarily followed that uninterrupted contact with an intellect so lofty and imposing, so confounded with her own ideal, and environed with her own visions, as Robert Schumann, stamped the indelible impress of his profile upon CLARA'S talent. And in fact CLARA WIECK was very far from what Madame SCHUMANN has become.

The former lived in a still transparent atmosphere, cooled by the soft breezes of life's morning; if gentle flames arose here and there, they were like Bengal lights, the mere blush upon young virgin cheeks. The purity of her execution did not exclude a certain involuntary play of colors, which one might take for an unconscious coquetry. Roguish, careless humor was not strange to her. Her grace unfolded itself with an obviously indolent laissez-faire. One saw that the imagination of the young artist soared aloft, more from an inward and commanding impulse, than from self-conscious passion, or decided will. Unstable and capricious, she followed her own inclinations through the fair and mazy path, looked with delight at every flower, at every star, if they but breathed the slightest fragrance or glimmered with the palest splendor. She knew how with the most lovely grace to fling a spangled corner of the silvery veil that floated about her, over every object, which she would see sparkle with new beauty. The rhythmical accent struck her, more than she determined it; the movement of her play depended on the influence of the hour, the day, on sunshine and a tranquil mood. The melody did not remain always alike; now it came out nebulous and pale like the fair features of a Walkyr on a grey cloud, and now it advanced toward you bright and beaming as a gypsy child waving the tambourine. All this was involuntary, sudden, ravishing, so that even the imperfections of the young nature, through this purposeless and naive way, through the evident want of all thought of before or after, through the magic spell of a peculiar charm, through the innocent unfolding of all her excellencies, through the truthful simplicity of this poetic enthusiasm, which never dreamed that it was poetry, became almost more attractive than her more serious and solid attributes.

For a number of years Madame Schumann has played only now and then in public. Fate has led her recently to make new concert tours, and to turn her special attention again to virtuosity. As Weimar was one of the first cities embraced in her plan, we had for several days, during which the noble guest tarried among us, an opportunity to measure the significant development which her talent has been gaining since that time. The lovely Muses' playmate has become a consecrated, faithfully devoted, severe priestess. To the moist, youthful lustre of her eyes, there has succeeded a fixed and anxious look. The flower crown, once so loosely woven in her hair, now scarcely hides the burning scars, which the holy circlet has impressed so deeply on her brow. A mysterious light seems to stream from her fingers, when they make the strings resound. No more do those up-flickering waves of light encircle her, which made her hair thrill, and her heart beat quicker; all the warmth is concentrated into a glow, whose focus is known only to the hierophants of Art; they only may approach, to feel the electric stream of divine fire, which without torch, without lustre, without flame burns all the more extinguishably. An unimpeachable perfection characterizes every tone of this soft, suffering Sibyl, who, breathing heaven's air, remains connected only by her tears with earth.

Seldom again like her will a woman yield up her whole inward life to Art, only to feel and to enjoy in its domain. She has gradually attained to the subjective life of such masters as we find depicted in certain fantastical narratives, with whom the interests and importance of the whole globe are so completely merged in the sphere of Art, that to them the actual has become a dream, an unavoidable but painful interruption of their life, which in the eyes of the multitude appears a visionary life, but which they value as the only true reality. One easily sees, how she only wakes, so long as she hears music, or plays herself; how as the last tones die away, her soul shuts up, like the flower cup, whose petals droop ere the last ray of the sun has vanished, and only opens itself to the new spiritual day, when she is borne up on the wings of harmony. For her exquisite sensitiveness a false tone were a catastrophe, the failure of a passage a blighted inclination, a mistaken tempo a love unreturned, a wrongly conceived rhythm a despised deed of greatness, which in her excited inmost soul she must needs feel like so many wounds.

When she mounts the tripod of the temple, the woman speaks to us no more; she entertains us not as poetess about earthly passion, about the stormy strife of human destiny; she convinces us not by the boldness of her appeals, still less does she court our sympathies. A devout, believing and submissive priestess of the Delphian god, with trembling fidelity she performs his worship. Tremulously careful not to miss an iota of the oracle to be announced, not to accent a syllable falsely, she chastens her own feeling, so as not to become a guilty and a treacherous interpreter. She renounces her own suggestions, that she may declare the oracle as an incorruptible mediator, as a faithful expounder. She will explain no obscure passage according to her own individual inclination. For her, in the holy books whose simple pages have been received as valid after a severe test of their genuineness, there is nothing great and nothing small, but all is holy and must be accepted with undoubting, pious reverence. And she is so dominated by devotion, that the more variable human element recedes almost entirely out of view before this objective interpretation of Art. On the contrary, no one will excel her in the truthfulness with which she renders the masters that have become sacred to her through an intimate acquaintance. Among the moments of lively admiration, for which we have to thank her, we mention one above all others, since in that we most distinctly recognized the transformation that had been wrought in her talent, from the time when Grillparzer saw in her hands the key, with which, however, her young fingers could not at that time open all the secret chambers of the casket. For years we could hardly compel ourselves any more to listen to the F minor Sonata of Beethoven (Sonata Appassionata), so much had mediocrity fatigued and vexed our ear by a cold, soul-less drawing of this work. But recently when it was performed by Clara Schumann, we experienced an inmost spiritual satisfaction, as when a painter finds again a sublime original, after having been long, long persecuted by fade and disfigured copies. For if anything can turn the sublime into the gall of bitterness, it is the ridiculous imitations of it.

The conscientious minuteness of Madame Schumann's preparations for her public performances, has often been remarked. How she searches through the key-board, and tries every tone, the sound of which, although correct, does not perfectly yield the desired resonance and coloring; how she takes care that her seat be not in the least too high or too low. How she not only like a knight, who manages his horse before the tourney, practices for long hours on the piano which she has to play, to get acquainted with all its fine points, its weaknesses and excellencies, but does this, where it is possible, upon the very spot where she is to play, that she may hear how every chord, every arpeggio, every crescendo and diminuendo of the flood of tone will be affected by the acoustic conditions of the room. In this we can see only a necessity of her nature, a consequence of her whole mode of being, of her conception of her Art, her duty to her calling and the difficulty of her artistic life-purpose, which does not permit her to trust the personal inspirations that depend upon the favor of the moment and upon chance moods, but rather convinces her that, to remain faithful to the dignity of Art, one must approach its every festival with the same earnestness, the same devotion.

And so we found the whilom mostly melancholy, but yet often cheerful, always fascinating fairy changed to the conscientious servant of an altar, animated, as it seemed, more by divine awe than by divine intoxication. When Talma at Erfurt represented the greatest kings in their best moments, he saw before him a parterre of kings. In the same way for Clara Schumann it requires a public of the majesties of Art, in order that the secretly struggling fire of her soul may so seize upon all hearers, as it makes her own breast heave. But she will always be admired by all because she is in fact spotless, and has by persevering carefulness, by energy of will and by ascetic devotion attained to a mastery, which stamps her in a certain manner as infallible. She is no pianist and concert-giver in the common sense of the word; her talent seems to us like a personification of the secular oratorio: a Perseus yearning for her Paradise, in constant mystic contemplation of the Sublime, the Beautiful, the Ideal.

People say: "It pleased," or: "It did not please." As if there were nothing higher, than to please the people!"—R. Schumann.

Diary Abroad.—No. 15.

BERLIN, Feb. 12.—"German Rhetoric on the opera is chiefly nauseous iterations about MOZART's Don Giovanni." I thought of this sentence last night; one which I cut from some New York paper a year ago, and saved, because I was so amused at the absurd falsity of the statement, and utter ignorance of all that is German which the writer exhibited. I thought of it again last night, and felt that if the charge was true, there would be good ground for it, for Don Juan was given with all the splendor of the Royal Opera here. Not one of the solo singers of last evening is of uncommon excellence—several of the parts I have seen better: I have seen a better Donna Anna, than TUCZEK; a better Juan than SALOMON; a better Leporello than KRAUSE; BOSIO was a better Zerlina than AGNES BURY. Yet never was I so wrought upon, never did I feel the gradual progress of the drama, the stupendous climax of its finale—the awful effect of the contrasts so often occurring, the immense, unrivalled, unapproachable variety and richness of expression in the orchestral coloring, from the opening blast of the overture to the final chords—as last evening.

Nor did I ever feel more decidedly how much better it is to attend the production of an Opera—than the production of one or two singers. There is a vast deal in the putting of a work upon the stage—in the scenery, the chorus, all the little accessories, to say nothing of an orchestra properly balanced, trained and conducted. So last night I was thoroughly interested in Don Juan as a play. For the first time, I think, have I felt really the dramatic force of DA PONTE's text. The opening solo of Leporello came to me as something more than a comic description of his own troubles and aspirations—it gives a key to the character of his master, which is fully explained in his "Catalogue Song." It prepared me for the entrance of Don Juan and Anna. At last the libertine has met a rebuff—evidently his first; for once he is unsuccessful. From this moment his downfall dates. Adding murder to his attempt upon Anna, casts the die. This I felt last night; and now, as I read over OULIBICHEFF's view of this opening scene, I am by no means satisfied with it.

Through the whole play I followed Anna's influence upon the fate of Don Juan, feeling that the result was inevitable. But I am more than ever unwilling to admit HOFFMANN's idea that Anna may too have been a victim of the Don. When vengeance had at length overtaken him, I wanted, strangely enough to be sure, that closing scene, which is now never played, and the existence of which is forgotten, in which the other characters appear, and all ends happily.

Curious, that as I left the house I met an American gentleman, whose text-book was prepared by Da Ponte, in New York, in 182-(?) for the performance of the work by the GARCIA troupe. Unluckily the title page was gone, but Da Ponte's preface is there. MARIA GARCIA, afterwards MALIBRAN, was the Zerlina. That of course was the first performance of Don Juan on our side of the Atlantic. Will it ever be given there with the scenic and orchestral effects of last night? That ball scene for instance—three bands, three halls, three kinds of dances at once!

March 16.—That unfortunate lover of music, Agindos, who for his sins has been banished to Paris this winter, has at length been pitied by the Fates, and allowed to hear a Symphony by the Conservatoire. Long abstinence having made him hungry to raging, I fear that he has surfeited and that his wits are slightly disordered. Thus he writes to my friend Pegan.

PARIS, March 12.

My dear Pegan:—I have just come down.

"Come down, from where, pray?"

Why, from the upper regions, not like Icarus nor Vulcan, but in a respectable manner, gently, soberly; and I now find myself upon terra firma. The thing was after this wise, viz.—I went yesterday to a concert of the Conservatoire. I had moved heaven and earth to get a ticket—and succeeded! This same Conservatoire had been haunting me all winter. Everybody said "you must hear this orchestra before you can be entitled to speak." I was becoming desperate—when finally a friend brought me a ticket. I turned over my table, broke a chair, and nearly broke my neck, besides (not doing) other antics—which were down on the bill but omitted by particular request on the reception of said ticket.

The concert was advertised for two o'clock, P. M.,—"deux heures précises"—I came very near going at twelve for fear of being late,—I did present myself at one and a half.—Excellent officer at the door—good soul—only tore off a corner of my ticket, and didn't say it was false—that some one had played a cruel trick upon me—no; he let me pass and then I wanted to make him a speech on the spot as an acknowledgment of my gratitude; but I could not get beyond "Monsieur!" to save my life. Good people showed me my seat and I took possession of it with the composure of the oldest subscriber. I had time to look about me before the musicians came in—Grande Salle des Concerts—that's what the programme calls the concert room. I should call it a "sell," not a Salle. It reminds me of the theatre at Göttingen—or that of any such little provincial town. It is elliptical in shape; has three galleries, besides the parterre, and accommodates about 1200 persons. Every nook and corner is occupied, and there is a large number of "standees." I never saw a place more completely crammed. The audience was evidently composed of people who had music in their souls. You felt this when a gentle murmur, a sympathetic pulsation, "a shivering along the arteries," followed some touching passage.

The leader of the orchestra, M. GIRARD, a great, stout man, rapped for silence, and not a sound was heard. The first piece upon the programme was "Symphonie en Sol mineur, de MOZART," an old acquaintance of ours, bringing you and the Veda vividly to mind. How they played it! The tears gushed into my eyes—I wanted to cry like a child. Music has seldom affected me so. You could almost hear the audience sob; the musicians themselves exchanged glances full of feeling, full of meaning at their own exquisite rendering and interpretation of some of the passages. The Scherzo was "bisect,"—(encored, as we say in America) as it always is and deserves to be. I never heard anything more delicious in my life. You remember the introduction to this Symphony? It reminds me of the instrumentation in the "Magic Flute." This piece accomplished, the musicians talked together about it; the audience talked about it; and everybody felt himself a better man. I could have gone home and had something to think of all my life.

The second piece was an Aria from HAYDN's "Creation," beautifully sung by M. LEVASSEUR.

Third, Music to "Egmont," by BEETHOVEN, the connecting text read by M. GUICHARD, the vocal pieces sung by Mme. MIOLAN-CAVALHO; both accomplishing their parts as well as they could have been done. It would be vain to attempt to convey to your mind an adequate conception of the perfect manner in which the orchestra rendered this sublime composition of Beethoven. I never understood nor felt its power before. If I could give my impression of "Hamlet" in a letter, or describe Mt. Blanc, I might hope for success with "Egmont"—but as it is, I pass it over as too great a subject for my pen. I can only say that the orchestra played it almost as if inspired.

Fourth, Quartet by CHERUBINI. I could very well have dispensed with it, but I suppose it was performed because there must be at least one piece by a Frenchman, by a composer claimed by the French.

Fifth and lastly, Overture to "Oberon." What an appropriate moroseau to close with! The close of this overture is so particularly fine as to form a finale worthy of so great a concert. It was played with a perfection, too, exceeding if possible that of those which had gone before it, and sent us home, all well satisfied with ourselves, with the world, and with everything we had heard. It was at this concert that I began my ascent—do you wonder that it took me twenty-four hours to return to sublunary things?

Now you will ask if the orchestra of the Conservatoire is better than our Royal friends in Berlin? I reply, impossible to play better; they play as well, and in fact it seemed to me that the Berlin orchestra had been transported in a body to Paris, and that I was listening to my old friends, not to new acquaintances. A musician might detect a difference. I am inclined myself to the opinion that a German orchestra, under a German leader, and in the heart of Germany itself, could better interpret Beethoven and Mozart than foreigners. Still the orchestra here played "Egmont" in a manner beyond all criticism. I should say the Conservatoire is equal to any in the world, and if not number one, it is not number two.

This is the second concert I have attended. At the first they played the 'Heroic Symphony' of Beethoven. There were some mistakes committed in the Scherzo, evidently an accident of rare occurrence, as it created an immense sensation; otherwise the performances were, like those of yesterday, worthy the great fame of the orchestra. Still I have heard the 'Heroic Symphony' played better in Berlin. So much for music.

Musical Correspondence.

From NEW YORK.

APRIL 9.—I did not write you last week because there was hardly anything to write about, particularly in my special line, that of concert-music. And even now you will have to be satisfied with a mere chit-chat letter, as I did not attend any of the concerts of last week, partly because I was not able to do so, and partly because they attracted me too little. At that of the PYNE and HARRISON troupe, on Monday, I am told, a very large audience was assembled, who were greeted, according to the Musical Gazette, to "a deluge of ballads." The performances of Miss Louisa Pyne, and some of those of her sister, seem to have been the only part of the entertainment which was beyond mediocrity. It is to be repeated to-night, I hear. A public rehearsal of the N. Y. HARMONIC SOCIETY took place on the same evening, and is said to have been very satisfactory. I regret that a permanent engagement on that night of the week has prevented me from attending any of these quite interesting and attentive réunions. Of the concert of the Opera troupe, on Saturday evening, the least said the better, according to all accounts. The house was quite empty, and the performances, with a few exceptions, very unsatisfactory. Among them were selections from ROSSINI's Stabat Mater: the Stabat Mater, or the Crucifixion of Christ, of which you make mention in your last, is a new composition by Mr. FRY, the bringing out of which is postponed until the 19th inst.

On Saturday afternoon the associate members of the PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY had an opportunity of admiring the excellencies of your friend Mr. BERGMANN as leader. And I, for one, did admire his energy and enthusiasm, and the strictness and pertinacity with which he "reined up" at the slightest fault, as well as the greater nicety of shading to which he actually compelled the orchestra. The latter will have to keep wide awake while he sojourns among them; for his Bostonian reputation, and the fact of his being a stranger, gives him a control over them which Mr. EISENBERG cannot have, who has had to create his own position, and is not yet firm enough in it to be able to presume upon it with the heterogeneous and unruly spirits that compose the body of which he is the head, and of which he only has made what it is now. No one can regret Mr. Eisenberg's illness more than I, nor rejoice more heartily at the present prospect of his ultimate recovery, but I cannot help thinking that this season of thorough training will be a very good thing for the Philharmonic orchestra.

I must thank you for taking my part against my fair antagonist, who expresses her opinion so decidedly in your last. But I would also say a few words in my own defence, and as gallantry forbids my addressing myself personally to an unknown lady, (who does me great honor by supposing me to belong to her sex,) you must allow me to make you my medium.

First of all I would clear myself from the imputation of being prejudiced against native talent. Far from this, I am too truly American, not to rejoice at any triumph of my countrymen in Art, or welcome gladly the rapidly increasing number of young artists springing up around us, and the love of true music which is slowly, but I hope, surely spreading in our land. For this reason I looked forward joyfully to Mr. MASON's return to this country, and his appearance here as the first thoroughly American pianist. I was present at his Matinée and Concerts in this city, admired heartily his ready solution of all the most difficult problems of the modern school, was delighted with his masterly rendering of the Handelian Fugue, honored him for playing something besides his own compositions, (which are, however, well worth playing,) and heard him then play the Impromptu of CHOPIN several times, in a manner which completely satisfied me. I, too, love that composition as well as any one can, and because I love it so, and know it so well, am very jealous of its rendering, and I still maintain that on that evening, the apple of discord between your unknown correspondent and myself, it was not played as well as it should have been. And instead of my being singular in this opinion, I have as yet met no one who did not agree with me, of many of my friends who were present.

As regards the looseness of playing which I mentioned, that expression refers more to the school to which Mr. Mason belongs. Chacun à son goût; some prefer that school or style, others the crisp, nervous, forcible style of which Mr. SATTER's playing is a type, and, in a measure, that of your townsman, Mr. DRESSER, neither of which, I am sure, any one can accuse of being stiff or mechanical. I was perhaps wrong in attempting a comparison between the two styles, as they are so totally different.

Mr. Mason is to play WEBER's Concertstück in our next Philharmonic concert, and I trust my fair opponent will not question my interest in native talent, when I say that I sincerely hope that even the most critical will have no fault to find with Mr. Mason's performance.

BORONIS.

APRIL 10.—Absence from the city prevented my giving you my usual report last week. But as there was not much to tell about, and as you have yourself told what there was, I am excusable.

Last Wednesday Lucrezia was given at the Academy to a poor house. But I have hardly ever heard it performed better. STEFFANONE sang and acted superbly, and BRIGNOLI, BADIALI and VESTVALI were capital. On Saturday evening a "sacred and secular concert" was given, the second part consisting of parts of ROSSINI's (not FRY's) Stabat Mater. About three or four hundred persons were present. FRY's Stabat Mater is to be given on Thursday.

And now for the grand event of the season, the performance of "William Tell." But let me first correct the assertion of the bills and some of the papers, that this is its first performance in America. From the "Despatch," whose musical and dramatic editor, Mr. C. B. BURKHARDT, is excellent authority in such matters, I learn that "William Tell" was produced in the original French, in New Orleans, anterior to 1841, and (also in French) at the Park Theatre in this city, on the 16th of June, 1845, and a number of times afterwards, with the following cast: Tell, M. GARRY; Arnolde, ARMAND; Walter Furst, DOUVEY; Melchthal, BERNARD; Gessler, C. DOUVEY; Rodolpho, COEURIOR; Matilda, Mme. CASINI.

I was only able to be present at the Academy last night for a very short time, and therefore can not give you much account of the performance. The audience, however, was the largest I have ever seen in the building, and, from all reports, though it was not dismissed till 12 o'clock, was well pleased with the performance. And indeed the managers did their utmost for a good and successful representation.—

Several new scenes were added, the choruses and supernumeraries were increased and everything done for its success. It did my eyes good to see the Academy so crowded full for once at least. The cast is as follows:

Matilda, an Austrian Princess,.....	Signora Steffanone.
Gessler, the Austrian Governor,.....	Signor Rocco.
Rodolpho, Captain of the Guards,.....	Signor Quinto.
Edwige, the wife of Tell,.....	Signora Avogadro.
Albert, her son,.....	Signora Bertucca Maretzek.
Guglielmo Tell,.....	Swiss { Sig. Badiali.
Arnolde, in love with Matilda,.....	{ Sig. Bolcioni.
Walter Furst,.....	{ Patriots, { Sig. Coletti.
Lentholdo,.....	Signor Cronza.
Melchthal, the father of Arnolde,.....	Signor Muller.
A Fisherman,.....	Signor Vietti.

All the solo singers are said to have done better than usual. The opera itself requires a great deal of care in its representation to be given in a satisfactory manner; for from the following plot you will see that there are many situations which need great scenic and mechanical assistance.

ACT I.—The people of the five cantons of Switzerland, are groaning under the oppression of their Governor. TELL, who has already determined upon procuring their independence, endeavors to excite the young ARNOLDO, who is in love with MATILDA, to embrace the cause which inflames his own patriotism. At this moment, LENTHOLDO having slain a soldier who was carrying off his daughter, appears and implores the fishermen to bear him across the lake. They all refuse, but TELL embarks with him as the soldiers in pursuit of him arrive. In their rage at losing him, they bear away the venerable pastor, the sire of ARNOLDO, a prisoner.

ACT II.—TELL, who has surprised ARNOLDO while having an interview with MATILDA, informs him that his father has been murdered. In his remorse, the young man determines upon joining him. The people of Unterwalden, Schwitz and Uri then approach. Their plans are laid, and the cry is first breathed "To Arms."

ACT III.—The cap of the Austrian Governor, GESSLER, has been erected upon a lofty pole, and all who are present are required to bow before it. TELL refuses to do so, and the soldiers who recognize him denounce him to GESSLER. Knowing his fame as a marksman, the Governor orders him to pierce with an arrow an apple which is placed upon the head of his son. TELL is in despair, but compelled to make the attempt, succeeds. As overpowered by his emotion he sinks into the arms of his friends, an arrow falls from his vest. It had been intended for the heart of GESSLER, if TELL had slain his son. In his rage, the Governor orders both of them to be seized, but MATILDA claims the boy's life in the name of their sovereign, and TELL only is borne away, as the Swiss breathe their curses upon GESSLER.

ACT IV.—ARNOLDO arms the people for the purpose of saving TELL. MATILDA, who has restored the patriot's son to his mother, proposes to save the father by remaining with them as a hostage for his safety: when a storm arises, and TELL is seen steering the boat on the lake, in which GESSLER had borne him away. Nearing a rock, he takes a desperate leap from the boat and manages to rejoin his family. GESSLER effects a landing on a more distant part of the shore, and comes in pursuit of him, when TELL seizes his arrow and takes a deadly aim. GESSLER falls. The first blow has been stricken for Swiss Liberty.

As it is announced for repetition on Wednesday and Friday, and will probably be continued still longer, I will endeavor to give you a more detailed account of the performance in my next.

The German opera at Niblo's commences again to-night. And in connection with this, I must severely, very severely blame Miss LEHMANN. I understand that she refused to sing in the Freischütz or any other German opera, unless BELLINI's miserable Capuletti e Montechi should also be given, so that she could shine as Romeo. Accordingly it is announced for to-night. I shall go, but only for a little while. I saw JOHANNA WAGNER in it, and if she could not make me like it, I do not think Caroline Lehmann can. And besides, the absurdity of producing it in German, by a German troupe. It will hurt the "good cause" vastly.

Mme. DE LA GRANGE could not get ready in time for the Baltic, but is certainly expected by the next steamer. For the next Philharmonic (April 21st,) we have the Tannhäuser overture, the Seventh Symphony (under Mr. BERGMANN's excellent direction,) MENDELSSOHN's Loreley, and two choruses from "Elijah," by the MENDELSSOHN UNION, and WEBER's Concert-Stück, to be performed by WILLIAM MASON.

R.

From BERLIN.

MARCH 9.—What a concert! I had been told repeatedly by Dr. Blank—who divides his time equally between his patients and music—that Mr. Music-director STERN's Singing Society had become really a rival of the Sing-Akademie in numbers and in the excellence of its performances; which assertion I had taken cum grano, supposing he was blinded by partiality. Last evening this society gave its first concert, and this morning I make all necessary and proper acknowledgments to the Doctor for having doubted him. The concert was in the hall of the Theatre, a room with a gallery, half the main floor of which was occupied by choir and orchestra; so that the audience numbered possibly five hundred persons—a good portion of the gallery seats being empty. Who says that the Germans are not the most musical people in the world? Five hundred persons—free tickets and all—in a city of 430,000 inhabitants, to hear a chorus of some two hundred, an orchestra of about fifty members, and two soloists of some distinction, perform the following programme:

1. Psalm CXIV: "When Israel went out of Egypt," for eight-voiced chorus and orchestra, by FELIX MENDELSSOHN BAR-THOLDY.
2. Concerto for the Violin, by MENDELSSOHN, performed by Herr Concert-melster JOACHIM.
3. Fantasia for Piano, Orchestra and Chorus, by BEETHOVEN. Piano-forte part by Frau CLARA SCHUMANN.
4. Romanza (F major) for Violin and Orchestra, by BEETHOVEN. Executed by JOACHIM.
5. Kyrie and Gloria, from the Great Mass in D, by BEETHOVEN.

No. 5 was given for the first time in public in Berlin, say the newspapers—and an audience of some five hundred was there to listen! The 114th Psalm is short but worthy of MENDELSSOHN, reminding me in some of the painting of the mighty music in "Elijah." Why don't they sing these things at home? As to JOACHIM and the Concerto, I can say nothing. Perfection! perfection!

The National Zeitung man writes a great deal of the flattest nonsense about music, and makes the funniest mistakes sometimes; but this, about the Choral Fantasia, No. 3, of the programme, hits the mark.

"This," he says, "is a gentle prelude to the Ninth Symphony, a parallel piece to that sublime creation taken from the domain of the graceful and delicious. It begins with a long continued solo on the piano-forte. The master in a state of dreamy thought or reverie seems to be prelude upon the instrument to which he has been appointed, and while his fingers are gliding carelessly over the keys the soul is apparently collecting itself. Here all is vague and unconnected. Themes come peeping up only to be lost in broad arpeggios, and no distinct form comes out in all this flood of tones. Out of patience with his poor success, the composer calls upon the orchestra to help him give expression to the feeling which is struggling within for utterance. At first the Contrabassi answer in a sort of recitative figure, and after the other instruments have fallen in one by one, the piano-forte gives out a melody, which is singularly like the 'Freude, schöner Götterfunken,' in the Ninth Symphony; and in which our Tone-Poet at length has found that means of expression he has so long been seeking. Now the orchestra divides itself into groups, curiously examining the newly-found theme, throwing it about and varying it in all sorts of playful ways. The flutes pass it to the oboes; they to the clarinets and bassoons; then the string quartet gets possession of it, and finally we get it from the rejoicing chorus of all the instruments. Still there is more in it than piano-forte and orchestra can make known; there is yet something more to be expressed. They do not yet give up the attempt, but vary it into new forms, lead it through the most manifold harmonic changes, and at last repeat it in the minor, as if angry at their own weakness. At last, near the close, the human voice comes to their assistance, a full chorus joins the quartet, and surrounded as with a halo of tones from the joyous instruments, sounds forth the 'The Praise of Harmony.'

The only attempt, so far as I know, ever made to give this Fantasia, (how perfectly this title fits it!) in America, was that of HATTON, in Boston, some eight years since, at that concert of his in which a public, which had never failed to make him sing double the number of songs set down to him in the concerts of other people, left him to play and sing to empty benches. I have never been able to get over my shame and indignation at the shabbiness exhibited on that occasion.

I need record nothing of CLARA SCHUMANN's performance of the piano-forte part last evening, nor of JOACHIM's playing in the Beethoven romance which followed.

It is surely a record-worthy event when one hears for the first time any part—though only two numbers—of that work of Beethoven which he himself declares his "greatest and most successful." The greatest, because in it the musical ideas were, like the subject of the composition, of the grandest order—what so sublime to a devoted Catholic like Beethoven as the words of the Mass?—and because in the breadth and scope of the work it surpassed all else which he had written. The most successful, because he felt that he had here achieved his greatest success in obtaining a full and complete mastery of his ideas and in musically expressing them. May one judge a work of the extent of this great Mass by its two first movements? If so, I feel that Beethoven judged his own work correctly. As I heard that Kyrie, and that Gloria, so nobly sung, I went in imagination into some grand cathedral and listened to it under the influences of the place for which the mass was written, and where alone the question of its success as a work of Art can be decided. I was for the moment in Antwerp, Vienna, or Strasburg, and the mighty flood of tone came down to me from the organ-loft as the prayer of the kneeling multitude—"O Lord have mercy, Christ have mercy"—or as the "Glory to God in the highest" of that same multitude in an ecstasy of religious feeling.

Yes, his greatest and most successful!

Some time or other that crowning work of Christian architecture, the Cologne Cathedral, will be finished; the last stone will be laid, the last blow of the hammer will have been struck; the sculptor, the painter, the decorator will have gathered up their tools and departed, and the noblest work of architectural genius will stand there perfected! Then from every city in Europe will come together the Malibrans, the Maras, the Linds of that day; the Lablaches, Rubinis, and Brahams; the Joachims, Ernsts, and Beriois; all who vocally or instrumentally are above and separate from the mediocre—will come up to this "house of the Lord, to assist in the dedication thereof." But what in all music shall be found worthy of the place, the occasion, that chorus, that orchestra? Then and there will the great Mass in D, by Beethoven, find a fitting time and place for its production! A. W. T.

To send light into the depths of the human heart—that is the Artist's mission!—R. Schumann.

* Not in his letter to CHERUBINI, as the London Musical World had it recently in a leading editorial article, the style of which might do perhaps in a Diary, but whose flippancy and exhibition of ignorance upon the historical point in question are anything but honorable to a journal of as much pretension as the said Musical World. Cherubini's solemn statement that Beethoven's letter never reached him is sufficient answer to the greater portion of the article. As to the Musical World's opinion of Cherubini's compositions—Beethoven's estimate of them was quite the reverse.

THE BELLS OF VENICE.

I love the bells of Venice,
They sweep across the sea
Like the music of a vision—
Or a Seraph's minstrelsy.
Throughout the day they're ringing
Their sweetness on the air,
And through the night they're ringing
Beneath the starlight clear.

The deep, sad bells of Venice!
They sing a dirge-like lay;
They tell of pride forgotten,
Of splendor passed away—
A wild and wondrous story
Of the ages that are gone,
Of the faded, fallen glory
Of that city, still and lone.

The strange, wild bells of Venice!
They call a wondrous train
From their graves in the stately churches
To their ancient haunts again.—
Maidens fair and matrons holy,
Youths and gray-haired sires of yore,
In shadowy barks come gliding slowly
O'er the moonlit waves once more.

The sweet, soft bells of Venice!
They rang when Portia wed,
They sounded sad, a requiem
O'er Desdemona dead;
And pealed in triumph glorious,
When, o'er the glittering tides
The lovers brave, victorious, Bore home the rescued brides.*

The holy bells of Venice!
They call the soul to prayer,
When they break the Sabbath stillness
That fills that haunted air.
They pealed at the wondrous union
Of the city and the seas,
And they rang at the strange communion
Of the softened enemies†

The dreadful bells of Venice!
They tell an awful tale,
That makes the strong heart tremble,
And the ruddiest cheek grow pale;
Of terror and oppression,
Hands of steel and hearts of stone,
Wild despair and still depression—
Drowning cry and dying groan.

O the bells, the bells of Venice!
Sweet is their mingled strain;
But ne'er be their music wakened
By such cruel hands again!
Let them swing o'er the proud old city,
Slowly sinking, day by day,
And call upon the world to pity
Both her crimes and her decay. E. J.

Musical Chat-Chat.

Thus humorizes the Philadelphia Evening Bulletin about—start not, ladies—General MARIO! "The last canard of the European press is the story that Signor Mario, who enjoys the dignity of a Sardinian noble and rejoices in the title of the Count of Candia, is disposed to join the Sardinian army destined for the Crimea. The story is soberly copied by American papers, and there are probably people that believe the gentle little tenor singer is really grown patriotic and belligerent; that "his voice is for war," and that he is in earnest when he sings "sul campo della gloria." Well, it may be so, and Signor Mario may be disposed to abandon the luxurious life of a primo tenore, the charms of Garsia's society, the applause of "fair women and brave men," and the adoration of the enthusiastic Courts, for the chance of glory and a grave in the Crimea. If so, the world will have to lament the spoiling of a good singer to make a bad soldier; for Signor Mario will find the bonâ fide soldier's life in the field very different from the sham soldier's life of the opera. The little squad of thirty or forty basses and tenors that make a grand army on the stage, is a much more manageable force than a division in the field, and the best martial air with which the prince of tenors ever rallied his forces in an opera, would be of little avail in the trenches of Sebastopol. What will the world do if Mario does really get an attack of the military fever and does really go to the Crimea? How will the fashionable world ever endure the abrupt and total cessation of his charming "spinto gentil," or, as he preferred to sing it, "angiol d'amor"? How much fashionable prospective happiness will be ruined, if the gay circles of Paris and London are never more to hear his "il mio tesoro," his "una furtiva lagrima" and his "io pur sentii le placide!" What will Grisi do, if the partner of her loves, dramatic and real, should rush madly to the fight? Final, and most agonizing query—what will poor Coutts do? We see no help for this charming lady but an immediate enlistment, in male apparel, in the Sardinian contingent, or a purchase of a choice loop-hole in the fortification of Sebastopol, from whence, with a hundred-horse power opera glass, she may inspect the movements of General Mario."

ALFRED JAEHL's accident, we are glad to see, was not serious. He has recovered his prestidigitation sufficiently to play in Paris, as we learn by the exquisitely rose-bordered card which we have just received, containing the programme of his concert in the Salle Sax, on the 13th of March. He was assisted by the violinist HERMANN, with whom he played the "Kreutzer" Sonata, and the singer Mme. ANNA BERTINI. Jaell also played a Serenade by Rubinstein, a Fugue by Bach, his own Reminiscences of Wagner's operas, Fantasia on Norma, &c., &c. The ecstasies of the Parisian critics about Jaell are quite amusing; who shall say that the sublime art of eulogistics, commonly supposed to be peculiar to our Yankee newspapers, has reached its acme here? Listen! Thus saith La France Musicale, from which we translate skippingly: "Another brilliant pianist: let us applaud anew; his name is ALFRED JAEHL, and he comes to us right straight from America, where he has conquered une grande illustration."—"Figure to yourselves fingers of steel, which become at times fingers of velvet, something by turns thundering and unctuous (foudroyant et d'onctueux) (!); a rapidity to give one the vertigo, a sweetness to ravish the angels!" "These pianists, they are all astonishing! If M. Jaell were only a powerful mechanician, we should admire him only moderately; but he composes, he writes for his instrument a music brilliant and original." "Seated at the piano, in the attitude of master Wolfram, the pianist beholds gardens sown with stars quick with inspiration, those beautiful gardens where, according to the divine expression of the poet, spirits linger. Then archangels clothed in white combine the chords and direct the artist's hands. Would he write fantastical music? Myriads of diablotins appear, who, poised upon the desk, turn over the pages, dance sarabands upon the blazing pedal rods, while imperceptible gnomes move the pedals." Bravo! Monsieur GIACOMELLI! But the article has also solid praise for Jaell: "He showed an equal familiarity with all styles." "In his Wagner reminiscences, one observed, besides an execution of rare power, a habit of harmonic progressions, a science of assimilation and development by no means common with virtuoso composers." "His Au bord du Mississippi is a page of the best colored and full of poetry." The Sonata of Beethoven was "admirably executed," &c. And the critic pleads for a second and a third concert. Succès oblige.

The masked balls of the Grand Opera in Paris promise this year to be unusually brilliant, the musical direction of them being confided to the well known ability of STRAUSS. The orchestra which he is to direct is to be composed of not less than 200 musicians, distributed in the following manner: 40 first violins, 30 second violins, 20 altos, 12 violoncellos, 30 basses, 10 clarinets, 6 flutes, 4 hautbois, 4 bassoons, 12 cornets à pistons, 6 trumpets, 12 trombones, 6 ophycleids, 1 cymbals, 1 big drum, 2 ordinary drums, and 4 harps. The first ball was to take place on the 23d, and to open at ten o'clock in place of midnight, to enable the orchestra to play for the first time in public the various novelties which compose Strauss's album, such as "Teresa," the "Cascade," the "Diable au Bal," the "Schottisch of the Guides," "Miss Lucy," "Mathilde," and other pieces. After the concert the theatre was to be delivered up in the usual manner to the votaries of the dance.

Galignani says: There has been a contest at the Opera in Lisbon between Mmes. CASTELLAN and ALBONI, as to which should sing the part of Amina in La Sonnambula. The latter lady carried the day with the director, but the public quiz the performance very much as supremely ridiculous, from the unfitness of the artiste for the part from her increasing obesity. The engagement of Alboni, who receives an exorbitant salary, is described as a complete failure, and the manager almost ruined.

Miss JULIANA MAY, of Virginia, (a niece, it is said, of Joseph Gales, the editor of the National Intelligencer), who has been studying for some years in Italy, made her debut at Verona, on the 17th of February, in Verdi's Rigoletto. The Italian journals, from which our friend Willis translates in his Musical World, pronounce it a success and predict for her a distinguished career.—This reminds us of what a friend wrote us about the young American tenor, Mr. SQUIRES, a glowing report of whose appearance in Italy we copied some weeks since: He was born in Bennington, Vermont, in 1828. After trying various kinds of business for his friends' sake, his love for music finally got its way, in spite of the general aversion to the life of a singer. His voice, says our friend, is a pure, fresh tenor of the MARIO quality, and he can make a chest tone like a silver trumpet up to B natural above the staff. He has naturally taste and expression, loves all that is beautiful, is well educated, and—what is not a bad thing for a tenor—he is handsome. He tried to learn to sing some six years since in Boston, but with poor advantages. Afterwards he sang for two years in St. Paul's church at Albany, during which time he concertized with Mr. and Mrs. VINCENT WALLACE, as far West as Chicago, and sang in Mrs. BOSTWICK's Soirees in New York, and always with a warm reception. The late JONAS CHICKERING was one of the first to recognize the rare promise of his voice, and to speed him on his way to Italy two years ago.

The Stabat Mater is announced to be performed in Philadelphia, under the direction of Professors THUNDER and ROHR. Thunder and roar! Do you hear that, O Jullien?—Mme. BOSIO is engaged at a high figure to sing in St. Petersburg, while TEDESCO, just returned thence, is more than ever praised by the Parisians.

The health of ROBERT SCHUMANN is still precarious. CLARA SCHUMANN has written a letter to WILLIAM STERNDALE BENNETT, whose guest she was to have been, stating that she must therefore renounce her proposed visit to England this season.—The classical pianist, CHARLES HALLE, met lately with a severe accident in Manchester, by a door closing suddenly on one of his fingers. It was at first feared that amputation would be necessary, but it is now hoped that he will be able to play at one of ELLA's two remaining "Winter Evenings."

The London Athenæum may well marvel at the titles of our Yankee books of Psalmody; especially the latest, "The Young Shawm." We are not aware if it be yet settled what sort of a monster a full-grown Shawm is or was. Enough, we suppose, that it belongs to the musical Saurians and Megalotheria of biblical antiquity.

CONCERTS.

I. BENEFIT TO JOHN P. GROVES.—We entered the Music Hall last Saturday evening, only to see again the usual fate of concert-giving this year in our once so music-loving city. There was a remarkably good concert, and a remarkably thin house. We only hope that that scattered handful of people did not represent all the benefit that was realized in sales of tickets, and that the young native violinist, who proved his talent and devotion so unmistakably that evening, will not want for the means to cultivate his art abroad. If the concert answered that end, we will not complain. But it was really a good concert, and we were sorry that we too had to lose the larger portion of the programme.

The orchestra was excellent, composed of over forty instruments, essentially the same that compose the Musical Fund orchestra, and under the baton of Mr. ECKHARDT it told admirably in the accompaniments. We did not hear the best orchestral pieces, the overtures to Fidelio and William Tell; but in what we did hear we were struck by the euphonious ensemble and the marks of thorough drill and leadership. Mr. MILLARD sang the opening tenor cavatina from Ernani with fresh, elastic voice, and great ease, finish and expression; and Rossini's Mira la bianca luna, by Mrs. WENTWORTH and Mr. MILLARD, was one of the sweetest and purest pieces of duet singing that we have heard in the concert room for many a day. It was neatly and sympathetically accompanied, too, on the piano, by young Mr. LANG of Salem.

But what pleased us most, what gave us the newest sensation, was the Quartet for French horns, composed by Mr. ECKHARDT, and played by Messrs. HAMANN, FRIES, ECKHARDT and KLUGE. In the execution we do not remember anything of the kind so true, so flowing, so luscious in the blending of the tones. In the soft passages the quadruple stream of harmony flowed as smoothly as from organ pipes. The genius of the instrument was nowhere perverted, by attempting a kind of solo virtuosity out of its own sphere, and yet there was all the light and shade, the free melodious movement of a quartet of voices. The composition was not only perfectly adapted to the instruments, but interesting in itself, and solid. Throughout a considerable length of contrapuntal movement, imitation, &c., it charmed the listener along with it. We congratulate the author on producing something so much more felicitous than the usual attempts at ingenious novelties of this sort.

Master GROVES himself played two solos, one on the violin, by DAVID, and one on the viola, by Eckhardt. The first alone we heard. It was after the usual type of solos, an introduction, a melody, with variations in major and in minor, and all sorts; cantabile adagio, and bravura close; enough to show that he has attained to no small mastery already of the requirements of a modern virtuoso, that he has a very fair idea of style, and that his intonation is remarkably true. His appearance too was modest, and all went to show that he was well entitled to the opportunities he seeks, of a more advanced artistic culture among the orchestras and masters, and in the musical atmosphere of Germany.

II. MR. SATTER'S SECOND CONCERT.—

Again an admirable concert and a miserable audience—so far as numbers were concerned.—There is no accounting for the shyness sometimes, even to the most liberal and honest solicitations, of this same musical taste of Boston. An artist of the decided stamp of Mr. Satter, who gives you programmes of the rarest and the richest order, who has not only the skill but the will to interpret to you out of all the choicest treasures new and old of piano-forte composition, from BEETHOVEN to LISZT, comes here and plays in that delightful Chickering Saloon, where all who go are sure to be good listeners; and furthermore he gives us the fresh maiden voice and charming talent of a singer like Miss LOUISE HENSLE, and yet the room is hardly half full! We cannot help thinking it a reproach to Boston, when the dollars leaped so readily and so repeatedly from pockets as long as the opera lasted, and when for dancing "light brigades" it is thought a pretty thing to lose the dollars and the night's rest and the bloom upon the cheeks besides.—But those who did go Tuesday evening felt themselves decidedly the gainers.

The bill of fare, as at the first concert, was remarkable, perhaps a little too much so to excite the uninitiated palate. Four out of the seven pieces played by Mr. Satter, were orchestral compositions transcribed for piano. We have long heard of the wonderful talent LISZT has for this transferring of a symphony or overture, with all its parts, upon the key-board of the single instrument. His most famous exploit in that line was his last, the arrangement, which we noticed some time since at length, of the Ninth Symphony for two pianos. The Pastorale, the "Tell" overture, &c., were earlier efforts, and for two hands only. Of course only a Liszt could do these things; the arrangements must have grown in the act of playing them; they must have been played first, before they could be written; for it was only to Liszt's unprecedented facility of execution that such arrangements could occur as possible. Of course, too, only a very few pianists have learned to execute them when written, and these have had to learn the secret and the style thereof from Liszt himself. Mr. Satter, young as he is, is one of them. He proved it in his first piece, the overture to "William Tell." We could not before have imagined so much of the orchestral breadth and coloring and contrast to be representable upon the piano. The opening violoncelli strains preserved their identity to a singular degree, under his expressive touch; while the piano, the last from the Chickering manufactory, and less powerfully brilliant than the one played last week, had a sympathetic, soulful quality of tone, well suited to the moist, lake-like atmosphere, and tranquil picturing of all the first half of the overture. The effects were brought out with beautiful distinctness and freshness; the storm, too, (notwithstanding that friend FRY calls it "as bad a botch, in the way of description, as the storm in Beethoven's Pastorale,") was made grandly imposing, and the flute-like Alpine echoes on the clearing up were deliciously clear. Nothing could exceed the crispness, the vivacity and energy of the quick-step movement, and the violin-like vividness and boldness of the florid figures at the end. Greater strength, or greater delicacy we have not heard from any pianist—and perfect neatness, certainty and clearness through the whole.

No. 2 consisted of three smaller pieces: a very sweet, expressive little Pastorale (not the symphony,) by whom composed we know not; an arioso transcribed from the Prophète, by KULLAK, which did not interest us much; and another Minuet (of his own arrangement) from a MOZART Symphony, the well-known one in G minor. This is not like the equable and flowing Minuet he played before, but more bold and impetuous, though the Trio in the major is charmingly naive and pastoral. We like these little tit-bits, reminders of the great works, flung in sometimes thus incidentally, when they are so complete in themselves and played to such perfection.

The artist's rendering of the BEETHOVEN Sonata in D minor, op. 29, one of the "Tempest" Sonatas, and companion piece, as we have said, to the Sonata appassionata, pleased us even more than his rendering of that. It was free from extravagancies; it was a conscientious, finished, and poetic rendering of an exquisite musical poem. How expressively those little recitative sentences sang themselves in the first movement! one might fancy Miranda's voice. The Adagio was played with true feeling; and the "airy fairy" Ariel-like gracefulness, crossed ever and anon with passionate humors, of the Rondo finale was as nicely conveyed as we should think it possible for human fingers. Were we to confess any want, it would be perhaps here, as in all of Mr. Satter's playing, of more of a gradual crescendo instead of so much positive fortissimo in the strong passages. It is very, very seldom that we listen in a concert room to a Beethoven Sonata with such real satisfaction.

The overture to "Oberon," Mr. Satter's own arrangement, was also remarkable as recalling so much of the magical coloring of the original instrumentation in the first half, although it seemed to us less clear and satisfactory in the stronger portions than the "Tell." But the triumph of the evening, as showing the union of astounding virtuosity with the poetic conception and reproduction of one of the loveliest tone-creations ever written for the orchestra, was the young artist's playing of Liszt's arrangement of "the Pastoral Symphony" for two hands. It certainly was wonderful both on the part of arranger and performer. Not a note of any of the twenty instruments seemed wanting anywhere; it was all there, obediently answering to the touch of the ten fingers. And so much of the charm of Beethoven's music, here as everywhere, is intrinsic, residing in the musical thought itself, that when the notes were as faithfully and appreciatively touched as they were here, when to such unlimited, easy mechanical grasp of all its contents there was added such power on the part of the interpreter of entering into the spirit of the music, we really heard the Symphony and felt it all come home to us in a very enjoyable manner:

always understanding of course that the reminiscence thus awakened of the orchestra is one great element in the charm. The two first movements came out as warm and fresh and summer-like, as one could wish. Neither atmosphere, nor light and shade, nor breezy motion, nor any of the thousand little exquisite effects were wanting. The dance of the peasants had the weight of an orchestral unisono; and the storm was wild and grand and vivid, as it might have risen in the composer's mind; the strength of Mr. Satter's playing here was prodigious; he certainly made no "botch" in playing it, whatever Beethoven did in writing it. Of course it is not safe from simple hearing to declare that Liszt has neither added nor omitted aught; but the general impression was true to our best abiding impression of the Symphony. Once only, near the beginning of the first Allegro, we thought there was a bright dash of the piccolo too much, something that seemed fitter for the thunder and lightning passage than for this quiet scene. It may have been our fancy.

Miss HENSLE sang charmingly. Her first piece was the Una voce, from "the Barber," which was given with not quite all her verve and free abandonment, but yet with admirable style and a rare felicity in the execution of some of the ornamental points. In the second part she sang an air from Beatrice di Tenda, of a more sustained, dramatic pathos, dealing largely in long high tones, which she held out with a pure and silvery voice of ravishing sweetness. It was encored with great enthusiasm.

RICHARD WAGNER IN LONDON.—The man of the "Music of the Future" has actually appeared and "waved his bâton," in the very centre of the conservative citadel of the Past, in the old Philharmonic concerts of London. Greeted with ribald jeers so long, and at length bidden to their feast, the bugbear came and stood among them, not so much a man of marble, as a man of fire, and great was the dismay and general the dance among the critics. A cenar teco m'invitasti, &c. And how liked they the supper to which they found themselves invited in return? We shall see. We quote from the reports of some of the more eminent survivors. The concert took place on the 12th of March. We will first cite our amusing and original contemporary, the London Musical World, which gives two articles, first an editorial ode or rhapsody, in the following, luminous, dignified, calm manner:

The die is cast. Richard has waved his bâton in Hanover-square. The "Seven Wise Men" are in ecstasies. A beat "up" (the only beat) is substituted for a beat "down" (a silly beat). Michael Costa is quenched. The "great Tritto" is ignored. The new prophet is the only prophet. Liszt was right.

"Liszt!—Liszt!—O Liszt!"

Strange readings were enforced, and sforzandi yet more vigorous (we had thought that impossible); while the last pages of the Hebrides went faster than probable, and made noise enough to drown the waters that grumble and wail and rush and roar, in the darkness of Fingal's Cave. The slow chords in the second part of the Zauberflöte were reiterated. A flat found its way back into the Eroica. The "Child" (Mozart), the "Erroneous" (Beethoven), the "Stupid" (Spohr), the "Old Wife" (Haydn), and the "Jew" (Mendelssohn), were beaten, as they never were before, in the Philharmonic Temple. The members of the band were as demons, and shook and trembled with enthusiasm. Shapes like unto those which delirium paints upon darkness were flitting and grinning ghastly in the orchestra. The new prophet, &c.

"List!—list!—O Lis(z)!"

The star of Richard shone as a moon in the heavens. The new Prophet was the only prophet. Praeger was there, with "the books" in his mind's coat pocket. He wore a Mackintosh and Fez. The "Reactionary" stood still, as the sun at the word of Joshua. A new king had arisen that knew not Michael; and Michael was forgotten by the fiddlers, the quidnuncs, and the Aristarchi. "It was a glorious victory." Nothing lacked but the statue of William Pitt, which, had the Director sent it a reserved place, with a copy of Lohengrin, would doubtless have stalked from its pedestal in the square down to the very concert room—like the stony Commandant at Don Giovanni's supper, scaring away the Philharmonic Leporello—for William hated Jews, and would have exulted in Richard, who crucified Felix and Giacomo. There is but one Wagner, and Richard is his prophet! There is but one Richard and Wagner is his scribe. The ENTELECHIA of harmony, "he is,"—as Aristotle says, &c. &c.

And then a regular concert criticism, as follows:

Herr Wagner was received most courteously. He is a short spare man, with an eager look and a capacious forehead. He conducts with great vivacity, and beats "up" and "down" indiscriminately. At least we could not, with the best intentions, distinguish his "ups" from his "downs;" and if the members of the band are down to his "ups" and up to his "downs" by the end of the season, we shall be ready to present each of them with a quill tooth-pick, as a forfeit for our own lack of discernment. The Haydn symphony—a glorious old lady—went with immense dash—dash is the word. Of delicacy we observed no sign; while the sforzandi were intenser than even under the despotic stick of Mr. Costa. So many quickenings and slackenings of tempo we never heard in a Haydn symphony before. Perhaps it is in "the books," however, and was all right. As for Mendelssohn's overture, that magnificent Jewish inspiration—(fancy a Jew who could grope about Fingal's Cave, and give such a splendidly poetical account of his impressions!) was taken slower than necessary at the beginning, and faster than possible at the end. It was rather a "zig-zag" sort of performance, but wonderfully vigorous and animated. The pianos (we do not expect pianissimos) were disregarded from one end to the other; and this was felt to be especially disadvantageous at the beginning of the two grand crescendos, in the middle and in the coda of the overture. Perhaps Herr Wagner maintains that the music of Jews should always be as monotonous as the "Clo'-clo'-clo'!" which agonized the poet in the streets.

As for the Eroica, that was all "sixes and sevens"—now firm, now "shaky," now overpoweringly grand, now threatening to tumble to pieces. To us it was most unsatisfactory. To others it was evidently otherwise, since they praised it loudly. When the beat is understood, however, by the end of the season, it will be a very different thing; but then the concerts are over. What of that? There is next season—1856; and is not Herr Wagner a conductor, as well as a composer, for "the future?" The glorious overture of that divine "child" with the long name—WOLFGANG AMADEUS THEOPHILUS CHRYSOSTOM (etc.) MOZART (who will soon be teaching the "Future" to look back longingly to the "Past"—or we are much mistaken), went, as we thought, better than anything else. The long chords of B flat, that usher in the incomparable second part, with such pomp and ceremony, were reiterated (not sustained), according to the Weimar fashion. About this we have nothing to say.

Altogether our impression of Herr Wagner, as a conductor, is confused. By and by, we shall better be able to give something like a decided opinion; at present we are tongue-tied.

Tongue-tied! We should think so after all that, and from sheer fatigue of the unruly member.

The Athenaeum is short and acrid:

Nothing could be stranger than the performance. The violins were rarely together. The pauses in Haydn's Andante were very long pauses, and every forte was a fortissimo. Mendelssohn's overture was hurried and muddled, without ease or undulation,—and Beethoven's Symphony was a fatiguing piece of exaggeration, stuck full of fierce sforzandi and ill-measured rallentandi. . . . Was it worth while to affront the profession in London, and to send a deputation to Zurich for no better result than this? Spirit Herr Wagner indubitably possesses,—but of his sense as a reader of great compositions by great masters, Monday's concert gives us a poor opinion: and it remains to be seen how far his fits and starts will be able to impress our orchestra, should he be intrusted with the production of any unfamiliar music.

So much for one side of the question. And now for the other. The Times (DAVIDSON,) still abuses the composer, but admits that "there was quite enough in the execution of the symphonies and overtures to show that Herr Wagner is a man of intelligence and firmness, an original and perhaps an intellectual thinker." The N. Y. Musical Gazette has the following letter from a London correspondent, which evidently represents the opinion of not a few:

The audience rose almost en masse to see the man first, and whispers ran from one to another; "He is a small man, but what a beautiful and intelligent forehead he has!" Haydn's symphony, No. 7, (Grand,) began the concert, and opened the eyes of the audience to a state of things hitherto unknown as regards conducting. Wagner does not beat in the old-fashioned, metronomic-automaton manner; he leaves off beating at times—then resumes again—to lead the orchestra up to a climax, or to let them soften down to a pianissimo, as if a thousand invisible threads tied them to his bâton. His is the beau idéal of conducting; he treats the orchestra like the instrument on which he pours forth his soul-inspired strains. Haydn's well-known symphony seemed a new work through his inexpressibly intelligent and poetical conception. Beethoven's Eroica, the first movement of which used to be taken always with narcotic slowness by previous conductors, and in return the funeral march always much too fast, so as to rob it of all the magnificent gran dolore: the scherzo, which always came out clumsily and heavily; and the finale, which never was understood—Beethoven's Eroica may be said to have been heard for the first time here, and produced a wonderful effect. As if to beat the Mendelssohnian hypercritics on their own field, Wagner gave a reading of Mendelssohn's Isles of Fingal that would have delighted the composer himself; and even the overture of Die Zauberflöte (magic flute) was invested with something not noticed before. Let it be well understood that Wagner takes no liberties with the works of the great; but his poetico-musical genius gives him, as it were, a second sight into their hidden treasures; his worship for them, and his intense study, are amply proved by his conducting them all without the score, and the musicians of the orchestra, so lately bound to Costa's reign, already adore Wagner, who, notwithstanding his republican politics, is decidedly a despot with the orchestra. In short, Wagner has conquered, and an important influence on musical progress may be predicted for him. The next concert will bring us the ninth symphony and a selection from Lohengrin, which the directors would insist on, notwithstanding the refusal of the composer. . . . The Past agrees perfectly with us.

THE MENDELSSOHN CHORAL SOCIETY give a concert to-night on a novel plan. It is mostly instrumental and is given in compliment to the Ladies of the Society. The orchestra of 42 members, under Mr. ECKHARDT, will play BEETHOVEN'S Seventh Symphony, which we have had no chance to hear before this winter, although we have had all the others save the Ninth:—also the Masaniello overture for a finale. Mr. GROVES plays a viola, and Mr. KLAESER a cornet Solo; and that horn quartet of Mr. ECKHARDT's will be played again. Miss BOTHAMLY, Miss TWICHELL, Mr. WETHERBEE, and others will contribute vocally. We hope the Music Hall will be crowded.

Next Saturday (21st) is fixed for the Benefit Concert of the MUSICAL FUND SOCIETY, and we trust the real friends of music will not grudge the spending of a little time during the intervening week in interesting their neighbors to attend. Let Boston at least show a tardy justice this time, and see to it that this concert shall redeem the losing winter of the Fund Society.

Mr. BATTEN will play the grand B flat Concerto of BEETHOVEN. The orchestra is excellent and will give, besides, the first Finale from Don Giovanni, a new overture by Mr. PARKER, the Semiramide overture, and some Mendelssohn two-part songs arranged. Distinguished vocal talent also is engaged.

The lovers of great Sacred Music may hear HAYDN'S Mass in D, and other good selections, well performed by Mr. BRUCE'S Choir, with Mr. WILCOX accompanying on that noble Tremont Temple Organ, on Thursday evening next.

NEW AESTHETIC JOURNAL. THE CRAYON,

A Weekly Paper devoted to ART, offers itself to the attention of all who are interested in the elevating and refining influences of Beauty. Among the contributors to THE CRAYON already are BRYANT, LOWELL, STREET, REMBRANDT PEALE, A. B. DURAND, President of the National Academy of Design, DANIEL HUNTINGTON, HENRY K. BROWN, and amongst those engaged are LONGFELLOW, BAYARD TAYLOR, GEO. WM. CURTIS, REV. H. W. BRONNER, REV. SAMUEL OSGOOD, REV. H. W. BELLows, Hon. CHARLES SUMNER, and others of our most eminent writers. A series of papers by RUSKIN, and essays left by the eminent sculptor, HORATIO GREENOUGH, add to the interest of The Crayon.

From the Christian Inquirer.

The first five numbers of this promising (and thus far performing) paper are now out. We look for its weekly issue with high and never disappointed expectation. Its leaders are led in a double sense—weighty with thought as well as with typographical distinctness. They carry metal. We are much impressed with the seriousness and instructive aim of the editorial columns. Manifestly it is not to tickle the ear or please the fancy, but to enlighten the mind and improve the taste, that the leading article always aims. The writer has a real, well-considered, distinct, and decisive thought to convey to his readers' minds, and he goes about it patiently, unambitiously, and earnestly, and succeeds not in winning our admiration—a poor victory—but in leaving us wiser than he found us.

The Crayon has, we hope, a special mission—to purge and soberize the style of our Journalism, as well as the taste of our people in general. The heated, gaseous, and scintillating style of our public press is becoming intolerable. The Crayon uses a cool, quiet and unobtrusive style, which is truly refreshing.

From the Cincinnati Gazette.

We have already strongly recommended THE CRAYON, and every succeeding number proves it to be more and more worthy of all we have said in its praise. No Journal, devoted to Art, has ever been so ably conducted; in this country; and if it meets with the support it so richly deserves, we have no doubt that it will exert a most wholesome influence upon the taste of the country.

W. J. PARKERSON,
NO. 3 LA GRANGE PLACE, BOSTON.

Having resided thirteen years in Europe with a view of adapting the Italian style of Singing to the English voice, and of remedying weakness of the voice, and thoroughly correcting harsh, guttural, nasal, or other unpleasant peculiarities, proposes to give lessons on the Voice, and in Singing, in the Italian, French, and English Languages.

Many who have spent years of severe study to attain musical excellence, after struggling to conquer some guttural, nasal, or other unpleasant mannerism, abandon the pursuit from the belief that they are afflicted with a natural defectiveness: when, with a fractional part of the application which they bestow on the other branches of their musical education, and with much less physical effort (if properly directed) than they have been accustomed to use, their voices might be rendered comparatively beautiful.

To singers of eminence he would say, with a just appreciation of their high attainments, that a brief practical examination of his system will convince the most sceptical, that he can afford them such assistance in beautifying the voice, as might delight the most fastidious.

"Being acquainted with the course of vocal discipline pursued by Mr. W. J. PARKERSON in forming and developing the voice, I take pleasure in bearing my testimony to its excellence; believing it to be far preferable to any other method known to me."

From the New York Daily Tribune.
There is no better musical critic in the country than John S. Dwight, of Boston, and few men are able to express what they have to say about music in a manner at once so poetic and precise. His articles are sure to please the learned in music, and to delight its lovers. We commend his Journal unreservedly to our musical friends as a work which will be an able running commentary upon musical events, extracting from each its significance, varying its critical notices of music and musicians, both new and old, with biographical and entertaining details; and always true to what is most interesting and commanding in this noblest of the Arts.

From the Boston Evening Transcript.
Wherever there is a piano-forte, this Journal ought to be lying on it.

From the Boston Atlas.
We need just such a paper. One which is subservient to no particular clique of book-makers, or society agents, or managerial interests. One which tells truly what is good and what is bad, in the honest convictions of the writer. Mr. Dwight unites more qualifications to hold the judge's chair than any other writer with whose powers we are acquainted. His genial warmth of feeling is united to an acute perception of the beauties of executional Art; while a long and earnest study of the great composers of the world has rendered him familiar with, and an appreciator of, their noble works.

Reminiscences of a Summer Tour.

FAITHFUL.—What shall we now found our discourse upon?
TALKATIVE.—What you will: I will talk of things heavenly, or things earthly; things serious or things ludicrous; things past or things to come; things foreign, or things at home—provided all be done to our profit.—Banyan.

MR. EDITOR:—As the season draws to its close, allow me, in the comparative dearth of legitimate musical criticism that may follow, to gossip, in a random way, of some incidents, partly musical, partly otherwise, that befel me during a brief tour in the Summer of 1853. I must premise that in these chapters, be they more or less, my discourse will of necessity be desultory—setting at defiance, for the most part, all chronological and logical sequence.

Says a distinguished writer: "To an American visiting Europe the brief voyage he has to make is an excellent preparative. In my own case suffice it to say, the passage across was after the manner of all voyages on the Atlantic in April, with the usual alternations of wind and calm, azure and cloud, storm and sunshine, and but little of incident to mark the leaden hours of each succeeding day.

To me, indeed, all external circumstances are the same upon the sea: a constant and abiding sense of utter wretchedness is my portion—seasickness my inevitable destiny, pervading all times and places—changing all romance into dullest reality, and merging even the semblance of enjoyment into positive suffering. I find it hard to believe that any landsman ever fully beguiled himself into the idea that he was enjoying his "life on the Ocean wave."

It was early on a Sunday morning when the cry of land was roared out from the deck of the fore-castle. I can imagine, faintly it may be, how that sound once thrilled through every timber of the first ship that came in sight of an unknown shore, in the merry days of old Christopher Columbus. All day long the low shores of Ireland floated past, so near that one could almost pitch a biscuit to the eager sons of Erin, seen here and there on its shelving banks. A red letter day was this to all. Seasickness at last had gone, and in its place came that most delightful sensation of relief and freedom that must needs be felt to be known.

On reaching Liverpool, I heard much of the approaching inauguration of the great Industrial Exhibition of Ireland, and this determined me to make the best of my way to Dublin at once.

I arrived there on the day preceding that of the opening. Every hotel was crowded; and, so I was told, was every nook and cranny besides, of the hospitable old city. I was turning away in despair from the steps of the Imperial Hotel, when the landlord enquired, rather abruptly, with a brogue, if I "might be an American," and, on my replying in the affirmative, assured me that his best room was at my service; "for," said he, "we have a yearning in our hearts towards your countrymen." I do not doubt his sincerity. It was confirmed a score of times, and in as many different instances, during my brief stay in Dublin.

I was fortunate in that the "Messiah" was announced to be performed that evening for the benefit of the Irish Academy of Music. It was given by the Ancient Concerts Society, so called, an association established in 1834, and having in view the same objects as our own Handel and Haydn. The occasion was one of more than ordinary interest for which especial preparation had been made. Yet the hall, a small one, was not filled.

The Oratorio was produced entire, by a select orchestra of forty-five performers, and a chorus numbering about one hundred and fifty. Of course, it was well done, but not better than I have heard it by our societies at home, on many a Christmas Eve. I speak of the vocal parts. The orchestration was such as to leave nothing to be desired. An organ of great power, managed in a masterly manner by Dr. STEWART, was as a tower of strength to the voices in the sublime choruses with which this oratorio abounds.

I was struck with the excellence of the room itself for music. This is such, I think, as to merit a particular description.

It is called the Ancient Concerts Room, and was constructed, so far as I could learn, at about the time of the formation of the society. Its size is small, being adapted for seating comfortably only about 1200 persons. The form of the apartment internally is very nearly that of two cubes as once suggested by Mr. Gardiner. Its walls are relieved, at intervals, by pilasters, and further broken by panels. A heavy cornice runs around the top of the room; springing from this is a coving which, at the height of ten feet, is joined to the flat ceiling above. The ceiling itself is intersected by deep panels and is finished in stucco. There are no corridors at the sides, and but two or three of small dimensions at each extremity. The floor is level. The seats are mere benches with wooden backs, innocent of cushions or upholstery of any kind. A light gallery extends around three sides of the room. The orchestral platform follows, in its plan, the same general arrangement as that of the Philharmonic Hall in Liverpool (of which I may give some account hereafter), but the seats for the chorus rise less abruptly. Back of the orchestra is an organ with power sufficient for a building of thrice the size.

The ventilating arrangements are ample and most excellent; the fresh air, previously warmed, enters through minute apertures in the risers of the steps, (which, I should have said, extend along the sides on the floor of the hall), and escapes through apertures in the ceiling. The artificial lighting is effected by means of chandeliers, suspended however some 15 feet only from the ceiling, so as not materially to interfere with vision or produce acoustic disturbance. There is in this hall, when filled, no echo, and no perceptible reverberation. The general disposition of the house for the seating of the audience is amphitheatrical, giving to the assembly, on this occasion, a most brilliant effect.

Apropos, in this connection, some one has remarked that the idea we form of Italian and Grecian beauty is never realized in Greece and Italy, but is found in Ireland, in the upper ranks, heightened and exceeded. I believe in this. Certainly I have seen no equal in face and form to those I saw among the higher classes in Dublin.

The inaugural ceremonies of the great Exhibition have been previously described in the pages of this Journal,* and need not be repeated here. The occasion was, indeed, one of paramount interest, and which warmly enlisted the sympathies of the whole country. It was a project designed to give fresh vigor and life to the drooping spirit of the nation. The press had labored incessantly in its behalf for many months. Every appeal to patriotic feeling had been made, and no effort spared to give it magnitude and importance in the eyes of the people. There were those who fondly saw in this event the dawning of a new life for Ireland, by awakening a national pride, and recalling popular attention to the industrial resources of the kingdom, and thus arresting the tide of immigration which has drained its population for so many years.

For myself, as an impartial looker-on, I could not so hopefully interpret the import of this great event. It seemed to me rather the last struggle of a noble-hearted but doomed race. The glory of it is illusive. It is as the red glare at evening, which foretells the blackness of the storm that shall brood over the night.

The day dawned in cloudless beauty. The streets of the town were alive with the eager multitude. At an early hour every seat and standing place of the vast structure was occupied. Here was brought together, in closest contact, the rank and aristocracy of three realms. The high-born beauty of England, Scotland and Ireland was largely represented. There was a marked earnestness upon the faces of all—enthusiasm even—which showed how deeply their feelings were enlisted. But it was not the earnestness of hope, nor a joyous enthusiasm. In spite of all the pomp and pageantry of the occasion, a shadow sat unmistakably upon the vast assemblage. And when, at the close of the ceremonial, the superb band of a thousand voices and instruments joined in the national anthem, pouring its magnificent music into the ears of twenty thousand listeners, filling the huge building with a sea of sound, there went up a response from heavy hearts. It was the wail of an unhappy people.

Robert Schumann.

(From SOBOLLEWSKI'S "Reactionary Letters.")*

Napoleon said that it was more useful to know one man than 49,000 plants. We are of the same opinion, particularly when such an ordinary-social, beer-drinking individual is possessed of such extraordinary genius as ROBERT SCHUMANN.

Although the outward appearance of a composer ought not to interest us, but only his inward mind, the element with which his works render us acquainted, we are still very fond of studying his bodily form, in order to see whether it is a counterpart of his soul.

Unfortunately Nature does not often make a perfect man, like GOETHE. The outward appearance of the good MOZART did not correspond with the mind within; neither does ROBERT SCHUMANN'S.

Robert Schumann is a common-place, well-fed, bullet-headed individual; the bridge of his nose does not give evidence of the slightest grain of poetry, neither do his eyes flash with heavenly fire. His complexion is not at all tinged with disgust for the world; and his hair does not, like BEETHOVEN'S, stream in the wind, but lies quietly on his forehead, which is not more than usually lofty.

He looks so calm and sober, and yet has been so drunk with love! He appears reserved, and, like most men who have always a thing to do, avoids those who have always one to say, and yet he can gossip so delightfully, at one time like FLORESTAN, and at another like EUSEBIUS, according as his heart is at high or low water mark. Like claret, he is only palatable when a little warm. Arrogance has not filled his head and emptied his heart. He is proud, but not in mind—for a proud mind is always a small mind—his soul alone is proud, and a proud soul is a great soul.

For me, he is an amiable man and a very distinguished artist. After Beethoven, no one has composed a symphony like Schumann. After SEBASTIAN BACH, no German composer has ever succeeded in jotting down, with such nonchalance, * Reactionary Letters, by E. Sobolewski, collected and reprinted from the Ostpreussische Zeitung, and translated in the London Musical World. These letters were written apparently to stay the tide of Wagnerism in Germany, but in their rambling gossip contain many things quite favorable to Wagner and the new men.

the most wonderful melodic and harmonic combinations, in the form of canons, as Schumann has done in his Stücke für Pedalclavier.

Some of his songs are most charming, but his pianoforte music ranks higher.

The first pianoforte compositions by which Schumann attracted attention was his "Carnival, Scènes Mignonnes, on four notes," Op. 19. It is a varied series of characteristic pieces, in which Harlequin, Columbine, and Pierrot, Florestan and Eusebius, the Philistine and the members of the David league, Chopin and others, appear with all their nationality and peculiarities. Each piece is more charming than the one before it, and each begins with the four notes—a, e flat (es), c, h.

The reader will enquire what those four notes mean. They were intended to represent a town of Saxony called Asch, whither Schumann's thoughts frequently strayed, because at that time there was an object there which interested his sensitive soul.

Now, it is satisfactorily demonstrated that a most excellent method of overcoming a seemingly invincible passion is to write verses or music on it. The trouble of finding the rhyme and studying the sound, the fact of being amiable, on four notes, in the most widely different dispositions of mind, disturbs the one fixed idea. A mental crisis is thus produced—until another passion supervenes; and, unfortunately, poets and musicians have, and must have, a superfluous amount of passion—for it is a lucky thing for them that their blood contains more component parts of iron than of gold.

The second of Schumann's pieces which produced a sensation was his "Grand Sonata," Op. 11. It is difficult to play, and must be well studied, if the performer would bring out the effects it contains. It appeared under the title of "Florestan and Eusebius."

Florestan and Eusebius are the two highly poetical natures of which Schumann consists. Wonderful articles appeared under their name in the Leipziger Musikalische Zeitung, when R. Schumann edited it. The sonnet itself depicts the contest of the members of the David league (co-editors of the Neue Leipziger Zeitung) with the Philistines of the old Musikalische Zeitung of that day under Fink.

Some one has said: "When I hear Schumann, it seems to me as if I were floating on the sea." There is a great deal of truth in this sentiment. It is one of those which I like to hear from the uninitiated.

There is, however, a great difference between pronouncing a criticism on a work of art, and describing the impression it produces at the moment.

The latter every one has a right to do, but criticism must prove why this is good and that bad. Now-a-days, mere talk will no longer pass current. What reasonable being will feel offended that the continual repetition, in Wagner's Lohengrin, of "Heil deiner Fahrt, Heil deiner Ahrt"—that instances of false declamation and intonation, which are always quoted; and that transitions which tear one's ears to pieces, like that in the finale, with the chord f, a, c, e flat, g, are blamed, if, at the same time, every thing good is praised. Only weak-minded persons are clouded sufficiently in their minds to find everything perfection. LISZT and RAFF do not belong to this class, but are entirely of our opinion, and the little work RAFF has promised will bear us out in our assertion.

The torch of criticism should not burn but simply light, and the hand which has grasped it, in order to involve in a destructive conflagration everything with the exception of one single object, should be rapped until it lets fall the torch it is not worthy to bear.

The sonata, Op. 11, is a battle-piece, and its composer stood in the foremost ranks of the combatants, and spoke well both in words and tones. "Kunst kommt her von Können." (The word Kunst is derived from Können), such was Schumann's motto and that was the sonnet. We think at the present time as we thought as members of the David-league; away, then, with what is bad in Wagner, with what is bad in Meyerbeer and Schumann; with what is bad in ourselves. We will never attach any value to the fact that Dunst (fog, vapor), rhymes with Kunst (art). The fog has been dissipated by the sun, and, although the atmosphere may still be a little hazy, it will soon clear up. A great deal of Wagner's works will live, but a great deal more of Schumann's.

In Op. 12 ("Phantasiestück") we again find R. Schumann wounded in the heart. We particularly recommend the "Carnival" and this piece, for they were composed in the sacred moments of inspiration.

In the "Carnival" the patient is sufficiently recovered to indulge in humor, but in the "Phantasiestück" we find the pure platonic attachment to a pupil of Tag, a fair pianist whom we then knew and whose talents we acknowledged. These pieces are dedicated to her, and she herself used to speak with pride of having excited the admiration of such an artist as Schumann.

But, as we know, men, like children, are sent to sleep by song, and Schumann sang himself to sleep and awoke as a child; he composed his wonderful "Kinderscenen" (Op. 15), rode his hobby horse, felt frightened at Ruprecht, and again sang himself to sleep with a lovely "Wiegenlied." These little compositions, when delicately and prettily played, as Reinecke could play them, waft even ourselves into the fairy realms of childhood, and call up such home-sick longings that we would willingly return to the time when everything was so beautiful.

Schumann awakes us with a grand idea, namely: to contribute something towards the monument to be erected to Beethoven.

Ten years previously Beethoven almost died of starvation, but at the period in question collections were made for his monument.

Such is the fate of German composers. People allow them to starve during their lifetime, in order to be enabled to give more towards their monuments, while French composers live in palaces, possess large incomes, and smile at our passion for erecting monuments.

Schumann's contribution consisted of Op. 17. He at first intended giving it the name of "Obolus" (a small Greek coin), but it eventually appeared under the title of "Fantaisie in C."

It is a wonderful work, full of deep feeling, and admirably in keeping with the feelings of a great man who knows how to bear his misfortunes.

Popular Songs.

Andrew Fletcher of Saltoun, in one of his political essays, uttered the famous saying that has since become almost a proverb: "Let me make the songs of a nation and I care not who makes its laws." Every day shows that there was a good deal of truth in the saying, and every author of popular songs, that have real life in them, deserves notice. The London Illustrated News speaks thus of the songs of DR. CHARLES MACKAY.

Mackay is, in England, what Béranger has been, a little before him, in France—the chansonnier par excellence, the song-writer of the time. He speaks to the people in a language familiar to them, but purified and refined; he echoes their feelings, exalting and embellishing every thought, every sentiment that is good, and beautiful, and noble. He cherishes the sweetest and holiest affections of domestic life, and the free and manly aspirations of the citizen, the patriot, and the lover of mankind. Hence it is that the verses of Mackay, though only of yesterday, have already become household words in the mouths of the people of England, as if they had descended by long tradition from a distant age. Versatility, too, is a feature of his genius. He has the rough energy of Ebenezer Elliot: while he has also, if not the voluptuous epicurism, the airy grace of Thomas Moore.

Like Moore also, Mackay is a musician; and we believe that no poet who was not in some degree a musician, has ever written a good song. Henry Carey, Dibdin, Burns, Moore, wrote real songs, because their lines, in the act of formation, were associated with beautiful melodies; while the so-called songs of Scott, Campbell, and numberless other poets, are not songs at all; they are read with pleasure and only spoiled by singing, because their authors produced them without any musical associations. Mackay, in his song-writing, has always shown a delicate perception of melody; but it is only now that he has evinced the power of creating melody.

GLEE FOR THREE VOICES.

What joy attends the fisher's life!

Blow, winds, blow!

The fisher and his faithful wife;

He drives no plough on stubborn land,

His fields are ready to his hand;

No nipping frosts his orchards fear,

He has his autumn all the year:

Yeo! heave, ho!

The husbandman has rent to pay,

Blow, winds, blow!

And seed to purchase every day,

But he who farms the rolling deeps,

Though never sowing, always reaps;

The ocean fields are fair and free,

There are no rent-days on the sea;

Yeo! heave, ho!

Then joy attend the fisher's life!

Blow, winds, blow!

The fisher and his faithful wife!

May fav'ring breezes fill his sail,

His teeming harvest never fail;

And, from his cottage on the strand,

Come forth defenders of our land;

Yeo! heave, ho!

Verses such as these are essentially musical. You feel, in reading them, that they are made to be sung, and that the completeness of their effect demands appropriate melody. No melodies can be more appropriate than those which the author of the poetry has himself contributed. They are exceedingly tuneful, and in every instance echo with truth and fidelity, and sense and feeling of the words. They are faultless in all the technical requisites of the art—in regularity of rhythm, symmetry of form, sweetness, and variety of expression; and (what is of the greatest moment) they admit of the clear and emphatic utterance of every syllable. The arrangement of the vocal parts in the glee, and the simple but elegant piano-forte accompaniments, are skilful and musician-like; and these compositions cannot fail to give pleasure to every lover of genuine English song.

Cruvelli in Paris.

Never did a greater crowd besiege the doors of the Académie Impériale de Musique, and never did the Grand Opéra contain within its walls a more distinguished, or more numerous audience, than on Monday week. All that Paris possesses of celebrated, refined, and elegant, in the world of art, literature, and fashion, was assembled. The heroine of the evening was Mdlle. SOPHIE CRUVELLI, and the opera one which is full of opportunities for the display of her powers as a singer and an actress. Now that she is so soon to leave the stage for ever, the public excitement in Paris with regard to Mdlle. Cruvelli has reached fever heat; and she meets with receptions, night after night, such as the "oldest inhabitant" cannot remember—and it would be strange indeed were it otherwise. Scarce five-and-twenty years of age; with a commanding and graceful figure; an expressive and lovely face; replete with intelligence and genius; with a compass and freshness of voice that have seldom been equalled, never surpassed; with powers as a comedian, which even the gifted MARIE CABEL herself might envy, and force as a tragedian, second to RACHEL alone, Mdlle. Cruvelli has exhausted the whole range of the lyric drama, ancient and modern, from BEETHOVEN to VERDI. Her Leonora in Fidelio; her Donna Anna and Elvira in Don Giovanni; her Cherubino and Countess in the Nozze di Figaro (I may add Susanna and Zerlina, since she has played both,) her Amina, Norma, Rosina, Julie (Vestale), Odabella (Attila), Elvira (Ernani), Florinda, (Thalberg), Semiramide, Lucrezia Borgia, Desdemona, Lucia, Anna Bolena, Erminie (Quatre Fils d'Aymon), Ninetta, Alice, Valentine, and others, too numerous to mention, are proofs of the constant successes which have marked her career; and if ever there existed a dramatic singer, with the stamp of genius impressed on all she undertakes, Mdlle. Cruvelli may surely lay claim to that distinction. During the last five years she has studied hard, and to good purpose. She has softened and toned down many crudities and asperities, she has given breadth to her style and softness to her expression, and she now remains (Grisi having left the stage) without a competitor in any style, except that incomparably pure and finished vocalist, MARIETTA ALRONI.

I fear the part of Rachel in the Juive is the "anti-penultimate" of Mdlle. Cruvelli's new impersonations. In Verdi's forthcoming opera, Les Vêpres Siciliennes, we shall, probably, see her last "creation." At present there seems little chance of her place being filled up, but let us hope for the best. Meanwhile, I must give you an account of the reprise of La Juive, at the great national (Imperial?) establishment in the Rue Lepelletier. Of the opera I need say nothing, as you have heard it here and everywhere on the Continent; you have seen it in London under every shape and form, with and without the music. The part of Rachel was originally written for Mdlle. FALCON, and was one of her most famous creations. It was afterwards sustained by Mme. STOLZ, whose fine dramatic genius was exhibited to the highest advantage. Since then, Mdlle. NATHAN, Mme. HEINEFETTER, and a host of others, have achieved more or less every year. Mdlle. Cruvelli has cast aside all the "traditions" of the theatre, and has refused to be bound hand and foot by the dicta of stage managers. Mdlle. Falcon did this and Mme. Stoltz that; Mme. Nathan sung a certain passage in such a manner, Mme. Heinefetter in a manner directly opposite, etc. etc.; but Mme. Cruvelli, without caring for any of them, has gone straight to the source, has studied the character for herself, has repeated what she did with regard to the Huguenots, and produced a fresh, original, and true "creation." On the first night, she was somewhat too energetic, and displayed too much of that peculiar force which is so remarkable a characteristic of her style. Unlike the majority of timorous debutantes, who hesitate and doubt, who venture with fear and trembling on a new part, and never feel themselves at home, until encouraged by applause and the expression of public feeling, Mdlle. Cruvelli takes counsel of herself, studies her part with enthusiasm, and sometimes in the passion of the scene oversteps the bounds which art has set to nature. For myself, I readily pardon this defect, which springs from exuberance of feeling, from original conception of thought, from genius, indeed, and intellect. It is a fault which she possesses in common with Rachel, which was charged as a defect in Malibran, and which, as M. P. A. Florentini significantly hints, she does not possess in common with the tribe of pretty young ladies who curtsy to and ogle the public, fancying they are actresses, when they are mere puppets and toys, devoid alike of intelligence and thought, drilled and tutored like so many bullfinches. In the celebrated air, Il va venir, Mdlle. Cruvelli portrayed, with overpowering force, the remorse and fear of the maiden about to fall, and the sadness which urges her to her unhappy fate. In the malediction—

"Anathème, anathème,
Et que Dieu qu'il blasphème
Le maudisse à jamais!"—

she electrified the audience, who recalled her, amidst the loudest and most genuine marks of approbation. In the fourth act, in the duet with Eudoxia, and the short scene with the Cardinal, she was calm, dignified, and resigned, and with her rich and mellow contralto tones gave full meaning to the words Ma tête tombera; and in the concluding scene, when she sees the stake and the preparations for death, a shudder ran through the house at the effect she produced with the words, Ah, mon père, j'ai peur. She was recalled three times during and at the end of the opera. M. GUEYMARD was successful as the Jew, but, in the cursing scene, he attempted to force his voice too much, which resulted in three successive "couacs." He has since profited by experience, and succeeds better. Mdlle. Dussey was charming as Eudoxia, but illness has compelled her to cede the part to Mdlle. Pouilly, who is by no means so good. The Emperor and Empress was present on Monday. The Juive will be played three times a week until further notice, and, up to the present time, the receipts have been limited by the size of the house only.—Correspondence of Lond. Mus. World, March 17.

Ferdinand Ries.

By H. F. CHOLLEY.

Now, let us glance for a moment at the imitators of Beethoven, and see if we can make out what they have selected for imitation. The first of these—nay, for some twenty years, the only one to be found—among European composers, at all deserving the name, was Ferdinand Ries; and he attached himself, by love, by intercourse, and by habit, to those works by his master, in which the master's peculiar genius was complete—not clouded, flawed, or crossed with singularities never to be unriddled. By the mass of compositions by Ries before the public (which, indeed, for any present acceptance that they find, might never have been written at all), he is proved to have been a thoroughly trained musician—commanding fluency of expression in no common measure—not without a humor of his own—not without a certain vein of wild and national melody—not without a fire and a brightness that remove most of his carefully finished works beyond the category of tedious and imitative exercise-music. He wrote well for the orchestra; and being, in his day, a superb piano-forte player, he wrote effectively for his own instrument. But, seduced by the bold, uncompromising manner of his original, he fancied that abrupt transitions, unforeseen interruptions, harsh modulations—if applied to thoughts in themselves weak and second-hand, or in no wise fit for such treatment—would bring him to a grandeur and an authority approaching those of his model elect. They did but succeed, alas! in earning for him an unfair reputation for oddity and rudeness, without the relief of any better or more agreeable individualities. He has, in the general musical world, a fame little better than that of the adroit country actor, who succeeded in catching some of the salient points of Kemble's stately declamation, or Kean's violent and spasmodic transitions. Yet, as life advanced, and he emancipated himself from that excessive admiration which takes the form of outward simulation, and only arrives at the success of clever grimace, Ries produced many works that deserve a better fate than to be forgotten—in which, though an early unsettlement of mind can, perhaps, be traced, there may be also found a spirit, interest, individuality, such as few writers, if they now command such qualities, now exhibit.

By the example of Ries, then—a solitary example, moreover, among German composers, (whereas Mozart has had his thousands, and, Mendelssohn his tens of thousands of close imitators,) it may be seen how the great qualities of Beethoven defy dilution, copy or reproduction; because they are qualities far more dependent on lightning-keen originality of idea, than on this system of orchestration, or the other choice of harmony—than on this manner of introducing a subject, or the other mode of working up a close. How, indeed, is second-rate fancy to deal with genius that never did—that could not—repeat itself? There is no making over again, on any pretext, such an effect as that of the suspense, followed by the glorious burst of triumph, which is now so familiar to us, in the scherzo and martial finale of the C minor Symphony. There is no parroting such a programme (not prelude) to an opera as the Overture to "Leonora," in which the grasp of the master proves itself gigantic and forcible enough to work up all manner of fragments, so as to make a whole singular in its coherence, the material considered. Were the form of the Sonata alla fantasia in C sharp minor adopted by any adventurous new writer, his copy would be simply intolerable—as grossly and nakedly calling attention to the great original, which he was struggling to reproduce. The real inventions of Beethoven are all single, of no school—having no connection one with the other, save by their surpassing loftiness, and the amazing affluence of invention they display. We may see, indeed, here and there, that he used certain instruments in his scores with a richer license than his predecessors,—that he availed himself, when he pleased, of episode, to a degree surprising in one who could spin such wonderful poems out of such simple groups of notes as the one opening the C minor Symphony. We can recognize among his piano Sonatas one as an example of agitation (the one in D minor, No. 2, Op. 31); another (the one in D major, No. 3, Op. 10), as containing a wonderful contrast between the sublime sadness of its Largo meno, and the unbridled freakishness of its final Allegro. But this is all: for the slightest attempt to make any of these over again, conscious or unconscious, would betray itself, and subject the maker of it to such immediate indignities as awaited the bird in the peacock's plumes of the fable.

Some instinct of a truth like this has served the sagacious musicians of all countries, as regards the account to which the really great works of Beethoven might be turned. They have been resorted to as quickeners of the fancy, not as models of academical study. He would be a poor and meagre-minded architect who could gather no strength, nor food for future daring, under the shadow of the pyramids; but these would assuredly not take the form of a little pyramid.

Musical Correspondence.

From NEW YORK.

APRIL 18.—William Tell is certainly a great opera. There is no doubt of it. But then it should no more be called an Italian opera than HALÉVY's operas can be called German, because he happens to have been born in Germany. It belongs to the German or French schools. The first two acts are very fine. The third act is much poorer and contains a quantity of dance music. In the fourth act, again, there is a great falling off. But, take it all in all, it is one of the few operas to which you can listen four hours without tiring. In many passages it reminds one of Semiramide, but partly the libretto, and mainly the music, make it infinitely more interesting. And if it pleases so much with MARÉZK as conductor, what must it be with a first-rate Kapellmeister to bring out all the points and to really direct and manage the orchestra. Of the overture I could not well judge, as, from the opera beginning earlier than usual, there was much noise from the belated comers. It struck me, however, as far as I could hear, as being uncommonly fine. The solo performers and choruses, on the whole, did remarkably well. One portion of the opera, which could be much better is the scene in the third act where 'Tell' is ordered to shoot the apple from his son's head, and after having done so, drops another arrow (intended for 'Gessler') from his bosom. Neither the music expressing the fear and supplication before the act, or the intense joy and then dancing after it, was strong or significant enough. If ROSSINI had only studied Fidelio a little, he might have been inspired by that opera. (No adjective in the dictionary can express its merit, so I use none.) From the point where 'Leonore' steps between 'Pizarro' and 'Florestan' with command 'Zurück!' to the end of the unequalled duet: O namenlose Freude, I know of nothing at the same time more musical or more dramatic. Aye, never will I forget the 18th of March, 1852, when I heard JOHANNA WAGNER as 'Leonore.' I am not easily carried away by acting, I know how hollow it generally is, but when that glorious Töte erst sein weib! sounded forth so nobly, so spiritedly, so truly, as if all her passion, her love, her intense suffering were concentrated in it, I fairly shivered with enthusiasm. And not only I, but the whole house. Johanna Wagner is the greatest dramatic singer and the greatest actress in the world.

But, to return to William Tell; it has been given again on Wednesday, Friday and last night, each time to crowded houses.

At Niblo's, on Tuesday, Capuletti e Montecchi was given to a good house. The performance was better than I expected. MME. SIEDENBURG made a very good 'Juliet.' Her voice is rather passé, but she uses it to the best advantage. CAROLINE LEHMANN sang finely. Her acting (a very essential thing in opera,) was like that of an automaton. It was all assumed, so that when the scene happened to last a few moments longer than she had anticipated, she stood there like a statue, not knowing what to do. She has lost much in the estimation of the New York public since she left the concert room. I place her acting much below MARIO's. On Thursday Alessandro Stradella was given to a good house. The tenor part of Stradella was to have been taken by MME. D'ORMY, (a contralto,) but this lady having become 'suddenly indisposed' (to sing) Mr. LIBERATI, of the chorus, took the part at short notice. This gentleman has a weak, but pleasing voice, and no doubt, when sufficiently accustomed to solo parts, will sing very acceptably to the public. MME. SIEDENBURG did very well as 'Leonora.' But the gems of the evening were the duets between the assassins. Messrs. QUINT and MÜLLER, who sang and acted their parts capitally. It could not have been done better. The plot of the opera is as follows:

Stradella, a musical celebrity, professionally engaged for the musical education of Leonore, the ward of Bassi, an Italian nobleman, fascinates his pupil to a tender attachment for him. They elope, and Bassi, enraged at this, and determined to be revenged, hires two assassins to slay Stradella. They overtake the fugitives at Stradella's country seat, where, while watching for an opportunity to carry out the foul deed, they hear him sing and are charmed to a feeling of pity for him; they confess and abandon their design. Bassi, who enters to see whether his will has been executed, forgives his ward. The assassins, having previously received their hire, and glad to be released from their promise, join in the rejoicings of this happy termination.

In the first act occurs a comical scene, in which a very comic and well executed 'Pierrot Dance' was introduced, by eighteen 'New York children a la Viennoise.'

'Buckley's Minstrels' are really doing very much for the cause of music in New York. You may laugh at this assertion, but it is true nevertheless. They were the first to substitute arias, etc., from Italian operas for the common negro melodies, and also first introduced the burlesques on popular operas which retained the music, though they burlesqued the words. And now they have commenced giving comic operas with white faces, and, as I have heard, really do it well. I know that several of the members of the company are excellent instrumental and vocal performers, and some indeed I believe to be true musicians; and I contend that they are doing as much for the elevation of musical taste among the people as the Philharmonic Society is doing in a higher sphere.

Quite a curious serenade came off last Wednesday night. It was intended for a newly married couple, and consisted of six powerful grunting organs, all playing different tunes at the same time. First you would hear 'Pop goes the weasel' predominating; then after a short struggle, 'Wait for the wagon' would conquer it; again 'Jordan' would gain the mastery to be overpowered in its turn by the 'Prima Donna Waltz,' the 'Marseillaise,' etc., ad infinitum. This 'concourse of sweet sounds' continued more than an hour, and occasioned many an awakened sleeper to exclaim, in a testy voice, 'List, 'tis music stealing.' Myself, it reminded strongly of an almost forgotten opera, I had once heard in Germany. There are rumors of difficulties among the German troupe. Is it possible for an opera company to exist without quarrelling and bickering? It seems not. Next winter, I have reason to believe, we shall have a new and first rate German troupe.

To-night we have Capuletti e Montecchi, as the last performance of the present company. R.

APRIL 18.—EISELDE's Quartet Soirée, the last of the season, took place last night. The programme was less attractive than usual, and the whole,—as a friend remarked,—was like 'Hamlet with the part of Hamlet left out;' as, though it was 'Eisfeld's Classical Quintette Soirée,' there was no Mr. Eisfeld, no Quartet, and no MOZART, or BEETHOVEN, or other strictly classical composer. First came a No-netto by SPONER, a quite pleasing composition, in which the combination of instruments is peculiarly happy. Two numbers were filled by the two halves of HUMMEL's Septet in D minor, the piano part to be played by Miss ELIZA BROWN. The initiated knew that Miss Eliza Brown is a young amateur pianist, a pupil of Mr. TIMM, who can be seen at every concert, plays very well, and takes a vivid interest in music generally. And, indeed, report had not said too much of the young lady's powers; perfectly calm and self-possessed, she really played remarkably well, combining great fluency and accuracy with a degree of force very unusual in a young lady. There might have been more light and shade, but on the whole there was a truth of conception of the music, and an entering into its spirit, which was very creditable both the young pianist herself, and to the master who guides her.

The performances were very much shortened by the omission of Mr. ROOPE's vocal Quartet, on account of the sudden illness of one of the singers. We consequently were deprived of a Quartet by Mr. Eisfeld, which I have heard very highly spoken of, and Mendelssohn's beautiful Hunting song.

This was almost the last of our regular concerts. They end with the fourth Philharmonic next Saturday. Was there ever a finer programme than is promised us for that? If one could only enjoy the rehearsals more. But they are getting more and more to be merely an occasion of rendezvous, so that there is hardly a place in which one is not disturbed by the shameless talking and flirting by which most of the audiences amuse themselves. It is a real nuisance: would that something could be done to abolish it. BORNHORN.

From WASHINGTON, D. C.

APRIL 12.—After having for some time, "Winter lingering in the lap of Spring" (a thing much more poetic in the saying than the experience,) the welcome season seems to have come at last. It is now delightful to take a stroll. The mornings sparkle, and with such a river as the Potomac rushing past us, with such heights as surround our city, with such grand public buildings,—Washington is worth living in.

It would be much more so if we had more good music. But, alas! most people here are in the typhoid state on that subject. I advise all the Bostonians who ever contemplate the possibility of leaving their city, to engage a perpetual seat at the Music Hall, for they'll find themselves when they go away hunting about after music like Diegenes after an honest man.

We have however the next best thing to good music, i. e. a good music store. Messrs. Hilbus and Hitz have located themselves in a most favorable place on Pennsylvania Avenue, where with neatly arranged music, fine instruments, best music, busts of the great composers, etc., they await the "good time coming." Sometimes, too, in loafing there one picks up some bonne bouche in the way of music. For instance, no longer than this morning, whilst I was sitting about five minutes there, I heard a bow drawn with a flourish across the strings of a violoncello with a right brave hand, and looking up, beheld two good-looking German friends,—one at the piano, the other with violoncello,—and in another moment found myself gliding along the liquid sweetness of SCHUBERT'S Ave Maria! vierge du Ciel! Ach! It was good, or I'm a heretic. One should have a thousand ears here, by way of compensation for the little to be heard; as the Roman cried: What a pity one hasn't a thousand lives to give for one's country. (After the air of Schubert we had performed skilfully the Souvenir de Spa of Servais.)

I lately stepped into the copyright bureau in the State Department, and examined the collection of music there. I came away fully convinced of the truth of the American Proverb which says—

The greatest nation
In all creation.

Here are collected about 150 volumes of music, all innocent of foreign hands; such as the most patriotic K. N. might conscientiously hear. And what is it? Have we here intricate operatic airs, or puzzling "Sin-funny?" Have we Sonatas that put one's teeth on edge? or any other of your fiddle-tuning pieces? I answer, No! We have here music for the million,—music dear to the national heart. We have music here, (Pythagorically speaking) the μουσική of the τὸ πᾶν. That is the music of the (as Lowell translates it) great toe. That which the great American toe hath polked and waltzed and danced every way is here. These dance pieces are positively infinite, and imbibing the spirit of our country constantly expanding. We have Fairy, Fairy-bell-dell-yell Polkas, Blues, Greys, (Green) Quicksteps; Miller's Maid, Ben Bolt (and others bolting) Schottisch. But the great central volcanic fire in the National Musical Heart would appear to be these: Few Days, Jordan, and Pop goes the Weasel! The last of these especially is found in every variety. The Weasel pops forth in quick step, waltz, polka song—always the same cunning and interesting animal. One piece on a hasty glance seemed to me pathetic; perhaps we shall one day shed tears at the funeral march of Pop goes the Weasel.

The people of Richmond, Va., have been regaled by a Musical Convention; such perhaps as we shall have here May 8th. The Richmond people are fond of good music and support the opera well.

The friends of Mrs. BIRCHIE (formerly Mrs. MOWATT) in your city may be glad to learn that she is in the midst of many kind and appreciating friends in Richmond. I do not suppose that I transgress the proprieties of private sources when I state, that lately she has been delighting a circle of friends by reading the text of celebrated scenes (taken from "The Corsair," "Bride of Lammermoor," etc.) apropos of accompanying Tableaux Vivants representing them. Her society is in this as in many ways an acquisition to that city. c.

CONCERTS.

I MR. SATTER'S THIRD CONCERT drew a much larger audience. Indeed the Chickering saloon was nearly filled; and a more enthusiastic audience is seldom found at a piano concert. The programme was of a somewhat lighter and more heterogeneous quality than before; yet it contained some very choice and admirable pieces. It commenced with the Quartet in B minor, for piano and strings, by MENDELSSOHN, a work uniting all the peculiar charms of the composer's genius, and one to test both the mechanical and genial qualities of the interpreters. It was finely rendered, the members of the QUINTETTE CLUB doing their part in their happiest manner. The pianist played it as if he loved and felt it, which, considering the infallible neatness, freshness, strength and delicate shading of his touch, and the ease and elegance of his execution always, leaves little more that could be desired. We believe this is an early work of Mendelssohn. In the delicate, lightly running staccato of the Scherzo, one seemed to trace the genesis, as it were, of his peculiar, fairy, Midsummer Night's Dream vein. Here it was something, on the one hand, as romantic and fanciful as that, and on the other as abstractly musical as BACH; showing how what is most poetic and original, most of the fairy world with Mendelssohn springs in a direct and vital manner from what is most abstract and learned in his severe musical studies.

Next, Mr. Satter played a brace of pieces too entirely heterogeneous for contrast. One was the little happy, tranquil, June-like minuetto from MOZART'S E flat Symphony, which charmed everybody this time, as it did in the first concert. The other was more of the hacknied "prodigious school,"—Liszt's transcription of the Lucia Sextet, an imposing piece, however, and superbly played.—Miss LOUISE HENSLE next claimed the attention of the audience and held it to a charm, through all the tender cantabile introduction and the long and florid development of Com' è bello from Lucrezia Borgia. The delicious, Spring-like, richly vibrating quality of this young voice, wins steadily upon all sympathies; and we were more than ever surprised at the degree of skilful, tasteful execution, at the truthful feeling and conception of such music, shown by so youthful a débutante. It gives one the pleasant thrill we always feel in recognizing a rare promise.

Mr. Satter closed the first part with one of the lighter and earliest Sonatas of Beethoven, that in F minor, from his second opus, embracing the three Sonatas dedicated to Haydn. We have never heard it played so elegantly and so expressively. The unity of the work was completely preserved in the rendering. The impassioned, but gracefully self-possessed Allegro; the flowing, Mozart-like melody of the Adagio; the delicate, piquant humor of the Minuet and Trio, and the swift, fiery Finale, with its song-like episode, were all brought out with the utmost truth of rhythm and of coloring. We cannot conceive why a Sonata of Beethoven, really well played, should not always prove the most attractive thing that can be presented to an audience at all cultivated and intellectual in its taste.

We were obliged to leave after the first part, thereby losing the Scherzo and Finale from CHERUBINI'S Quartet in E flat, by the Mendelssohn Quintette Club; another song by Miss Hensler; some Mendelssohn "Songs without Words," (Number one of part one and the Duet,) a Lisztian arrangement of ROSSINI'S Tarantelle (which we hear made quite a furor), a Nocturne and March of Mr. Satter's own composition. His Casta Diva, "for the left hand," we can scarcely imagine to have been a loss; surely such a concert could not be made any more complete by introducing Norma!

2. MENDELSSOHN CHORAL SOCIETY.—The Complimentary Concert for the Ladies of the Society passed off quite successfully on Saturday evening. In spite of the wet, warm day there may have been some twelve hundred or more people in the Music Hall. The first part contained the principal "pith and moment" of the programme, consisting simply of BEETHOVEN'S Seventh Symphony, in A. All the other eight Symphonies had been played in the Music Hall this winter, either by the Orchestral Union or the Musical Fund Society; the Ninth stands by itself, and to our shame we have not had it since the days of BERGMANN, which argues a sad sinking of the tide of musical aspiration here since that time. The Seventh stands next in grandeur and fullness to the Ninth, and we came to it with an appetite after so long an interval. The orchestra of forty instruments, under the firm and energetic lead of Mr. ECKHARDT, played it on the whole about as well as we have ever heard it. We only questioned the taking of the grand and solemn introduction so very adagio. The third and fourth movements were particularly well played; and throughout the whole we felt buoyed up and sustained at a height of strong, harmonious, all-alive and all-related consciousness, of which few things in Art or Poetry give one such full experience as this divine, grand music. One lives much in listening to such a symphony!

It was rather hard to come down to the miscellaneous remainder of the entertainment, good as much of it was. Young Mr. GROVES played a solo on the viola, written by Eckhardt, with the tenor air from Freyshütz for its theme, and played it very clearly and truly, with a fine rich body of tone. BISHOP'S well-known Glee Quintet: Blow, gentle gales, was sung in good style by Miss BOTHAMLY, Miss TWICHELL, and Messrs. ADAMS, GILBERT and MOZART. The contralto was particularly rich and telling. This Glee was given with the author's orchestral accompaniments, which, after listening to Beethoven's orchestration, sounded rather tame; and indeed a Glee seems more complete in and by itself, than in such incomplete attempt to enlarge its sphere. A cor-net solo, by Mr. KLAESER; a florid Catholic trio: Regna terrae, by Misses BOTHAMLY and TWICHELL and Mrs. MESTON, very pleasingly sung; Mr. ECKHARDT'S horn Quartet, of which we spoke last week; the elaborate bass air: Sorgete, &c., from Rossini's Maometto, sang remarkably well by Mr. WETHERBER; and the overture to Masaniello, played with immense fire and spirit, concluded the evening.

English Opera.

The Pyne opera troupe began an engagement at the Boston Theatre on Monday last, and have performed Cinderella through the whole week to large and delighted audiences. The English opera, so called, is a queer heterogeneous medley of beautiful music, (generally Italian,) imposing spectacle, and mediocre comedy degenerating invariably into Harlequin buffoonery; the whole being by turns delightful, amusing and ridiculous. When such a singer as Miss LOUISA PYNE assumes the principal rôle, the most capacious and critical of critics must surrender at discretion to the rare excellence of her performance. As an English singer, or rather a singer of English, she has been equalled by few and excelled by no one who has sung here. Her vocalization is perfect; scales, runs, trills, cadenzas, every thing is executed with perfect finish, in the purest style; no note ever escapes her lips that is not sweet, fresh and pleasing in quality, in the whole compass of her voice. Her execution constantly reminds one of Sontag, and then her voice too is not unlike.

She wants life and wants passion; she pleases and satisfies you as an executant, but never excites or stirs you as an actress. The music of Cinderella she gives delightfully throughout, introducing Benedict's Sky-Lark, in the third act. Miss PYNE and Mrs. W. H. SMITH presented the sisters very satisfactorily, and Messrs. BORRANI and HORNCastle gave all the music of Dandini and the Baron Pompolino exceedingly well. Mr. Horncastle is a valuable addition to this troupe, and made a very favorable impression. Of Mr. HARRISON it is flattery to say he is "tolerable and not to be endured," but he is evidently an indispensable excrescence of this troupe. The orchestra gave the accompaniments very well, and the chorus, (especially the male) was large and well drilled. The charming Mrs. JOHN WOOD makes as charming a fairy queen as one could wish to see, and Mr. WOOD as usual made a buffoon of the faithful Pedro. The spectacle was very fine, the scenery new and effective, and the transformations and diablerie being done very expeditiously and well. The opening scene was a very felicitous and happy effort of the scene-painter, and the appearance of the vision in the beautiful cascade elicited much applause. When it is seen how impressive is the effect of beautiful scenery on a large scale, well conceived and well executed, we wonder that our theatres are content with the shabby, paltry daubs that are generally displayed before our audiences. Where illusion is the object, the resources of Art cannot be too carefully employed. The subject of scene-painting has received too little attention here, and we are glad to see that some steps are taken towards improvement at the Boston Theatre, though very much remains to be done. In London and Paris, there is no end to the pains taken in the matter, both as respects artistic, picturesque designs and the most elaborate and pains-taking execution. Eminent artists furnish the designs, (which are real pictures,) and the most skilful hands execute them.

The scenery got up for this opera, is a decided improvement on any that we have yet seen at this Theatre, and so too, is that painted for the Priestess, recently played there, founded on the story of Norma. The altar scene (after Stonehenge) is an exceedingly effective picture and would be a great addition to the attractions of an operatic performance. The landscapes of the Boston Theatre and the exteriors are invariably good and picturesque in their effect. The interiors, on the other hand, are generally preposterous and impossible, both in perspective, and in architectural plan, detail and ornament. Of the first, the exterior of a castle, (used in the statue scene of Don Giovanni) is an illustration; of the second, an apartment in the Baron's chateau, and the Prince's saloon in Cinderella, where the splendor is almost grotesque, where it might and should be beautiful. We find in the New York Tribune the following notice of the scenery of the Broadway Theatre, which is a fair specimen of the ab-surdities and anachronisms which are palmed off upon American audiences in establishments that ought to do better:

In the first act of the Gladiator, where it is intended to represent a street in ancient Rome the side scenes exhibit the architecture of the fifteenth Century, with the winged lion of St. Marks on one of the wings, while on the flat there is a view of a distant church steeple; the next scene is the interior of a modern drawing-room, with a French window, and the third is a pretty view of an Elizabethan country-house, which changes to the interior of the Coliseum, the side wings of which are parts of a modern ecclesiastical edifice. If such incongruities and solecisms satisfy the æsthetic requirements of a New-York audience, how little cause the actor has to value himself upon the applause which he receives from such easily gratified judges.

And in another New York paper we find this criticism on the scenery of William Tell:

All the world is going to see William Tell at the Opera House. The scenery is splendid, but it is not Alpine. The dresses are showy, but they are not Swiss.

We have begun with music and got insensibly upon painting. But in the opera they are inseparably connected, and the latter has had too little attention paid to it. To return to our text—Cinderella is put on the stage in a style superior to anything we have had in Boston, very creditable to the management of the Theatre, and will doubtless be seen and heard with delight by large audiences. We have not learned what other operas this troupe will perform during their engagement.

Musical Fund Society.

We shall, we trust, appear before our city and suburban subscribers in ample season to induce them to attend the Concert of the MUSICAL FUND SOCIETY, which will be given this evening at the Music Hall. After a disastrous season, this society, which has now become an established institution among us, appeals to its subscribers and friends to show their good will once more, and endeavor to make up, in some degree, for the small receipts of the previous concerts of this series, which the society has been compelled to bring to an abrupt close, without giving the full number of concerts promised in its announcement, at the opening of the season. The circumstances under which the series began were apparently unusually auspicious. The instrumental concerts of the previous season had been attended by large and remunerative audiences. The tide of fashion seemed to have set strongly that way, and there seemed no doubt but that popular favor would reward similar efforts this year. The Musical Fund Society had the coast clear, without a rival to interfere with its success; it had been thoroughly reorganized; incompetent members had been replaced by others, equal in their several departments to any artists among us; a new President had taken the chair, a gentleman widely known in our community as a liberal patron of the Fine Arts, himself an accomplished and thoroughly educated musician, and an untiring friend of musical artists and of the interests of the Art among us.

But for some reason or other all the expectations founded upon these elements from which it was not unreasonable to hope for a brilliant success have proved empty, and the society finds itself, with a considerable deficit in its treasury and unable to fulfil the promises it had made. Its claims on the public, aside from the great merit of its performances, are therefore very strong; and we most earnestly hope to see the Music Hall crowded to-night with an audience that shall pay, and relieve the society from the pressure of the embarrassments that have pursued it through this season.

It is unnecessary now to speculate upon the probable causes of this bad fortune. Hard times, the caprice of the ever changing public, strongly enticed at one time by the potent bait of the Italian Opera; perhaps an unwise judgment in the formation of the programmes—all these elements may have conspired, some more, some less, to bring it about. We will not pursue the subject, but hope the Society may have its burden somewhat lightened by the concert to-night, and look forward with good courage to more prosperous fortunes another year.

The programme offered is certainly an inviting one. Though there is no Symphony, yet we have the E flat Concerto of Beethoven, with Mr. SATTER for pianist, which will go far to make good the omission. A manuscript overture of Mr. J. C. D. PARKER will also be performed for the first time. Mrs. J. H. LONG and Mrs. ROSA GARCIA DE RIBAS will assist the Society as vocalists.

"WILLIAM TELL." Our New York correspondent gives some account of the performance of this opera in New York. We shall, next week, give to our readers at greater length, our own impressions of this opera, and of the manner of its performance. We shall act as our own correspondent, and write of such things as we shall have the good fortune to hear in a short visit to the Metropolis.

Novello's Musical Library.

The Organ and its Construction; a systematic Handbook for Organists and Organ-builders, &c. Translated from the German of J. J. SEIDEL, organist at Breslau.

The object of this work, as expressed in the preface, is, it seems to us, but quite indifferently attained. The author says:

"The design of the book is two-fold:—1. To acquaint organists, etc., with the mechanism of the Organ, and to enable them thereby to discover and remedy any little faults that may arise; to prevent greater ones; to give due information to the respective authorities in case of a repair being necessary, and to keep the instrument in good condition.—2. To warn those who undertake the erection of an Organ against errors, and to furnish those who superintend such an undertaking with the requisite knowledge. How far the author has succeeded in this, he leaves to competent judges to decide.

The short history of the Organ is very short and very meagre. The description of the construction of the instrument is of organs of German manufacture only, and these are so unlike the American instruments, that a novice would not gather much information from this work. Organists who live at a distance from manufactories, however, may learn something useful from it, and may find it of some service. The book is also designed for the use of organ builders, but for such persons it is entirely too meagre and superficial. An ingenious carpenter, or a misguided plumber smitten by an ambition to build an organ, (and some of our builders are no better than such) might, perhaps, get some glimmering of an idea how the thing could be accomplished from the plates and text of this book; but we can hardly imagine that any well educated builder could derive much information from it. The methods of construction described are old-fashioned and ante-diluvian, and we are sure that no Yankee need look to Germany for anything new in the department of ingenious mechanical contrivance.

Fine Arts.

The ATHENÆUM GALLERY is open again for the season. We have not yet visited it and have not heard of any novel feature of the collection. We understand, however, that a room will be set apart this year for the exhibition of the works of our Boston artists, where they may be seen by themselves. The Bonaparte pictures which were added to the gallery in the last season, and attracted much attention, still form a part of the Athenæum collection.

At FREDERIC PARKER'S, in Cornhill, The April

Shower has been for some time on exhibition. This picture represents a group (life size) of three young ladies, escaping from a sudden shower from which they are inadequately protected by a single umbrella. The subject is a trivial one, but the picture has very considerable merits of drawing and coloring and is well worth a visit. In the same room is a winter landscape of CHAMPNEY, which fairly divides the attention of visitors with Mr. HALL's April Shower, and is to our mind a much more interesting picture. It is a view of Mt. Washington from North Conway, which, often as it has been treated by our artists, we do not ever recollect to have seen before represented in its mid-winter grandeur. The frozen stream in the foreground, with its banks covered deep with snow, the tall bare elms standing out naked against the sky, contrast finely with the darker middle ground of pine covered hills, and the grand mountain glowing in the distance, in the rosy light of a winter sunrise. Mr. Champney has in hand, we hear, a companion to this picture, giving the Summer scene from the same point of view.

Musical Intelligence.

Local.

MR. SATTER performs for the last time, we believe, at the Musical Fund Society's Concert, and those of our readers who have not yet heard him play should not lose this last opportunity. He will perform BEETHOVEN's grand Concerto in E flat, with full orchestral accompaniments by the Society.

MR. E. BRUCE's Concert at the Tremont Temple, on Thursday evening, was attended by a large audience, and gave much satisfaction. Haydn's Mass in D was performed by a large chorus, with organ accompaniment by Mr. J. H. WILLCOX.

THE DORCHESTER MUSICAL ASSOCIATION last week gave a very excellent concert in presence of a large audience. The pieces were mostly selections from the standard oratorios, rendered by a chorus of amateurs, under the direction of Mr. CHARLES ANSORGE, who is exerting himself with good effect in creating a taste in Dorchester for really good music. We learn that other concerts of a similar character are to follow.

THE CAMBRIDGE MUSICAL ASSOCIATION gave a second Concert on Thursday evening at the Athenæum. Haydn's Sixteenth Mass was the principal feature of the Concert. Some choruses by the Society, together with some four part songs of MENDELSSOHN, made up the remainder of the programme, with an Allegretto and Minuetto by Haydn, and other pieces by an amateur orchestra.

It is truly refreshing to see our amateur musical associations giving their audiences on their programmes such music as the Masses of Haydn and Mozart. These compositions are entirely within the means of such societies, and there can be no surer way of developing a sound taste for what is really good and great in the Art, than to make people familiar with such works as these. A chorus of forty or fifty voices, such as we heard at Cambridge, is large enough to give such music with all proper effect, and we venture to say, that in any chorus of such a number there will be found voices equal to a sufficiently satisfactory rendering of the solos, in most cases. Some, indeed, such as the solos of Mozart's Masses, demand voices of a somewhat extended compass and tax the resources of the amateur singer not a little; but, in the present state of musical cultivation, are by no means impracticable. At the concert referred to, the female voices were quite up to the requirements of the score, and gave the music with spirit and expression. The love of this music increases immensely with increased familiarity. The same composition should be heard repeatedly, till the hearer takes in and really understands the solemn religious character of the text, and thus is led to appreciate the fitness and take in the full effect of the music that is the medium in which the tremendous import of the words is to find a voice. When the hearer has come to this point of cultivation and attained this familiarity, (which he can do, nor will it take long;) he will find nothing in the whole range of Art more moving, more deeply penetrating the soul than this sublime service of the Roman Catholic Church. There is more religion in one good Mass than in a dozen dull sermons. There is no word that is not full of the highest religious sentiment,—and no tone that does not give point to the written word and carry it right straight to the heart.

The field opened to such associations to select from, is almost boundless, and we hope to see many gleaners in this harvest. "Haydn's Symphonies," says the London Musical World, "are just the thing for Amateurs. Fine and spirited music, without being difficult, full of variety and masterly elaboration, together with a general clearness and simplicity of style, that place them within the reach of universal appreciation—nothing can be better suited to bring up gentlemen-excellents in the way they should go." The Cambridge Association (from conductor down) is strictly amateur, and we can therefore only speak in general commendation of its performance, which both in the vocal and instrumental departments, was a most satisfactory specimen of home-made music.

PROVIDENCE.—A friend (he is every body's friend) writes us from this city: "We have two musical men here, AHNER and WEISE, late of the Germanians, and there is some spasmodic musical enthusiasm." With any ex-Germanians we cannot but feel sure that the Providence enthusiasm will become chronic and be something better than spasmodic or intermittent.

A NEW ITALIAN OPERA COMPANY.—On the 30th April there will be a new Italian Opera Company at Niblo's. From the prospectus of the management we make the following extract:

"In conclusion, the Managers beg to say that they do not anticipate a full house on the opening night: of the season, for experience has unfortunately shown, that without having recourse to, or bowing before the omnipotence of 'puffing,' no matter how exalted the rank of the artist, and unsurpassed as may be the talent which gave that rank, not a little of what may be termed 'out-door influence' is required to awaken the curiosity of 'the masses.' Owing to the suddenness of her engagement, Madame de Lagrange cannot have the benefit of this out-door influence, which consists of preparing the way by means of advertisements, portraits, critical notices, 'biographical sketches, early and continuous announcements through the medium of the press, &c., during the space of an entire year, and sometimes more, prior to the advent of the artist, as was the case with Jenny Lind, Madame Sontag, Madame Grisi, Signor Mario, &c. But the managers are prepared for, and fully rely upon the attendance of one of the largest audiences that has ever been collected in this country, on the second night of Madame de Lagrange's appearance, when the public will find in this cantatrice the ne plus ultra of modern vocalization—a singer equally great on the stage and in the concert-room—in the florid music of the Rossinian school, the passionate bursts of Meyerbeer, the tender melancholy of Bellini, and the classic simplicity of Mozart or Beethoven; and, withal, a woman of such distinguished appearance and lady-like demeanor, that she not only will compel the admiration of the public, but is sure to enlist their unanimous sympathies. And this the managers say, without the slightest fear of the disastrous result which would be the inevitable consequence, if the début of Madame de Lagrange shall fall below the great expectations they boldly and unhesitatingly call upon the public to entertain."

PHILADELPHIA.—We take the following from the City Item :—

PROF. CROUCH, (formerly of Portland, Me.) gave another Musical Entertainment at the Assembly Buildings, on Tuesday evening. We were pleased to notice a large and discriminating auditory in attendance. The entertainment was extremely delightful. Mr. Crouch is one of the finest ballad-singers living, and his execution of several familiar airs charmed all present. Mr. C. will give another entertainment on Tuesday evening next.

HARMONIA SACRED MUSIC SOCIETY.—The Thursday evening rehearsals of this popular society are now exclusively devoted to the preparation of the chorus parts of the new Oratorio, called 'The Cities of the Plain,' by Frank Darley, which will shortly be produced with the care and accuracy peculiar to the Harmonia. This great novelty has wisely been deferred until the close of the season, so that the interest felt in the association may be sustained, and its final concert leave a pleasing impression upon the minds of those able to attend. Among the performers will be Professors Bishop and Crouch, several favorite soloists, whose names are withheld, but whose voices are agreeably familiar, the large chorus of the society, and a full choir of boys, which will be something quite new to a Philadelphia audience.

NEW AESTHETIC JOURNAL. THE CRAYON,

A Weekly Paper devoted to ART, offers itself to the attention of all who are interested in the elevating and refining influences of Beauty. Among the contributors to THE CRAYON already are BRYANT, LOWELL, STREET, REMBRANDT PEALE, A. B. DURAND, President of the National Academy of Design, DANIEL HUNTINGTON, HENRY K. BROWN, and amongst those engaged are LONGFELLOW, BAYARD TAYLOR, GEO. WM. CURTIS, Rev. H. W. BROOKER, Rev. SAMUEL OSOOD, Rev. H. W. BELLows, Hon. CHARLES SUMNER, and others of our most eminent writers. A series of papers by RUSKIN, and essays left by the eminent sculptor, HORATIO GREENOUGH, add to the interest of The Crayon.

From the Christian Inquirer.

The first five numbers of this promising (and thus far performing) paper are now out. We look for its weekly issue with high and never disappointed expectation. Its leaders are headed in a double sense—weighty with thought as well as with typographical distinctness. They carry metal. We are much impressed with the seriousness and instructive aim of the editorial columns. Manifestly it is not to tickle the ear or please the fancy, but to enlighten the mind and improve the taste, that the leading article always aims. The writer has a real, well-considered, distinct, and decisive thought to convey to his readers' minds, and he goes about it patiently, unambitiously, and earnestly, and succeeds not in winning our admiration—a poor victory—but in leaving us wiser than he found us.

The Crayon has, we hope, a special mission—to purge and soberize the style of our Journalism, as well as the taste of our people in general. The heated, gaseous, and scintillating style of our public press is becoming intolerable. The Crayon uses a cool, quiet and unobtrusive style, which is truly refreshing.

From the Cincinnati Gazette.

We have already strongly recommended THE CRAYON, and every succeeding number proves it to be more and more worthy of all we have said in its praise. No Journal, devoted to Art, has ever been so ably conducted, in this country; and if it meets with the support it so richly deserves, we have no doubt that it will exert a most wholesome influence upon the taste of the country.

W. J. PARKERSON,
NO. 8 LA GRANGE PLACE, BOSTON.

Having resided thirteen years in Europe with a view of adapting the Italian style of Singing to the English voice, and of remedying weakness of the voice, and thoroughly correcting harsh, guttural, nasal, or other unpleasant peculiarities, proposes to give lessons on the Voice, and in Singing, in the Italian French, and English Languages.

Many who have spent years of severe study to attain musical excellence, after struggling to conquer some guttural, nasal, or other unpleasant mannerism, abandon the pursuit from the belief that they are afflicted with a natural defectiveness: when, with a fractional part of the application which they bestow on the other branches of their musical education, and with much less physical effort (if properly directed) than they have been accustomed to use, their voices might be rendered comparatively beautiful.

To singers of eminence he would say, with a just appreciation of their high attainments, that a brief practical examination of his system will convince the most sceptical, that he can afford them such assistance in beautifying the voice, as might delight the most fastidious.

"Being acquainted with the course of vocal discipline pursued by Mr. W. J. PARKERSON in forming and developing the voice, I take pleasure in bearing my testimony to its excellence; believing it to be far preferable to any other method known to me."

From the New York Daily Tribune.

There is no better musical critic in the country than John S. Dwight, of Boston, and few men are able to express what they have to say about music in a manner at once so poetic and precise. His articles are sure to please the learned in music, and to delight its lovers. We commend his journal unreservedly to our musical friends as a work which will be an able running commentary upon musical events, extracting from each its significance; varying its critical notices of music and musicians, both new and old, with biographical and entertaining details; and always true to what is most interesting and commanding in this noblest of the Arts.

From the Boston Evening Transcript.

Wherever there is a piano-forte, this Journal ought to be lying on it.

From the Boston Atlas.

We need just such a paper. One which is subservient to no particular clique of book-makers, or society agents, or managerial interests. One which tells truly what is good and what is bad, in the honest convictions of the writer. Mr. Dwight unites more qualifications to hold the judge's chair than any other writer with whose powers we are acquainted. His genial warmth of feeling is united to an acute perception of the beauties of executional Art; while a long and earnest study of the great composers of the world has rendered him familiar with, and an appreciator of, their noble works.

Reminiscences of a Summer Tour.

V.

FARTHER UP THE RHINE—CATHEDRAL OF STRASBURG
—THE ORGAN AT FREYBURG—INTO SOUTH GERMANY
—STUTTGART—HERR KOCHER AND THE STIFTS-KIRCHE ORGAN.

In ascending the Rhine its beauties, as all the world knows, end at Mayence. So forsaking the river at this point, I went by rail, through Darmstadt and Carlsruhe, to Kehl, passing by the castle-crowned heights of Baden on my left, and leaving, on the right, the ancient imperial cities of Worms and Spire. At Kehl the spire of the Strasburg Cathedral, three or four miles distant on the opposite bank of the Rhine, seen through the clear air, seems close at hand.

It is natural to compare the Cathedral at Cologne with this at Strasburg. Drifting on in the customary channels of travel, they are visited in close connection. But in their effect upon the mind they differ essentially. The one strikes you as a ruin, leaving the imagination to play with its unfinished parts—the other is complete, save in the absence of its twin tower, which after all is no blemish. The former is bolder in its design, as it is larger in scale, and in its architecture is stern and grand—the latter is all beauty and delicacy and artistic feeling. There is a mystery about the Cologne structure which is in itself a charm. The very name of its architect is unknown. The Cathedral of Strasburg is better placed, and shows for all that it is: "a masterpiece of airy open-work." The artist who designed it was Erwin of Steinbach, whose plans are still preserved in the tower. When he died in 1318, the work was continued by his son and afterwards by his daughter Sabina; in the south transept, placed against the wall, is a statue of the architect, carved by himself. The origin of the Cathedral of Cologne is a shadowy romance; that of the Minster of Strasburg a fixed fact. Aside from the architecture of the Cathedral, and the curious clock inside, which partakes too much of the puppet-show order to please one long, there is little else of interest in Strasburg.

Of course I did not fail to visit Freyburg, (Suisse), and hear the magnificent organ of the Church of St. Nicholas. Concerning this ancient and picturesque town, the guide books will inform you that the Lärige Hof close to the bridge, is good—the view, from the platform behind, of the two bridges is very striking: "Tea, 1 fr." That on the portal of the Church is a bas-relief representing the last judgment, and within an organ, built by Aloys Moosen, a native of the place, on which the organist is allowed to play, for the gratification of travellers only, at hours when the Mass is not going on,—fee, 11 fr.—that the performance will terminate with the imitation of a storm, introducing the howling of the wind and the roaring of the thunder, interspersed with a few flashes of lightning from Der Freyechütz; all which is very true, but more spirited and concise than satisfactory. It is, indeed, a magnificent instrument, the organ in the Church of St. Nicholas, whose shrine, for the fame thereof, counts its pilgrims by thousands.

This, as is well known, is one of the largest organs in Europe, the largest, perhaps, if we except that now constructing for the Sydenham Palace by the Messrs. Hill of London. It has 7800 pipes, several of which are thirty-two feet in length. I was surprised at the general excellence of its registers, and at their standing so well in tune. The evenness of the climate, perhaps, may have something to do with this. But what gives to this instrument its world-wide fame is the peculiar quality of its vox-humana stop, the tones of which are more than human—are angelic. Musicians and artisans have studied its effects and scrutinized its mechanism, and made many attempts at imitation, but never with success. The people have many a legend and superstition associated with it. There are those who believe the voices of departed friends thus speak to them who are yet in the body. Both Hill of London and Walker of Ludwigsburg, with whom I conversed on the subject, believe its peculiar intonation is dependent, in some way, on the acoustic qualities of the building in which it is placed. If one expects, however, to hear a good specimen of organ playing in these exhibitions, he will be sadly disappointed. You feel it is a show-game from beginning to end—an every day routine, soulless and mechanical. It is in spite of this, and through it all that the intrinsic excellence of the instrument stands forth.

From this point I retrace my route to Carlsruhe, the capital of the Grand Duchy of Baden. Here I bespoke a place in the Eilwagen for Stuttgart, eight hours distant. The road winds, at first, through one of the most fertile districts in Germany. It is a district clothed with vineyards and flowing literally with oil and wine. Presently, the dark outline of the Black Forest appears, far away to the south. Crossing a broken range of hills, where the peasantry toggled out in cocked hats are seen at work by the roadside, we came down, in the edge of the afternoon, among the pleasant vallies of Würtemberg. Stuttgart, the capital of the kingdom of Würtemberg, rests snugly in the little valley of the Neesen brook, surrounded on all sides by vine-clad hills.

I had been kindly favored by Mr. LOWELL MASON (although a stranger to him) with a letter of introduction to Herr CONRAD KOCHER the celebrated organ player of Stuttgart. Of Kocher Mr. Mason quaintly remarked, in forwarding me his letter: "If I believed in the doctrine of the transmigration of souls, I should surely expect his to take possession of his favorite instrument after death." My note was dispatched to the residence of Herr Kocher early in the morning after my arrival, with an intimation that, if agreeable to him, I would present myself at such hour as he would name. But no sooner did he receive it than, with characteristic German kindness and courtesy, he paid me a visit in person, at my hotel. I had pictured him, in my imagination, after the manner of other artists I had met abroad, full of life and restless activity. There came, instead, a mild and venerable old man of seventy years, who took me warmly by the hand and welcomed me to Germany. In person he was such as Longfellow has described Dannecker—"Of low stature, with a face like Franklin's, his white hair flowing over his shoulders, and a pale blue eye." Indeed, the whole account of the veteran sculptor, as given in the last chapter of "Hyperion," with a decade of years perhaps in favor of the latter, might apply to Kocher, word for word. From the first moment I saw him, he took possession of my whole heart. Very soon we were off for the Stiftskirche, where we found the bellows-blower sitting upon the steps and awaiting our coming. The church is a melancholy old structure of the fifteenth century, the interior of which was restored (as it is sacrilegiously termed) in 1841. Enough, however, is left by the defacer and destroyer of modern times, to show that its architecture was once imposing and grand. A gallery supported by massive pillars now extends round three sides of the building. On the eastern or end gallery stands an organ, built more than a century since by Martyn of Hayengen, who also built the celebrated organ for the Benedictine Abbey of Zwiefalten. Quite recently it has been repaired and improved by Walker of Ludwigsburg. It has 68 effective registers, 4 manuals, and 2 pedales, and 4236 pipes in all, including several of thirty-two feet in length. I had previously listened to the fine instruments in Dublin and at the Birmingham hall in England, and afterwards three of the celebrated Silberman manufacture in Dresden and elsewhere, as well as one or two of the mellow-voiced organs to be found on the banks of the Danube—but none of them so impressed me at the time, or left such pleasant recollections as this of Herr Kocher at Stuttgart. Of course the Freyburg giant surpasses it for vastness, and pomp and power of sound, and the best of the London instruments are more ready of speech and prompt in action; but in mellow richness of tone, in beauty and affluence of expression (not confined to certain registers only, but pervading the whole instrument) and in variety of resources and telling effects, I think this the finest specimen of its kind I have ever heard. The architecture itself of the instrument is peculiar, it being constructed in two portions joined together by one arch at the top. Between these separated portions, through a window of stained glass, light is admitted into that end of the church. Like most of the organs I met with in South Germany, the key-boards are brought forward so that the performer sits facing the audience.

But what now of the organ-playing of the veteran artist himself? I might say, in general terms, it was something surpassing after its kind. While it was evident, from his earnest enthusiasm and ready manipulation of his instrument, that his natural force had not abated in one jot or tittle—he displayed that thorough knowledge and mastery of its hidden mysteries, that not genius alone can give, but the study of years and a life-time of patient toil superadded. For a couple of hours, I was enchained in willing slavery, moving only from my position, when beckoned by the player to one nearer or more remote, for another phase of effect. What he played I do not recall, and did not well know at the time. Sometimes it was a fragment of a Mass—sometimes a solemn choral, or the finale of a sublime old Handelian chorus. At one time, as I found by looking over his shoulder into a torn and venerable book, a Bach fugue; at another an improvisation which called into exercise all the powers of his instrument in each and every of its stops—singly and in all possible combinations—now soft, now loud—breathing scarce audibly within the cloud swell, and, anon, shouting in thunder-tones from the sub-diapasons. The curious mechanism of the instrument, before alluded to, was not without its fitness. From the window of stained glass behind came a stream of mellow light, itself laden with harmony, and rested like a halo around the old man's head.

Herr Kocher might be called an organist of the old school, in contradistinction from the school of the kickers and swingers to and fro, as they have been aptly termed by Chorley, which so much abounds at the present day. He regards his instrument with a feeling akin to adoration; and, in the church, would even place it on equality with the preacher as a dispenser of the Gospel to the people—a medium through which, by the intervention of music (its highest office), the soul can hold converse with its Maker. Hence all those attributes which pertain par excellence to the organ, shine forth under his hands: dignity, profundity, solemnity, a power to engage the best feelings of the heart and prompt to high and holy purposes. Hence in his treatment of the keys he is always reverent, and his playing, though artistic and impassioned, is imbued with a religious sentiment which bears onward and upward the feelings of his listeners, in spite of themselves. Herr Kocher among the organists is, to my mind, as MASSILLON among the preachers. But now this consummate organ-playing is brought abruptly to a close. A trio of English tourists, Murray in hand, have come, shuffling along the aisles, and put a stopper on enjoyment.

On leaving the church, Herr Kocher remarked that he was preparing for publication a work on the organ, which he hoped he might live to complete.

I was sorry I could not remain over Sunday, and hear the mingling of three thousand voices in the grand old hymns of Martin Luther, which, I was told, formed a part of the service at the Stiftkirche.

From the church we went to the manufactory of Carl Weigl, an organ-builder who learned his craft in the famous establishment of Walker of Ludwigsburg. Though a young man he has already gained some celebrity in his calling. He has recently produced some good instruments, which are to be found mostly in the parish churches in the vicinity of Stuttgart. One of these he took me to see and hear. For this purpose we chartered a conveyance to Eilegen, a quaint little town ten miles to the southward, an account of my visit to which I will defer to another chapter.

Beethoven's Instrumental Music.

FROM THE GERMAN OF E. T. A. HOFFMANN.

The general musical public feel oppressed by the mighty genius of BEETHOVEN; they try in vain to rebel against it. But the wise judges, looking around them with haughty mein, assure us: we may believe them, as men of excellent sense and deep penetration, that the worthy Beethoven was not in the least wanting in rich, lively fancy, but that he had no control over it! That he never thought of assorting and shaping his ideas, but jotted down everything, after the method of so-called geniuses, just as he was inspired at the moment by his excited and glowing fancy! But how, if it is only your weak eye that cannot fathom the deep inner connection of every composition of Beethoven? If it is your fault alone that you cannot understand the master's language, that the gate of the holy of holies remains closed to you.

In truth, the master, fully equal to MOZART or HAYDN in reflection, separates his Self entirely from the inner realm of tones, and reigns over it with unlimited sway. Æsthetic geometrics have frequently complained of an utter want of an inner unity, inner connection, in SHAKESPEARE, while before the penetrating eye there arises a beauteous tree, sending forth leaves, blossoms, fruits, from one germ. In like manner it is only by entering very deeply into Beethoven's instrumental music, that we can discern the high degree of the reflective faculty, which is inseparable from true genius, and is nourished by the study of Art. What instrumental work confirms this more decidedly, than his Symphony, glorious and profound beyond all expression, in C minor? How this wondrous composition leads the listener on, in a constantly progressing climax, into the spirit-world of the Infinite! Nothing can be more simple than the main idea, consisting only of two measures, of the Allegro, which, beginning in unison, at first does not even indicate the key. The character of anxious, restless longing, which pervades this movement, is only the more clearly defined by the melodious counter-theme. It seems as if the bosom, oppressed and tortured by a vague sense of something vast and awful, threatening annihilation, were vehemently struggling, in shrill, penetrating tones, for relief; but soon a radiant form draws smilingly near, and illumines the deep, fearful night. (The lovely theme in G, which has already been touched upon by the horns in E flat). How simple—to say it once more—is the theme which the master makes the foundation of the whole! But how wondrously are all the little episodic and accessory passages connected with it by their rhythmic relation, in such a manner that they only serve to develop more and more the character of the Allegro movement, which the main theme only hinted at! All the passages are short, nearly all consisting only of two or three bars, and these subdivided besides, by a constant change of the wind and stringed instruments. One would think that from such elements there could only arise something disjointed, incomprehensible; but instead of this it is just this arrangement of the whole, as well as the constant recurrence of the different passages and chords, which increases the sense of inexpressible longing to the highest degree. Quite independent of the fact that the contrapuntal treatment bears witness to a deep study of the Art, the connecting sentences too, and the continual allusions to the main theme, show plainly how the noble master conceived and worked over the whole in his mind.

Like a sweet spirit-voice, filling our bosom with hope and consolation, sounds forth the lovely theme of the Andante con moto in A flat. But here too, the evil genius which laid hold of and tormented the soul in the Allegro, peeps out threateningly from behind the dark thunder-cloud in which he had disappeared, and his lightning flashes quickly scatter the friendly forms which hover round us. What shall I say of the Minuetto? Listen to the strange modulations, the terminations in the major chord of the dominant, which the bass takes up in minor as the key-note of the following theme—the theme itself continually expanding by a few bars! Are you not again seized by that restless, nameless longing, that sense of the wondrous spirit-world in which the master reigns?

But now, like dazzling sunshine, the glorious theme of the final movement shines out in the jubilant strains of the full orchestra. What wonderful contrapuntal complications are here intertwined into a whole! To some ears, indeed, it may all rush past like a clever rhapsody; but the soul of every thinking listener will surely be deeply and forcibly seized by a feeling which is just that nameless longing of which I have spoken; and to the final chord, and even for a few moments after, he will not be able to find his way out of that wondrous spirit-world where joy and sorrow, moulded into tones, surrounded him. The inner arrangement of the different passages, their working up, their instrumentation, the order in which they succeed each other—all this tends to one certain point; but it is particularly the close affinity of the different themes to each other, that produces that unity which alone is capable of retaining the listener in one mood. This relation often becomes clear to the listener when he hears it in the connection of two passages, or discourses the same fundamental bass in the two different passages; but a closer relation, which does not manifest itself in this way, often speaks out only from the mind to the mind, and this it is which exists in the passages of the two Allegros and Minuetto, and gloriously bears witness to the thoughtful genius of the master.

The New Museum in Berlin.

II.

The attractiveness of the Egyptian Museum, and its admirable arrangement, (due to Prof. Lepsius's well-known taste, skill and learning), added to the fact that the purchase of Dr. Abbott's excellent collection in New York shows the interest felt in the subject in our country, have seemed to justify the minute description of it given in our last. We now pass again into the TREPPENHAUS.

(Stairway house.) When the building is completed, the grand entrance is to be at this point. At the right is the Egyptian Museum, at the left that of Northern Antiquities, in front the staircase conducting to the main floor. This floor is supported, in the small vestibule in which we stand, by four columns of Carrara marble, two on each side. In ascending the stairs we find on each side casts of small works of ancient Art. The upper row is a complete copy of the frieze of the cella of the Temple of Phigaleia in Arcadia, arranged exactly as they were in the original. We look up to the beautifully carved and gilded roof, rising high above the rest of the building. From the second story (the main story of the building), a stairway leads on each side to the third story, having the lower stairway between them, the landing-place being a portico supported by Caryatides,—an imitation of that of the Erechtheum in Athens, and of the same size. At the foot of these,—one on each side,—stand the colossal statues of the Dioscuri, 17 feet 8 inches high, of which the originals are on the Monte Cavallo at Rome. On each wall are casts of works of Art, the Metopes of the Parthenon, the Theseium, &c. Behind the Dioscuri, and supporting a gallery corresponding to the Caryatides hall, are four Ionic columns of Carrara marble. Under this gallery is the passage way on the right to the halls of Ancient Statuary, on the left to those of Modern. The Treppenhause is still incomplete. We go up by the southern staircase, and stand in the hall of the Caryatides. The whole southern wall is covered with paintings by Kaulbach, too full of beauty and significance to be included in this general description. We will merely name the subjects. The three great paintings on the south side represent "The Destruction of the Tower of Babel," "The Bloom of Greece," and "The Destruction of Jerusalem." On the northern side the historical sequence is to be continued in "The battle of the Huns," "The Crusades," and "The Reformation." These are connected with each other by smaller, half historical, half allegorical groups and figures. At the corners are eight allegorical figures; those over the doors, (North and South) representing Myth, History, Poetry and Science; those East and West being the four Arts,—Architecture, Sculpture, Painting and Engraving. Above these paintings a graceful frieze runs about the whole room, representing allegorically the whole course of the development of man. In the third story, to the South, are the rooms designed to contain the curiosities now in the Art chamber (Kunst Kammer) in the Palace. At present they contain only the cartoons for Kaulbach's paintings. To the North is the Gallery of Engravings.

We descend again to the statues of the Dioscuri, and turning to the right, enter (on the second story,)

THE GREEK HALL.

The contents of this hall, the masterpieces of ancient Art, are those which have the greatest attraction for the visitor. At the Northern end is a restoration of the east front of the temple of Ægina, colored in accordance with the views of some archaeologists, and with casts of the sculptures of the pediment as restored by Thorwaldsen. Those of the Western end stand on a raised platform near by. Other works of this archaic period of Greek Art stand in the neighborhood, and the rest of the long hall is nearly filled with the sculptures of the Parthenon. Thus while the Ægina marbles present us with noble specimens of early vigor and correctness in Art, those of the Parthenon, at their side, give us the most perfect remains of its glory and triumph. The metopes, we have already said, are in the Treppenhause, but the sculptures of the pediments are placed on raised platforms,—those of the Western end, just at our right as we enter from the Treppenhause; the more complete and noble statues of the Eastern end, in the centre of the room. The frieze is arranged about the room in such a manner as to preserve the connection and present good opportunities for study. The walls of this room are painted with beautiful views in Greece,—the Acropolis of Athens as it looked in its glory, the temples of Ægina and Phigaleia, the harbor of Syracuse, the holy grove of Olympia, and other places. Leaving this room, with regret, we turn to the right, into

THE APOLLO HALL.

Passing first through a small chamber containing the groups of Laocöon. This hall, occupying the Northern end of the building, contains some of the most renowned single works of ancient Art. The Apollo Belvidere, from which it takes its name, stands on a niche on the Eastern side, and, corresponding to it, on the Western side, the beautiful Diana of Versailles. The centre of the room is filled with the great group of the Farnesian Bull. Behind is a cast of the corner of the Theseium in Athens, including one metope, and enough of the pediment, column and other parts to make it a perfect example of Doric architecture. At the other end of the room are three masterpieces near the windows—the sleeping Endymion, the Venus of Capua, and the unrivalled Venus of Milo; near them the torso of Hercules. Smaller and less important statues stand in other parts of the room, among them the Apollo Lycius and the Venus di Medici. In the North-western part of the building is

THE CUPOLA HALL.

A small, high room, with elegant frescoes on the walls. This contains, among others, the Minerva of Velletri, Bacchus supported by two Satyrs, the sleeping Faun, Menelaus with the body of Patroclus, and, most beautiful of all, the Amazon, attributed to Phidias.

THE NIOBE HALL.

Takes its name from the well-known group which adorns the Western side. The dying Gladiator, the Quoit-thrower, the Antinous, the Achilles, the lovely Ariadne, the majestic head of Juno, and other statues occupy the floor, and the walls are covered with small medallion-shaped pictures representing scenes in Mythology.

THE BACCHUS HALL.

Is a small apartment containing two cabinets destined to receive statuettes and other small antiques mostly from Pompeii. A few are already placed there.

THE ROMAN HALL.

Is the last of those devoted to ancient Art. The wall-paintings represent scenes in ancient Italy,—the Villa of Hadrian, the Baths of Caracalla, &c. A the entrance are two columns, imitations of those found in Pompeii. The statues of this room are numerous,—the Minerva Giustiniani, Hypnos and Thanatos, the Boy with the Dolphin, and many others. We have thus in this suite of apartment casts of all the most famous remains of ancient sculpture, representing it in every age and school and specimens of nearly every form of Greek and Roman architecture. Casts of the Lycian and Assyrian sculptures are found in the inner space above the Egyptian court. The Southern end of the building, including the halls which connect with the Old Museum, is yet incomplete. We pass through the HALL OF THE MIDDLE-AGES.

Occupying the Southern end, and containing nothing at present except the frescoes on the walls, mainly medallion portraits of Emperors and Bishops of Germany in the middle ages. The HALL OF MODERN ART.

Extends to the Treppenhause, and is hardly more complete than the preceding. The paintings on the ceiling represent different branches of modern industry. Statues of Thorwaldsen, Schinkel, and other modern sculptors are already placed here, and at the Southern end is a cast of the famous door of the Baptistery in Florence.

The New Museum will, when completed, form—as indeed it does now—the principal attraction of Berlin. It will be a school unsurpassed in its completeness and arrangement for the study of plastic Art. The history of painting is so well illustrated in the Old Museum that its want is not felt here, and the modern German school finds its greatest triumph in these frescoes of Kaulbach and others. Engraving too is well represented. But Architecture, with the exception of Egyptian and Doric Greek, has not received its fair share of attention. It is to be hoped that the portions of the building yet unfinished will supply this want, although it can hardly be expected to rival in this respect the Crystal Palace of Sydenham, which in other points it surpasses. A Catalogue is much needed. The Egyptian department alone is provided with a satisfactory one by the learned Egyptologist, Dr. Heinrich Brugsch.

Why should not Dr. Abbott's Museum form the nucleus for some such institution as this? We can have casts of all the finest statues and models of ancient temples, and newly discovered vases may well be bought for America, as for England, Russia or Germany. We need such a Museum in New York or Boston. We have money enough, and we really wish to be an educated people. For this nothing is more necessary or more easily obtained than copies of these glorious works of Art. W. F. A.

Musical Chat-Chat.

We have already spoken of the casting of CRAWFORD's statue of BEETHOVEN, at Munich, and of its inauguration there with musical solemnities upon the 26th of March, the anniversary of the great composer's death. Our readers may perhaps like to know the programme upon that occasion. The statue was erected in the hall of the Odeon by Her-

VON MILLER, inspector of the Royal Bronze Foundry. The music, conducted by FRANZ LACHNER, consisted wholly of Beethoven's works: viz. his Festival overture in C; Terzette from Fidelio; March and chorus from the "Ruins of Athens;" Sinfonia Eroica, &c. The whole was preceded by a Prologue, written by DINGELSTEDT; and recited by Mme. DAMBOCK, of the Court theatre, in the character and costume of GERMANIA. We trust we shall soon be celebrating its final inauguration in our Boston Music Hall, for which it is intended.

The songs of ROBERT FRANZ are among the freshest and purest products of true musical inspiration which the present century has yielded. They are really works of genius, every one of them,—and they already count above a hundred,—each a perfectly original, distinctly individual creation,—each, as it were, a spontaneous out-flowing into melody of the spirit of the genuine little poem which in every case inspires his Muse. They have been for a year past the delight of our most refined private musical circles, and there must always be something select in this enjoyment, since they require both a singer and an accompanist, who is truly an artist and of no ordinary skill. Not a few of our readers will be pleased to know that a new set of six Franz songs has just been published, his op. 22, inscribed, too, to a musical lady who has made Boston and New York her home. Breusing, of New York, has them. The Leipzig Signale says: "They make one envy any one the gift of singing, for it must be a moment of real bliss in the singing of such songs to become their second creator." "Poetry and Music celebrate their marriage festival in these songs, and Beauty herself consecrates the union." "To embody the true life of these songs in their delivery should not be difficult to an appreciative singer, since Robert Franz, one of the most highly gifted of our song-composers, has found his tones in the poetic truth of the poems themselves: Poetry and Music are here in song, like clear intelligence and true feeling in a fair human form, not to be mistaken, comprehensible and enjoyable to every one." The subjects of the six are: Gleich und Gleich (Like and Like), by Goethe; Vorüber der Mai (Gone is the May); Im Frühling (In Spring); Frühe Klage (early lament); Im Mai (In May); and So weit von hier (So far away), by Burns. Franz's songs never disappoint, that is after you have once made acquaintance with his peculiar genius; and these last are among his very finest, and among the very finest of the world's song-literature. We must speak more at length some day of the songs of Franz. Meanwhile we rejoice that a beginning has been made of republishing them here with German and English words. Nathan Richardson (Musical Exchange) has already issued the Ave Maria, which, as a real Ave Maria, is even better than that of SCHUBERT.

Virtuosos are nothing if they are not astonishing; so when civilization gets to be past wondering at anything, they must needs go among savages. MIKA HAUSER, the violinist, writes a letter to a German paper from the Sandwich Islands. He says: "Seldom has a concert-giver seen so strange a public gathered round him, as surrounded me in Tahiti on the 6th of October.

"The place, now improvised into a concert hall, was formerly an idolatrous temple of the natives; afterwards the false gods were burned here by the queen's command; still later a French court martial here condemned to death the rebellious Indians; and now on the same spot stands a black-coated virtuoso as the Herold of the time, seeking with bow and fiddle to impart to these aboriginal children of nature some ideas of that modern European culture, from whose acquaintance they have so far by a good Providence been spared. On the right, amid tropical plants, sat the governor and his spouse, surrounded by many officers in brightly shining uniforms. On the left was the straw mat platform of the bare-footed queen, with many-colored woolen hangings, and the rest of the hall was filled by the strange figures of the natives, whose sense of hearing, until now sound and unsophisticated, had gone into ecstasies about no other song than that of the nightingale.

"I stepped forward, bowed before the bare-footed audience, and opened the concert. Really it took some time, to make this public comprehend that the main business at a concert was to hear; which most of them seemed not to know, for they talked so loud, that several times I was interrupted and had to begin again.

"I played the 'Othello' fantasia by Ernst; but a crashing of trumpets with drums and cymbals obligato would certainly have given these tawny Islanders more pleasure than my poor fiddling; for, with the exception of a few friendly European hands, not a finger stirred. So unapplauded have I never played before any public on the earth.

"The Queen now appeared, leading a little boy by the hand, attended by her court ladies, who, bare-footed like their mistress, in fantastical toilet, tripped into the hall and with curious wonder waited for the things that were to happen.

"The first musical celebrity of Otaheite, Mons. Camieux, chef of the French military chapel, a broad-shouldered giant, now appeared and played a piece upon the flute. They said it was a cavatina from Ernani, and one might perhaps have recognized it as such, but that unhappily most of the tones refused to come at the breath of the corpulent blower, upon whose forehead drops of perspiration stood from sheer exertion. The artist had moreover an original way, on coming out, of kissing his hand most reverentially to the lady governor-ess, a homage, which, although a slight to the bare-footed Pomare and her yellow ladies, was much more pardonable than his flute-playing, which seemed as if it never would end, and in spite of my eloquent signs to him to leave off, he still kept on whistling (quinquillirte). Already to my dismay I saw the yawning Pomare get up from her seat; I saw the aboriginal children of nature, whose sense of hearing had been put to so severe a proof, desert the hall; all my alluring hopes of ravishing the barefooted monarchess by my playing, all the illusions of orders, fame and immortality were gone! O wretched flute-player, to whom all this never occurred! Pomare left the hall, without having heard me, driven away by the ungodly flutist.

"After tranquilizing myself as much as possible, and after the unhappy Frenchman had ceased to blow, I once more stepped before the public, I summoned up all my powers, played sentimental love-songs and Paganini Witches' variations, but in vain; no sign of being pleased; the yellow Islanders remained as cold and unsympathetic as before.

"Then in my dire extremity, with the unavoidable fiasco before my eyes, a bold resolution seized me. Help me, O legerdemain! I said to myself, and grimly tore the strings from my violin before the eyes of the gaping public and played the 'Carnival' on the G string alone. That worked! A murmur of surprise ran through the crowd, and I was soon beset on all sides by the yellow natural enthusiasts, who at every passage, but particularly at the flageolet tones, burst out into a yell of applause, such as could be drawn from no civilized public. Always I played only the 'Carnival,' always I improvised new variations, and the more stupid and baroque these sounded, the more enthusiastically shouted my bare-footed admirers, who would not leave the hall until my arm sank down exhausted to my side.

"After the concert all Tahiti was in a state of excitement. All sorts of things were told of the foreign fiddler, who had come across so many seas, and who knew how to pipe upon the wood as well as any bird. The rarest fruits and flowers were sent to my hotel; whenever I play, a wondering crowd is gathered under my windows, and when I go out, every body greets and approaches me in the most friendly manner; in short, I am the hero of Tahiti. And all these miracles the 'Carnival' alone has worked! Verily, the violinists know not how much they have to thank this piece for, whose wonder-working operation like a syren song often inflames the coldest public, and which to me has often been the saving stroke, as it was this time."

The first one hundred representations of L'Etoile du Nord in Paris have yielded MEYERBEER and SCRIBE 33,807 francs each.—We see it stated that the Italian Opera in Paris closed its performances with Verdi's Trovatore. We should think it would close any opera.

Some of the German critics, among others ZELLNER of the Blätter für Musik, have set up the standard of RUBINSTEIN and seem to regard the young Titan as "another Beethoven just creeping from the egg." But La Presse and others dismiss his claims as a composer in the most summary manner. If any one desires to see and judge from the printed works, BREUSING in New York has a great variety of them; but you must have a pair of virtuoso hands at your command.

FRANZ SCHUBERT's Symphony in C has been arranged for two pianos by KLINDWORTH—Nägeli in Zurich publishes a journal called the The German Organist. No. 1 contains a remarkable piece by J. S. BACH, entitled "Little Labyrinth of Harmony," which consists of three movements: the first (Introtitus) is the labyrinth proper, full of enharmonic modulation; the middle piece (centrum) is a chromatic Fughetta; the last (Exitus) forms the postlude, again in labyrinthine style.

Music Abroad.

London.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA.—The season opened April 14th with Rossini's Il Conte Ory, an opera much admired by the Athenaeum, which grows melancholy when it contrasts its delicious music with that of the new reigning Italian school.

How many of the pieces may belong to Signor Rossini's Viaggio a Rheims is not to be told,—but the opera has in no respect the air of a piece of patchwork, and, its dramatic structure considered, is alike free from weak points and from reminiscences. The introduction may have been foreseen in the introductions to La Gazza and Cenerentola, but the air of the Preceptor, No. 2—the duet (No. 3) betwixt Count and Page, and the whole finale to the first act,—have the freshness and sparkle of Signor Rossini's best time, and a finish and delicacy which his early works do not exhibit. Further, the opera rises as it proceeds. When was ever scene more melodious, easy and graceful than the duet and chorus of ladies on which the curtain rises for the second act—passing off into the storm, with the sweet and holy, yet hypocritical, pilgrims' chant heard without, by way of contrast! The drinking bout of the enterprising Count and his companions, in their nuns' gear, is as rakishly chivalresque in its jovial spirit, as the night-music for the cloistered ladies is elegantly noble. It is not needful to dwell on the trio (No. 11) as perfect after its kind,—that being one of the few portions of the opera which is universally known, and as universally relished. To follow such a work through, and then to think of what Italian music has sunk to since it was written,—to recollect the groups of trite notes which must now pass for melody,—the screams drawn out under pretext of dramatic passion,—and the style of instrumentation which now gives a trumpet a unisonal melody with the soprano, and allots to every recitative its grumbling tremolando by way of support,—is to receive as sad an illustration of the "mutability of things" as modern Art can furnish.

Mme. BOSIO sings the part of the heroine with great brilliancy, and looks it gracefully. Is it vain to ask this lady to consider what she says more carefully? A solfe-gio in costume is not a part; and up to the present time we have not heard a word from her lips. Mlle. MARAI is satisfactory as the page; but more to our liking is Mme. NANTIER-DIDIER, in the smaller part of Ragonda. The quality of this lady's voice makes her effective in concerted music. Then Sig. GARDONI, as the second hand Don Juan who gives his name to the opera, is well fitted for the character, both by his voice and by his personal appearance. He sings well, he plays agreeably, and he is supported with due spirit and enjoyment by MM. TAGLIAFICO and ZELGER. It is long, we repeat, since a season has opened more auspiciously for the lovers of music.

Il Conte Ory was twice repeated, and then came (Thursday, 19th) the grand exhibition night, when the Emperor and Empress of France visited the opera in state, and fabulous sums were paid for seats. Her Majesty had the good taste for this occasion to command Fidelio as the piece to be performed; although, as the Leader says, "the attention of the vast audience was so absorbed by the Imperial and Royal dramatis personæ, that the republican BEETHOVEN had no chance of a hearing, even with a new prima donna for his Fidelio." The Times says:

It was more than ten years since an Emperor had been visible in a London theatre; and the audience gazed and gazed as though they imagined that such an event would not occur again for as many more, if indeed in our time. The theatre looked wonderfully gay and brilliant in its new attire, which, like the shining coat of a butterfly, is, we presume, to be shortly cast aside for another. The hangings of white calico, with broad satin edges and gold ornaments, gave a light and airy appearance to the boxes, adorned, moreover, with festoons of flowers from top to bottom; and there was as much propriety as elegance in the banners that separated one box from another, with the initials "V" "N" "E" "A," variously distributed in the midst of circular wreaths—one initial on each banner. The retiring rooms of the State box, which comprised the saloon at the grand entry and a portion of the lobby on the grand tier, were arranged with consummate taste and prodigal magnificence. Vast mirrors multiplied the effects of the statuary, parterres of flowers, richly adorned furniture, and endless lustres which almost realized the ideal of one of the palaces of the Arabian Nights. Foremost among the manifestations of the sculptor's art were statues of Her Majesty Queen Victoria, the Empress Eugénie, and the Emperor of the French.

The illustrious party did not make their appearance until after the first act of the opera was over. The interval was passed by the audience—probably the most brilliant, if not the most numerous, ever assembled within the walls of a theatre—rather in a low sustained buzz or murmur of expectation than in attention to the performance. About a quarter to ten Her Majesty entered the state box with the Emperor Louis Napoleon, and the Empress Eugénie with his Royal Highness Prince Albert. Mr. COSTA then waving his bâton, Partant pour la Syrie was struck up, and the acclamations of the audience were graciously responded to by repeated obelisks. The French national air was succeeded by our own anthem, in which Mme. BOSIO sang the first verse, and all the company of the Royal Italian Opera, except those engaged in the performance of Fidelio, took part. The enlèvement cordial thus harmoniously established, the cheers and acclamations were renewed, until the illustrious party resumed their seats, and the Leonora overture, magnificently played by the orchestra, obtained at least some degree of consideration for the music of Beethoven. After the second and third acts of the opera, which were listened to with comparative attention, and had a far better chance of being appreciated than the first, the curtain rose, and the stage presented an unusual spectacle. Behind the principal performers and the chorus were revealed a dense mass of ladies and gentlemen in full dress, who, sooner than not be present on such an occasion, had purchased the privilege of standing before the footlights during the performance of the national anthem and Partant pour la Syrie.

Of the principal performers most of the critics reserve their judgment; but the Leader says:

Mlle. JENNY NEY comes to us recommended by a considerable reputation in Germany, and by the name of JENNY, which ever since the days of the LIND has possessed a singular fascination for the British public. Mlle. NEY made her début under circumstances most trying, but she appeared nothing daunted, and from first to last performed with ease and self-possession, singing and acting with a perfect mastery of her faculties, and a perfect control over her emotions, in the face of all that brilliant distraction. Mlle. NEY apparently enjoys the advantage (which so many would gladly forego!) of experience and maturity in her art. Powerfully constructed, and with a decided capacity for boots, with a fair complexion and a very German countenance, she wears a frank and pleasing aspect. Her voice, a thoroughly-trained and strong mezzo soprano, is round and rich in the medium notes; rather rough, it appeared to us, in the lower; and rather flat in the higher part of the register. She sang the long and difficult scena with sustained dignity and a finely-reserved emotion, and with a purity and correctness of intonation that never failed. We trust it may be said that Mlle. JENNY NEY, though not a JOANNA WAGNER, is a real acquisition to the theatre. FORMES was thoroughly at home, and always en scène, in the part of the bluff but kindly gaoler; and TAGLIAFICO is always the finished artist. On Thursday, however, he once or twice appeared a little absent, and sang beside the note. It must be confessed that the music ascribed to Pizarro is almost as ungrateful as the part, and seldom repays the most correct singing, so far as the audience is concerned. TAMBRILLI, who was gladly recognised on his prison pallet, was looking a little thinner perhaps, but in capital vocal preservation. The large phrasing and the passionate vibrato were welcomed with satisfaction by the regular opera-goers, and he gave the C in alt as a sort of emphasis to his European reputation. Mr. COSTA's orchestra played the two overtures, especially the Leonora, with even more than the usual spirit, decision, and delicacy. The chorus was neither ineffective nor remarkable. The Prisoners' chorus went off without a hand.

DRURY LANE.—Italian and German opera for the million, at ordinary play-house prices, and without the conventional restrictions of "full dress," was so successful at this theatre last year, that a new season was commenced on the 16th ult. with the Sonnambula.—The Leader says:

The Amina and the Rodolpho were far above the average, and the Elvino was at least agreeable. Mme. GASSIER, who was a favorite at the Italian Opera in Paris last winter, is a Spanish lady, with a most Castilian countenance and most Andalusian eyebrows and lashes. She looks all energy and confidence, too short in figure to be graceful, but still engaging and attractive. This is not exactly the picture of Amina: and Mme. GASSIER, we may say at once, has not the air of an ingénue. But with a piercing soprano, flexible and powerful to an extraordinary degree, and attaining unheard-of altitudes with perfect nonchalance, she sang the Come per me brilliantly, and with the finale Al non giunge "carried away" the house. It is, however, in the Barbiere di Siviglia, in which she is announced to sing on Monday, that she is seen and heard to the best advantage. Monsieur GASSIER has a clear, powerful, and smooth baritone voice, which he manages with excellent taste, and his acting is smart and intelligent.

We were agreeably disappointed at finding the Signor BERTINI not the "robust tenor" of that name, but a young man, apparently new to the stage, raw and awkward in his gestures, destitute of any dramatic pretensions, but gifted with a sweet and facile voice, well taught and judiciously used. The chorus is painstaking, and the orchestra, ably conducted by Mr. J. H. TULLY.

PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY.—The programme of the third concert, under Herr RICHARD WAGNER, was as follows:

PART I.
Sinfonia in A, No. 2.....	Mendelssohn.
Aria, "Va s'bramando," Mr. Weiss (Faust).....	Spohr.
Concerto, Pianoforte, in B flat, Op. 19, Mr. Sloper.....	Beethoven.
Aria, "Bald schlingt die Abschieds-stunde," Madame Rudersdorf.....	Mozart.
Overture, "Buryanthe".....	Weber.
PART II.
Sinfonia in C minor, No. 5.....	Beethoven.
Recit. "Im Weichsel immerdar".....	Madame Rudersdorf.
Aria, "Ja ich fühle's....."	dorf (Faust).....
Overture, Les Deux Journées	Cherubini.

The Daily News never heard the symphonies go so well, the Athenæum and the Musical World never heard them go worse. But Wagner apart, they all agree about Mr. Sloper's "masterly" performance of that early Concerto of Beethoven; and most of them about the general excellence of the vocal music, particularly that by Mme. Rudersdorf, whose first piece is said to be a musical curiosity, written by Mozart for the Zauberflöte, in the style of the two airs of the Queen of the Night, but never sung, because of its difficulties, which this lady conquered. The Athenæum, however, says "she screams."

Musical Clubs and Parties.

The amount of musical taste in a community is not necessarily to be measured by the audiences it furnishes in any given season to oratorios, operas and concerts, good, bad, or indifferent. The concert-giving experience in Boston this past winter has been somewhat discouraging to the musicians and societies, and, contrasted with the seemingly unbounded appetite for classical performances in preceding winters, has even caused the question to be mooted, whether the perhaps too much boasted musical taste of our good city can have retrograded? whether it may not have been not a real taste, but only a sham, a fashion of the hour, a superficial, feverish, contagious excitement, of which the only wonder was that it died out no sooner? These are reasonable enough questions at any time. Taste in the public at large, anywhere and in any age, is subject to its variations, is liable to be corrupted, sensualized, demoralized, in short to retrograde:—witness even Vienna, the city of Mozart, Haydn, Beethoven, Hummel, Schubert, overrun even in the life-time of Beethoven by the taking fashions of Italian opera and dance orchestras, and chiefly given up to them to this day. And there is always large allowance to be made for fashion, imitation, and all kinds of factitious influences in the eagerness with which people flock to so-called classical concerts. But in our own experience this season we see nothing really discouraging. If the concert audiences have fallen off, it does not affect our conviction, we may say our knowledge of the fact, that the number of persons in and about this city who enjoy and love the Symphonies and other great works of the masters, and who make them a matter of thought and study, a part of the earnest culture and devotion of their lives, has been very large for years past, and is much larger at this moment than it has ever been before.

Should several successive years pass without good and frequent public performances of such music, it would alter the case; for the love of beauty must be continually reanimated by the inspiring presence of beauty; but we have not yet begun to feel the drought to any very damaging extent; or, if we do not feel it, it is so far an evidence that the desire is yet alive within us; that the 'hart still panteth after the water-brooks;' and meanwhile there are other encouraging signs of musical life, devotion and improving taste among us, which are perhaps even more worthy to be counted gain, than any brief-fall measures of our concert halls which we have seen or hope to see. Think of the demand for music-teachers, and of teachers who have the spirit of Art in them. Think of "the pianoforte in every house," and of the enormous manufacture and sale of these and other musical instruments. Think how many accomplished amateur players and singers, of both sexes, now add an artistic grace to all our cultivated circles of society. Think what shopfuls of music are printed and circulated in our land, and, if the greater mass of it be trash, yet how large is the proportion of really classical, enduring works, such as the Sonatas of Beethoven, Haydn, and Mozart, the best oratorios and Masses, the Songs without Words and with words, of Mendelssohn, Schubert, &c., the favorite operas, the collections of organ music, &c. Think how wide a sale the solid publications of the house of Novello in London are acquiring in this country; how many persons, even in the humbler walks of life, have their own copies of the "Messiah," the "Creation," the "Elijah" and "St. Paul," and can lend a voice not ineffectually in the performance of these noble works.

But we have been unwittingly betrayed into this long introduction in undertaking to call attention simply to one manifestation of the progress of musical taste among us, in spite of the fluctuations of the concert business. We allude to the improvement both in quantity and quality of private musical entertainments. It may almost be said that there has been more of really good music, well performed, in private houses here this winter, than there has been in public,—excepting of course oratorios and orchestras.

Many a time, in the dearth of fresh or interesting public themes for musical report or criticism, have we wished it were allowable to tell of the choice social feasts of music which we have enjoyed in private, and to a large extent from amateur performers. These may be regarded as in some sense the most legitimate and best fruits of the inspiring concerts to which our young music-lovers have been so freely exposed for several years past. They prove how genuine and deep has been the efficacy of so much good music heard in public. They prove that it has not been listened to in vain; that it has not left the listener content with passively enjoying, but has stimulated him in his turn to some sort of musical activity. For the re-assurance of the desponding, and the confounding of the always-will-be-skeptical we may recount in general, without violation of the rights of privacy, what has been going on in this way.

First, we have already alluded to the Soirées of Italian vocal music, given by our excellent teachers Sig. CORELLI and Sig. BENDELARI, in which their pupils executed the most difficult operatic pieces in a style that would do credit to eminent professional artists. These occasions, with the preparation for them, and the stimulus they give, naturally imply not a little of such practice going on in larger or smaller circles in many private houses.

Next, as the most interesting and significant of all, perhaps, we may mention the various Clubs of amateur musicians, who meet periodically in one another's houses for the practice of certain kinds of music. Some of these have occasionally allowed a room-full of their friends to enjoy the fruits of their social study, and it has caused not a little pleasure and surprise to find how much of the highest and choicest kind of music has formed the material of this club practice, how thoroughly and conscientiously the music has been learned, and what an artistic and refining element it contributes to the ordinary social resources and amusements. In one of these clubs, composed of a dozen of our finest amateur voices, spending an evening weekly under the most severe and yet inspiring drill of a thorough German artist, it has been our privilege this winter to become acquainted with much fine German music never yet heard in our concerts. We can recall such compositions as the entire Lauda Sion and the Psalm: As the hart pants, of MENDELSSOHN; all the "Mid-summer Night's Dream" music, many four-part songs, &c., by the same; several motets by BACH; a Psalm for four soprani by FRANZ SCHUBERT; portions of SCHUMANN's "Paradise and the Peri"; an exceedingly beautiful Kyrie, and a Psalm by ROBERT FRANZ, in the most pure, religious style. These were learned and sung with rare perfection (for these parts) and, with a masterly pianoforte accompaniment, produced a sensation so unique and pure and fresh, that all felt their standard and ideal of true Art from that moment raised. Another Club, similarly composed, to which we have been a frequent listener, a model in its way for long-continuing fidelity, has been more exclusively devoted to the practice of Masses, a form of music which is as convenient for social practice, and as fascinating, as it is intrinsically good and elevating. During the winter we have heard in this way the Mass in C, by BEETHOVEN, that in D by CHERUBINI, and the Requiem of MOZART, not to speak of more familiar and easy Masses which have been from time to time revived. All these have been so thoroughly learned, as to convey to listening friends quite a conception of the music, so far as it is possible without orchestral accompaniment, large chorus, and the local charm of the cathedral. By way of dessert after solid practice, it has not been uncommon in both of these Clubs to hear some of the exquisite songs of SCHUBERT, MENDELSSOHN or FRANZ, a Sonata of BEETHOVEN, or a four-hand performance of one of the fine Symphonies, in which we have amateurs who can bear their part with the professional artists.

Clubs for Mass singing are not confined to Boston. In Salem, Lowell, Lawrence, Cambridge, Brookline, and other neighboring towns, there are or have been such, creating not a small demand for the cheap and convenient Novello editions of these works.—There is also a Club for the practice of Italian opera music under the direction of one of our most accomplished maestri di canto; and it speaks well for the disposition to shun musical intolerance and one-sided taste, that both German and Italian Clubs are in not a few instances composed of the same members, striving to do full justice to each kind of music. These are some of the musical Clubs which occur to us, and doubtless there are many more, of many kinds, among the amateurs of Boston and vicinity.

So much for Clubs. Another sign of progress is the frequency of late of classical musical parties in the houses of our wealthier amateurs, who engage the Mendelssohn Quintette Club, and other artists, to entertain their guests of an evening with choice programmes of string quartets, piano trios, sonatas, compositions of Chopin, songs of Franz and Mendelssohn and Schubert and Mozart. Really the choicest feasts of classical chamber music have been heard in this way, and the stimulus they give to musical taste, if less wide in circumference, is perhaps deeper and truer in quality and as far-reaching in the end, than that that usually proceeds from concerts. Among the many programmes of such occasions we may cite the following, for a sample, and let this end our rambling talk for this time, hoping that we have shown some reason for the belief that musical taste has not after all been dying out among us.

Trio in B flat, op. 11.....	Beethoven.
Aria, "Rendi il sereno al sigillo,".....	Handel.
Sonata for Piano and Violin, in F, op. 24.....	Beethoven.
Polonaise: } for Piano.....	Chopin.
La Berceuse: }
Trio in D minor, op. 49.....	Mendelssohn.
Aria, "Saria pur dolce amore,".....	Marcello.
Polacca for Piano and Violoncello.....	Chopin.

New Music.

Our table groans with the piles of newly published pieces or collections of music, reprints of entire works, manuals, methods, scientific text-books, &c., which have been accumulating during the month past, and for which the publishers collectively and singly have our thanks. It is impossible publicly to notice, or even to read through them all as fast as they come along; and many of them, it must be confessed, are scarcely worth the notice and find their publics chiefly through the absence of such features as may be supposed to interest the readers of an Art journal. But many also are of various degrees of excellence and real value, such as it is well that the right-minded student or amateur should know of. We do what we can to-day to reduce the pile of the unnoticed, meaning to make repeated onslaughts on the same until it shall all be disposed of.

Foremost as ever, and most abounding in (we can often say) good works, comes that indefatigable publisher, OLIVER DITSON, from whose many and multifarious sendings we for the present single out the following:

1. A New and Complete Edition of the Favorite Songs, Duets and Trios of MOZART. This is a reprint of a London serial, consisting of some thirty or forty choice selections from Mozart's operas and occasional songs, with the original Italian or German words and a new English version, the whole arranged from the scores and adapted to the English by S. S. WESLEY, Mus. Doc. The list includes all the best things, for one, two or three voices, from Le Nozze di Figaro, Don Giovanni, Zauberflöte, Idomeno, and La Clemenza di Tito, besides half a dozen of his simple little songs, like "Come, Lovely May," "Forget me not," &c. Among those already issued (which may be had singly) are the duet: La ci darem from Don Giovanni; the baritone buffo song: Non piu andrai, from the Figaro; and the duet: Crudel, perchè finora, from the same. The music itself requires no recommendation; every singer of course wants to have these pieces, when he can have them in correct, elegant and cheap copies, such as these are.

2. The Harp of Italy (Lira d'Italia). Another serial Collection of Vocal Extracts, from the popular Italian operas, with Italian and English words. These are pieces to which the operatic amateur would make constant reference, if he had them by him, and here he has them in convenient and attractive form. Those already received are: 1. the great Quintet, Chi mi frena, from Lucia; 2. Vicino a chi s'adora, quartet from Il Giuramento; 3. the trio: Ah qual vittima, from Norma; 4. Qual volutta, trio from I Lombardi; 5. Di tanti regi, the rich and stately quartet from the first scene of Semiramide; 6. E rimasto la impietrato ("Like a statue without motion"), the humorous and exceedingly effective quartet from Don Pasquale. There are many more in prospect.

3. L'Art du Chant appliqué au Piano, by THALBERG. We have before spoken of the principal numbers of this very useful series of transcriptions of vocal pieces (from Mozart, Beethoven, Pergolesi, Stradella, Rossini, Bellini, and others) for the piano, after the peculiar manner of Thalberg, who makes the voice-parts, solo or concerted, sing upon the instruments, with accompaniments above and below; the voice-part or melody being engraved in larger characters than the rest, to indicate that it is to be thrown forward distinctly and prominently in the execution. We have now Nos. 8 and 9 of the series. These are a beautiful Larghetto ballad from WEBER's Preciosa, and the chorus of Conspirators from MEYERBEER's Il Crociato. A song from SCHUBERT's Müllerin series, the Duet from Der Freyschütz, and MOZART's Il mio tesoro are the remaining subjects. All the subjects are interesting, and the transcriptions faithful and effective, so that they afford capital practice in the art of illustrating a melody, with great richness of accompaniment, through the medium of one pair of hands. The edition is one of the most elegant specimens of music engraving which we have seen. The separate numbers cost 75 cents each, but the whole series of twelve, bound, is marked $5.00.

NATHAN RICHARDSON (Musical Exchange), publishes among other things the following:

1. Menuet de MOZART, arranged for piano by SCHULHOFF. This is that graceful and perfect little Minuet and Trio, from the E flat Symphony, which was so charmingly played by Mr. SATTER. It proves that good music may become extremely popular.

2. Ave Maria, ballad by ROBERT FRANZ. Those who remember OTTO DRESSEL's concerts and Miss LEHMANN's singing, (and who can forget them?)

will eagerly possess themselves of a copy of this lofty, pure and lovely melody, which is not difficult, so far as mere execution is concerned. The English words are singable, and a pretty close translation of the German of GRIEKE, which is also given.

3. On the Sea; ballad by FRANZ SCHUBERT, German and English words. Characteristic, wild and fascinating.

4. The Mignon Song, by FRANZ SCHUBERT. This is the sad little song in "Wilhelm Meister": Nur wer die Sehnsucht kennt, &c., treated by Schubert in very much the same manner in which Beethoven has treated it in one or two of his four settings of the same; only Schubert develops the simple and sad strain to greater length.

5. Sixty-Six Interludes in the most usual Major Keys for the Organ, Seraphine or Melodeon, by J. HILTON JONES. These are short strains, only a line each in length, and all essentially of the same character of expression, which is solid and church-like. They are in true organ style, the four parts of the harmony having each its individual movement, and therefore good to put into the hands of young players at church organs, whom it is seldom safe to leave to the inspirations of their own-fingers. But why all in the major key? And why only two varieties of measure, the common, and the three-four? Or is this little book but the beginning of a series?

CONCERTS.

Mlle. GABRIELLE DE LAMOTTE's fourth and last concert took place at Chickering's, on Thursday evening. A large and highly respectable audience, including many of the truest music-lovers, were highly satisfied with the execution of the programme, which was choice and classical. For her own part, she had selected three very formidable compositions, a Trio, a Concerto and a Fugue. The well-known Trio by MENDELSSOHN, in D minor, was a large undertaking for a young lady, and we could only be astonished at the power and certainty and firmness with which she went through it, showing that she had studied carefully the character of its nervous Allegro, its tranquil and religious Andante, its light and sparkling Scherzo, and its impassioned Finale,—although the latter we thought taken hardly fast enough; and one missed a certain vitalizing and poetic something in the whole. More caution in the use of the pedals would obviate the blur felt in some passages. Yet the execution was highly creditable and showed progress. The Fugue of BACH, in A minor, one of those florid, delicate arabesques, was smoothly played, but rather lifelessly. The Concert-Stück of WEBER seemed a less anxious performance, and came out with a freedom, grace and brilliancy that were quite effective. It was much her happiest effort. The Concert-Stück had a fine septet accompaniment, by the Messrs. FRIES, MEISEL, EICHLER, (strings), and KREBS (flute), RYAN, (clarinet), and DE RIBAS (oboe). The brothers Fries did well their part in the Trio.

THE MENDELSSOHN QUINTETTE CLUB contributed an Andante from HAYDN's Quartet in D, and Quintet arrangements of two piano pieces: viz. BEETHOVEN's Andante Favori and one of the Lieder ohne Worte. Mrs. WENTWORTH sang with her usual purity and sweetness a Latin hymn (Eccle Panis) by CHERUBINI, a Mozart-like sort of melody, not unlike the same composer's Ave Maria, and HAYDN's charming canzonet: "My mother bids me bind her hair."

The CONCERT by the PYNE and HARRISON troupe on Wednesday night of last week was a good old-fashioned English concert, and gave such pleasure that nearly every piece was called for twice and even thrice. This was the case with each of the Gleees, which led to quite a series of them; and they were nicely sung, save that the unaccompanied voices did not fall into quite perfect tune the first time. Miss LOUISA PYNE's singing of "Cease your Funning," with variations, and of BENEDICT's "Sky-Lark," was in her most admirable style, and she fed the appetite of the delighted audience with some charming ballads, accompanying herself. Her sister also sang a ballad very sweetly. Mr. HORNCASTLE gave the Cinderella Song: "Ye tormentors" and Hatton's "Simon, the Cellarer," with much comic humor. The programme was exceedingly long, and everything had to be repeated, even to one of those everlasting sentimental ditties of the Balfe order, by Mr. BORRANI, whom a portion of the audience would compel to "sing that (tedious) song again." Mr. HARRISON was perhaps more frequently in tune than usual.

The Farewell Concert, Saturday afternoon, was equally successful. So perfect a singer as Miss LOUISA PYNE will always be welcomed back to Boston.

MR. SATTER had a crowded and delighted audience, of some 300 persons, at his piano concert at the Norfolk House, last week, and proposes soon to give another.

ITALIAN OPERA.—The mere announcement of ROSSINI's "William Tell," his greatest opera, at the Boston Theatre, on Monday evening, will be enough to call out all our music-lovers. It is a rare chance, and a brief one, and we must improve it while it lasts.

Meanwhile Opera in New York seems in a hopeless snarl of disagreements. The LAGRANGE and MIRAGE troupes coalesced with the Academy, and sang there but one night, before there was a general falling out. What becomes of the new troupe we do not learn; the Academy is closed against them; they have lost the chance of Niblo's, and the Academy party also pre-occupy our Boston Theatre. We shall have nothing to complain of.

CLASSICAL TRIO CONCERT. The fourth and last concert of those very able artists, Messrs. GARTNER, HAUSE and JUNGNICKEL, will take place in the beautiful saloon of Messrs. HALLET and DAVIS, this evening. Those who go will hear much admirable music played by very skillful hands.

MISS ELISE HENSLEY.—The papers have already announced the probable return of our young prima donna to America. Her father's continued illness has made it impossible for her to continue in Europe without his protection and under the constant anxiety which his condition brought upon her. She is endeavoring to bring him home, and at last accounts had arrived in Paris after a painful journey. We may expect to welcome her in Boston before many weeks.

Musical Fund Society.—At a special meeting of this Society, the following gentlemen were elected officers for the ensuing season:—President, C. C. Perkins; Vice President, T. C. Comer; Secretary, Thos. Ryan; Treasurer, S. S. Pearce; Librarian, Henry Fries; Auditor, A. Fries; 1st Associate, F. Fries; 2d Associate, C. H. Eichler; Trustees, Thos. B. Chickering, S. E. Guild, Geo. T. Bigelow, J. P. Bradlee, John Bigelow.

THE AMERICAN HARP:

A COLLECTION OF NEW AND ORIGINAL

CHURCH MUSIC,

COMPOSED AND ARRANGED

BY CHARLES ZEUNER.

THE above excellent work has been the basis of a majority of the popular collections of Sacred Music for the last dozen or fifteen years; and though nearly a quarter of a century has elapsed since its first issue, it yet retains an unquestioned superiority over all similar works, and is esteemed by musical amateurs as the choicest volume to which they have access. It has been for a number of years out of print. Copies could but with great difficulty be obtained; and the value in which the few to be found were held, together with the actual merits of the work, repeatedly alluded to by the best judges of Church Music, induced the undersigned to publish it, and the public can now be supplied at the following rates:

From the New York Daily Tribune.
There is no better musical critic in the country than John S. Dwight, of Boston, and few men are able to express what they have to say about music in a manner at once so poetic and precise. His articles are sure to please the learned in music, and to delight its lovers. We commend his journal unreservedly to our musical friends as a work which will be an able running commentary upon musical events, extracting from each its significance, varying its critical notices of music and musicians, both new and old, with biographical and entertaining details; and always true to what is most interesting and commanding in this noblest of the Arts.

From the Boston Evening Transcript.
Wherever there is a piano-forte, this Journal ought to be lying on it.

From the Boston Atlas.
We need just such a paper. One which is subservient to no particular clique of book-makers, or society agents, or managerial interests. One which tells truly what is good and what is bad, in the honest convictions of the writer. Mr. Dwight unites more qualifications to hold the judge's chair than any other writer with whose powers we are acquainted. His genial warmth of feeling is united to an acute perception of the beauties of executional Art; while a long and earnest study of the great composers of the world has rendered him familiar with, and an appreciator of, their noble works.

Beethoven's Instrumental Music.

FROM THE GERMAN OF E. F. A. HOFFMANN.

(Concluded from last week.)

How deeply, most noble master, have thy glorious Piano-Forte compositions impressed themselves upon my mind! How shallow and insignificant does everything now appear to me, that does not belong to thee, to the genial MOZART, or the mighty genius, SEBASTIAN BACH!—With what delight did I receive thy seventieth opus, those two glorious Trios—for I knew very well that after a short time of practice, I should have them rendered to perfection. And this happiness has indeed been mine this evening, so that now, like one who, strolling about in the labyrinthine paths, lined with all kinds of rare trees, strange plants, and exquisite flowers, of a fantastic park, becomes more and more entangled in them, I cannot find my way out of the wondrous turns and complications of thy Trios. The lovely syren-voices of those passages, resplendent in gay variety, draw me in deeper and deeper.

I have ever been of the opinion that the piano-forte is much more useful in Harmony than in Melody. The most delicate expression of which this instrument is capable does not give to melody the energetic life, with its thousands of shadings, which the bow of the violinist, the breath of the wind-instrument player is able to call forth. The performer combats in vain with the insurmountable difficulty presented to him by a mechanism, which causes the strings to vibrate and resound by a blow. On the other hand there is no instrument (with the exception of the harp, which is, however, much more limited,) that, like the piano, takes in at once the whole realm of harmony, and displays its treasures to the connoisseur in the most wondrous forms and shapes.

When the imagination of a composer has seized upon an entire tone-picture, with rich groups, brilliant lights, and deep shadows, he can call it into life at his piano, so that it comes forth, in gay and dazzling colors, from the inner world. A full score, the true magic-book of music, which conceals beneath its signs and figures, all the wonders of tone art, the mysterious chorus of the most manifold instruments, receives life under the hands of a master pianist, and a composition thus played, correctly and in all its parts, from the score, may be compared to a finely executed engraving from a large painting. The piano is therefore peculiarly adapted for improvising, for playing from the score, for single chords, for solo-Sonatas, etc., as also for Trios, Quartets, Quintets, etc., where the usual string-instruments join in, and which certainly belong to the order of piano compositions, because, if they are correctly composed, that is, truly in four, five or more parts, everything depends on the harmonic working up, which of itself excludes the display of single instruments in brilliant passages.

I have a real aversion against all Concertos for the piano. (Those of Mozart and Beethoven are not so much Concertos, as Symphonies, with piano obligato.) They are intended to display the virtuosity of the solo-player in brilliant passages and in expressive melody; but the best performer on the finest instrument strives in vain for what the violinist, for instance, attains with but little difficulty.

Each Solo sounds stiff and tame after the full tutti of the violins and wind instruments, and we admire the execution, the flexibility of finger, without receiving any impression upon our heart and mind.

How admirably has the master conceived the peculiar spirit of this instrument (the piano) and provided for it in the most appropriate manner!

A simple, but fruitful melodic theme, which is capable of the most various contrapuntal involutions, abridgements, etc., lies at the foundation of every movement; all the other motives and figures bear a close relation to the main theme, so that all the instruments are brought into requisition to combine and arrange the whole to the highest degree of unity. This is the structure of the whole; but, in this skilful edifice, the loveliest pictures intermingle in restless flight, in which joy and pain, sadness and bliss, appear beside and within each other. Wierd forms join in an airy dance, now fading away to a mere point of light, then dispersing in brilliant and dazzling rays, and chasing and pursuing each other in divers groups; and in the midst of this unlocked spirit-world the soul listens, enraptured, to the unknown language, and comprehends all the most secret longings and presentiments with which it has been seized.

That composer alone has really penetrated into the mysteries of Harmony, who, by it, can impress the soul of man; to him the numerical proportions, which to the grammarian without genius are mere lifeless, uninteresting arithmetical calculations, are magic formulas, by means of which he conjures up an enchanted world.

Notwithstanding the geniality which pervades particularly the first Trio, not even excepting the mournful Largo, the genius of Beethoven still remains at all times serious and solemn. It seems as if the master were of opinion that deep, mysterious subjects, even when the mind, closely familiar with them, experiences a joyous and cheerful elevation, should never be spoken of in common-place, but only in glorious, exalted words; the dance-music of the priests of Isis can be nothing but a hymn of lofty jubilee.

Instrumental music, where it is intended to influence only through itself, as Music, and not to serve, perhaps, for a peculiar dramatic purpose, must avoid every thing trivial and jocose, all flippant lazzi. A deep nature seeks for the presentiments of joy which, more beautiful and glorious than here in this narrow world, have come to us from an unknown land, and wakened an inner, blissful life within our bosom, a higher expression than plain words, which are peculiar only to the limited pleasures of earth, can give.

This seriousness, which pervades all the instrumental and piano music of Beethoven, naturally banishes all the break-neck passages up and down with both hands, all the preposterous leaps, the ridiculous caprices, the excessively high notes, of the extra octaves, in which modern piano compositions abound. In point of technical execution, the piano compositions of this master present no particular difficulties, as every practised pianist will easily conquer the few runs, triplet figures, etc.; and yet their rendering is in most respects exceedingly difficult. Many a so-called virtuoso objects to Beethoven's piano music, repeating the excuse: "Very difficult, and very ungrateful to the listeners!" As regards the difficulty, a correct, easy rendering of Beethoven's compositions requires nothing less than that we should thoroughly understand him, that we should penetrate deep into his nature; that, in the consciousness of our own consecration we should bravely venture to step into the circle of magic apparitions which his mighty wand calls forth. He who does not feel this consecration in himself, who cultivates the acquaintance of the holy Musica only as an amusement, as a pastime in leisure hours, as a momentary tickling of dulled ears, or for his own ostentation, had better leave her entirely. It is only such a one who can offer the excuse: "very ungrateful!" The true artist lives only in the work which he has conceived in the spirit of the master and now executes. He disdains to bring his own person into play, and all his aspirations tend towards calling into life, in a thousand dazzling colors, all the beauteous, enchanting forms and pictures which the master, with magic power, has concealed in his work, so that they wreath around the listener in bright, sparkling circles, and, inflaming his imagination, his innermost being, bear him in rapid flight to the distant spirit-world of tones.

M. A. R.

The Bob-o-link.

The happiest bird of our spring, and one that rivals the European lark, in my estimation, is the Bobolink, or Bobolink, as he is commonly called. He arrives at that choice portion of our year, which, in our latitude, answers to the description so often given by our poets. With us, it generally begins about the middle of May, and lasts until nearly the middle or the last of June. Earlier than this, winter is apt to return on its traces, and to blight the opening beauties of the year; and later than this, begins the parching, and dissolving heats of summer. But in this genial interval, nature is in all her freshness and fragrance; "the rains are over and gone, the flowers appear upon the earth, the time of the singing of birds is come, and the voice of the turtle is heard in the land." The trees are now in their fullest foliage and brightest verdure; the woods are gay with the clustering flowers of the laurels; the air is perfumed by the sweet brier and the wild rose; the meadows are enamelled with clover blossoms; while the young apple, the peach and the plum begin to swell and the cherry to glow among the green leaves.

This is the chosen season of revelry of Bobolink. He comes amidst the pomp and fragrance of the season; his life seems all sensibility and enjoyment, all song and sunshine. He is to be found in the soft bosoms of the freshest and sweetest meadows; and is most in song when the clover is in blossom. He perches on the topmost twig of a tree, or on some long flaunting weed, and as he rises and sinks with the breeze, pours forth a succession of rich tinkling notes; crowding one upon another, like the outpouring melody of the sky-lark, and possessing the same rapturous character. Sometimes he pitches from the summit of a tree, begins his song as soon as he gets upon the wing, and flutters tremulously down to the earth, as if overcome with ecstasy at his own music. Sometimes he is in pursuit of his paramour; always in full song, as if he would win her by his melody, and always with the same appearance of intoxication and delight.

Of all the birds of our groves and meadows, the bob-o-link was the envy of my boyhood. He crossed my path in the sweetest weather, and the sweetest season of the year, when all nature called to the fields, and the rural feeling throbbed in every bosom; but when I, luckless urchin, was doomed to be shut up during the live-long day, in that purgatory of boyhood, the school-room.

It seemed as if the little varlet mocked at me, as he flew by in full song, to taunt me with his happier lot. O, how I envied him! No lessons, no task, no hateful school, nothing but holiday, frolic, fields and fine weather. Had I been then more versed in poetry, I might have addressed him in those beautiful words of Logan to the cuckoo:

"Sweet bird! thy bower is ever green,
Thy sky is ever clear;
Thou hast no sorrow in thy song,
No winter in thy year.

"O! could I fly, I'd fly with thee;
We'd make, on joyful wing,
Our annual visit round the globe:
Companions of the Spring!"

Further observation and experience have given me a different idea of this little feathered voluptuary, which I will venture to impart for the benefit of my schoolboy readers, who may regard him with the same unqualified admiration which I once indulged. I have shown him only as I saw him at first, in what I call the poetical part of his career, when he in a manner devoted himself to elegant pursuits and enjoyments, and was a bird of music and song, and taste and sensibility and refinement. While this lasted, he was sacred from injury; the very schoolboy would not fling a stone at him, and the merest rustic would pause to listen to his strain.

But mark the difference. As the year advances, as the clover blossoms disappear, and the spring fades into summer, he gradually gives up his elegant tastes and habits; doffs his poetical suit of black, assumes a russet, dusty garb, and sinks to the gross enjoyment of common vulgar birds. His notes no longer vibrate on the ear, he is stuffing himself with the seeds of the tall weeds on which he lately swung and chanted so melodiously. He has become a "bon vivant," a "gourmand;" with him now there is nothing like the "joys of the table;" and in a little time he grows tired of plain, homely fare, and is off on a gastronomical tour in quest of foreign luxuries.

We next hear of him with myriads of his kind, banqueting among the reeds of the Delaware, and grown corpulent with good feeding. He has changed his name in travelling. Bobolink no more—he is the Reed-bird now; the much-sought-for tit-bit of Pennsylvania epicures; the rival in unlucky fame of the Ortolan! Wherever he goes pop! pop! pop! every rusty firelock in the country is blazing away. He sees his companions falling by thousands around him.

Does he take warning and reform? Alas! not he. Incurable epicure! again he wings his flight. The rice fields of the South invite him. He gorges himself among them almost to bursting; he can scarcely fly for corpulency. He has once more changed his name, and is now the famous Rice-bird of the Carolinas.

Last stage of his career; behold him spitted, with dozens of his corpulent companions, served up, a vaunted dish on the table of some Southern gastronome.

Such is the story of the Bobolink; once spiritual, musical, admired, the joy of the meadows, and the favorite bird of Spring; finally, a gross little sensualist, who expiates his sensuality in the larder.—Wolfert's Roost.

Vincenzo Bellini.

Of the three Italian composers, who are most known to the present generation of opera-goers, VINCENZO BELLINI seems to enjoy public favor the most constant and the least interrupted. ROSSINI'S operas, with the exception of Guillaume Tell, are patronized only by such Italian troupes as prefer foreign countries to their own "mother of the arts." DONIZETTI'S works, it is true, are often performed; but it must be remembered that Donizetti died only a few years since, while Bellini, notwithstanding nearly twenty years have elapsed since his death, is still, perhaps, the most necessary composer for all managers in all countries; and his rôles, certain of them at least, must form part of the repertory of every singer. We have often thought that the public would at last tire of Norma, I Puritani, Sonnambula, and I Capuletti e Montecchi; but, no! every performance of each of these operas is sure to call forth new proofs of the sympathy of the public. And why is this? Is there any thing especial in the plots, the scenery, the costumes, or the mere musical treatment of these operas? Are there any of those accessories which play so great a rôle in modern operas, and which often decide a success? Certainly not; the costumer and the machinist, the lover of variety in plot, of wild and passionate scenes, or of romantic horrors, will find very little to suit their peculiar tastes, and as to those qualities which are demanded especially by the musician, it almost seems as if poor Bellini were quite ignorant of what they are. And yet we have all experienced, more or less, that his operas do not fail even to impress those who look mainly to the intellectuality of a dramatic work. Even WAGNER tells us that there was a time in his own history when he could not resist the charm of Bellini's melodies; when in them he found consolation and comfort for the troubles of life. This is, perhaps, the greatest triumph absolute melody has ever attained.

Bellini is the hero of absolute melody, of Italian love music; here lie his power, his strength, his genius. He had the gift of melody, and very little besides. And in this gift of melody we find the key to the continued success he has enjoyed. There will always come a time in every man's life when the sweet sounds of love and the voluptuous abandon to sentiment will attract him and win his admiration; there will always be a period of every one's history when Bellini's music will best reflect his own mind; and this will be more especially true should he chance to belong to the numerous class of dilettanti, whose only desire from music is to be moved, it matters not much how. Bellini appeals to the young—young in years, young in experience, and, let us add it boldly, young in musical education. With eighteen years, and a superficial knowledge of music, the duo of Norma and Adalgisa, or the finale of Norma will be the utmost that heart, taste, or intelligence will require. But if musical and intellectual development follows, there will come, sooner or later, the time when these beauties will suffice no longer; when the appetite will crave more solid, substantial, and nourishing food. To young ladies and beardless youth the sweet wines of Muscat may always prove refreshing; but men will demand a healthier, more vigorous product of the grape. Alas! for that musician who, in his thirtieth year, will experience the same sensations in listening to Bellini's music that came upon him when a younger man! He would surely prove by this that he had no vocation for his art.

It is not the abundance of melody alone which will make an opera successful. SCHUBERT had the gift of melody as much as any one, and still his operas were a decided failure; and almost all successors, in the path of song-composition, have met with the same result in regard to their operas. There must be something else to weigh down the balance of public favor. The Italians seek this generally in the successive gradation of the motives, without having recourse to heavy means, such as over-laden orchestration or full harmonization of the vocal masses. Here, in our opinion, may be found the principal secret of the successes of most Italian operas. Bellini followed the same path, popularizing his ideas; and as he, for the most part, composed only to such libretti as afforded him abundant opportunity of satisfying his sentimentality, and his love for tears and sorrow, his melodies often appear to have a dramatic coloring, although the higher claims of a dramatic work are totally neglected. His orchestration and his modulations are as poor as they well could be; and it is only in his last work, I Puritani, that he has showed himself capable of improvement, and given promise of better things. Still, the French art of instrumentation was not an appropriate acquirement for Bellini; it placed him out of his element; he appears much greater, and far more natural, in such works as permitted him to let loose the full stream of his Italian melodies, and left him untrammelled by any other consideration than an appeal to his never-failing source—tears and lamentations. Norma, Sonnambula, and some parts of I Capuletti e Montecchi are, in our opinion, the brightest emanations of his genius. The purity and naturalness of his melodies; the prevalence of sentiment in them, and the simplicity of his style; the fortunate circumstance that he abandoned the style of Rossini, of which the operatic world had already become somewhat tired; and, more than all, the fact that the greatest singers of modern times, RUBINI, TAMBURINI, PASTA, MALIBRAN, and GRISI found in his creations the means of displaying their powers and genius; all these, together with the fact, that the epoch during which he composed, from 1820 to 1830, reflected to a strong degree his peculiar characteristic—that of general relaxation—may be considered as the sources of his triumphs and successes; sources which will be inexhaustible, so long as there is a demand for Italian prime donne, for opera in its present form, and for appeals to the sentimentalities of youth.

Bellini lived only thirty-three years. Born in 1802 in Catania, (Sicily,) he died in France in 1835, at the proper time for the establishment of his fame, in our opinion. He died at a time when HEINRICH HEINE, one of the most spirituel of modern authors, was in the habit of telling him that he had attained the most dangerous age for men of genius, as the period from thirty to thirty-four was generally considered. Poor Bellini! In consequence of this he was almost afraid to approach the tormenting Heine, who most assuredly had no idea that his prophecy would so soon be fulfilled.

As to the characteristics of the man, Bellini, his personal appearance and manners, we can have no better delineator than Heine himself, who has given one of the best sketches of the Italian maestro we have seen. We translate from Heine as follows:

"Bellini was of a tall, up-shooting, slender figure, which always moved gracefully; coquettish, ever looking as though just emerged from a band-box; a regular, but large, delicately rose-tinted face; light, almost golden hair, worn in wavy curls; a high, very high, marble forehead, straight nose, light blue eyes, well-sized mouth, and rounded chin. His features had something vague in them, a want of character, something milk-like; and in this milk-like face flitted sometimes a painful-pleasing expression of sorrow. This expression in his face took the place of the fire that was wanting; but it was that of a sorrow without depth; it glanced, but unpoetically, from his eyes; it played, but without passion, upon his lips. It was this pointless, shallow sorrow that the young maestro seemed most willing to represent in his whole appearance. His hair was dressed so fancifully sad; his clothes flitted so languishingly round his delicate body; he carried his cane so idyl-like, that he reminded me of the young shepherds we find in our pastorals, with their crooks decorated with ribbons, and their gayly-colored jackets and pants. And then his walk was so innocent, so airy, so sentimental. The whole man looked like a sigh, in pumps and silk stockings. He has met with much sympathy from women, but I doubt if he has ever produced a strong passion in any one. To me his appearance had always something ludicrously distasteful, one cause of which may have been his French. Although Bellini had lived several years in Paris, he spoke the language as badly—as badly as it can not be heard even in England. I should not say "badly;" this word is really too good; horrible, outrageous, end-of-the-world-like, would better express the idea. If one met him in society, treating the poor French words like a hangman, and constantly displaying his monstrous blunders, he would think the world about to perish amidst thunderings unheard before. The utmost silence then pervaded the whole room; mortal fright was painted upon every countenance; the women seemed uncertain whether to faint or run away; the men glanced confusedly at their habiliments, fearing lest some button had been forgotten; and most horrible of all, this fright produced a sort of convulsive desire to laugh which it was impossible to resist. For this reason, in society a proximity to Bellini always impressed you with a sense of alarm, which, nevertheless, had in it a dreadful charm, and attracted as well as repelled. Sometimes his involuntary puns were only amusing, and reminded one by their funny insipidity of the castle of his countryman, the Prince Pallagoni, which Goethe describes in his pictures of Italian travels, as a museum of fearful distortions, and incongruously coupled deformities. As on such occasions Bellini was always confident that he had said something quite harmless and very serious, the expression of his face formed the strongest contrast with the sense of his words. That peculiarity, which displeased me in his face, was always most prominent at such times. But still I will not say but that this very expression had some charm for the ladies. Bellini's face, as well as his whole appearance, had that physical freshness, that flesh-bloom, that rose-color which invariably produces an unpleasant impression upon me. It was only at a later period, when I had been acquainted with Bellini for some time, that I felt any inclination toward him. This resulted from the discovery that his character was, throughout, noble and good. His mind had certainly remained pure and unsullied by contact with evil.

He was endowed also with that harmless, good-natured, that child-like nature, which is never found wanting in men of genius, even if they do not expose it to the gaze of all mankind."

Has the Taste for Classical Music in Boston Retrograded?

The concerts of the Musical Fund Society the past season have not succeeded! Only five, of the eight concerts subscribed and paid for, were given; and there is a considerable deficit yet to be paid by the members of the society. The choral societies also, have not been sufficiently patronized. Even the season before the last, when there was neither a new theatre nor opera, there was a falling off in the Germania concerts.

But, notwithstanding these adverse facts, it may still be possible that the taste for classical music among us has not declined. The failures of the concerts may be owing to other causes. We have now ten pianists—many who excel in classical compositions—where we had one twenty years ago. We have young ladies, who join and readily take their parts in a Requiem, a Mass, etc.; amateurs who perform Beethoven's Quartets also; Soirées, both in Boston and its vicinity, of the best classical compositions, vocal and instrumental. The facilities of traveling to and from Europe have also enabled many to hear music in perfection abroad, while within a few years a VIEUXTEMPS, a LEOPOLD DE MEYER, and many others, not excepting JULLIEN'S Band, have given a new idea of what may be accomplished in instrumental music. All this has tended to improve the public taste. People are better judges and will not now put up with imperfections which they did not notice several years ago.

Another cause of the failure of classical concerts may be found in the want of means, under our system of low prices of admission, to render classical music as it should be given—that is, on a sufficiently large scale. For example, one of your correspondents, speaking in raptures of a concert given by the pupils of the Conservatoire in Paris, says: "Only think of BEETHOVEN'S Ninth Symphony given by the orchestra of the Conservatoire!" We have heard the Ninth Symphony here in Boston; but how was it done? (Not but that I felt grateful to obtain even a homœopathic idea of it.) Instead of in a hall holding, as your correspondent says, when packed as closely as possible, 1300 persons, and with an ample and efficient orchestra, we had it here in a hall (to say the least) not remarkably favorable for sound, and holding more than twice that number,—done by four first violins (excellent ones to be sure,) two double basses, etc., etc., against or along with a complete set of reeds, brass, tympani, etc. The whole of this stupendous composition—particularly the opening of the choral Finale, which commences with a solo recitative by the double basses, sounded "pigmyish," as was very aptly remarked by a musical person who had heard it in Vienna with the imposing effect of eighteen double basses. I have listened to the Handel and Haydn Society, with a chorus of two or three hundred (whom no one will accuse of singing too subdued), against four first violins, two basses, etc. I could not help thinking that if each member of the stringed quartet had played in a different key, it would not have made the least difference.

The modern oratorios are not like those of HANDEL, where the ideas of the composer are principally in the vocal parts. In the later compositions of this class, by HAYDN, BEETHOVEN, SPOHR, MENDELSSOHN, the effect is more intended to be produced by the ensemble: that is, it depends nearly as much upon the instrumental as upon the vocal parts; and if they are not balanced, or if the string quartet is so inefficient as not to be heard, and the voices too overpowering, it becomes a mere noise, a fiasco, and does not convey the composer's meaning.

I happened to enter the hall one evening last winter, when one of our orchestras had commenced the finale to MOZART'S Symphony in E flat, and were just at the passage for violins:

not a note of which could be heard, but only drums and the rest of the noisy instruments.—Now I ask what gratification, or what ideas of music can an audience derive from hearing nothing but  to the end of the passage?

But how can a society afford to pay for an efficient orchestra at present prices, unless the hall be entirely filled with paying subscribers? In London or Paris the prices of admission are generally half a guinea and ten francs; even in Germany, where money circulates in less abundance, the prices for occasional concerts are one thaler, and two thalers for such as those of VIEUXTEMPS, LISZT, &c.; and nearer home, the Philharmonic subscribers in New York pay ten dollars for four concerts, and one dollar and fifty cents for single tickets. It is clear that we must have halls constantly filled to make orchestral concerts pay.

How can this be brought about? It is possible that there may have arisen a want of confidence in the public, compared with its reliance upon the conduct of the old Academy's concerts. Subscribers were then sure to get what was promised, and though the means at that time were limited, yet symphonies were listened to and enjoyed in the old Odeon by full and intelligent audiences.

How has it been lately? For several seasons past, it is confessed that there has been a want of unity in the Musical Fund Society, which has greatly diminished the public confidence in it. The Germania promised in their last list for subscribers that they would have an orchestra of fifty members;—a number they were unable to produce. Again, the Music Hall is not favorable to the performance of classical compositions. Unlike most large halls, it resembles what the fashionable milliners call a "trying color;" it brings the smallest imperfections into prominence; its echoes appear to resound only to brass instruments, kettle drums, piccolo, etc. Good music in it is like Hamlet in the hands of a certain coarse, vulgar "star" actor—anything but the refined, philosophical, melancholy and gentleman-like Hamlet of Shakspeare. But the hall may be improved, and it is hoped that the directors may be able to render it more suited to its original purpose.

In fine, we think any one who considers these suggestions, will arrive at my conclusion, that musical good taste in Boston has not retrograded, but been overpowered and kept under by repeated disappointments and want of judicious fostering. I cannot help thinking that there is more real liking for and appreciation of classical music in Boston than in any, even larger, cities in the Union, and that if the wants of the musical public are properly catered for, the future will show the correctness of my views.

Confidence must be re-awakened; subscribers must be sure that the inducements held forth will be fully realized. In Europe, Royalty and Nobility are the great supporters of the most refined public amusements; even in Havana several of the most wealthy citizens subscribed five hundred dollars each for Sig. Marti, to enable him to engage first-rate talent for the opera. Here, in a republican city, we must look to the public-spirited of our citizens, who occupy the first position in our society. Why cannot from ten to one hundred of this class among us be found, who will subscribe for a fund of, say one thousand dollars, and offer in this way, and in the choice of well-known directors, a guaranty for a series of classical concerts the coming season? I think the thing might be managed without difficulty. In this way an efficient orchestra could be easily engaged (for Boston can produce one,) and both artists and subscribers feel an assurance of mutual benefit. The musical public would soon begin to look forward to each concert, say every other Saturday, as a feast in advance, and would soon show that the city has taste enough to reward liberally good performances of the best music.

When I came to Boston in '41, I was agreeably surprised to hear a symphony for the first time after my departure from Europe. Now, as my departure (not for another continent or city, but for "that bourne whence no traveller returns") is approaching rather faster than I could wish, I hope yet, before bidding adieu to many kind and indulgent friends, to see Boston taking that pre-eminence in classical music which has always been conceded to her in most other departments of intellectual culture.

WM. KEYZER.

Diary Abroad.—No. 16.

BERLIN, April 4.—This afternoon heard GRAUN's Tod Jesu (Death of Jesus) in the Garrison church. I heard it four years since in the same place and was not mightily carried away with it. Thought perhaps the fault lay in the hearer. As compared with HANDEL's, HAYDN's MENDELSSOHN's oratorios, I like it even less than before. The best things in it to my ear, are so much like Handel imitated—(did Graun in 1754 know Handel's oratorios?) that they sounded feeble. A certain dramatic progress, leading to a climax, seems to me to be a necessity in an Oratorio as well as in an Opera. If it be said that this is a Cantata and not an Oratorio, why, I like Oratorio much better. These long narratives in recitative, ending often with "And Jesus said," another voice singing what was said, I find very wearying. Haydn, having heard Handel in London, avoided this rock. Mendelssohn's "Paul" always seemed deficient to me, because written after Graun's pattern;—"Elijah," a hundred fold better, because Handel-like. Though this was one of the few occasions upon which I have ever seen an oratorio fill a house here in Germany, still there did not seem to be much real enthusiasm in the audience, and the "wunderschöne," "vortreffliche," and other epithets of high praise seemed to be uttered because it was Graun's Tod Jesu—and Graun was Frederick Second's Kapellmeister, and it is the fashion to make a great fuss about his "Good Friday" music. I have often been told here that "Paul" is greater than

"Elijah,"—it is more like Tod Jesu—and if that be the standard—why, then it is. Parson Sir Hugh "liked it not when an old woman had a great pear!"—I like it not when the auditor expresses all sorts of enthusiasm—and yawns in the midst of it. I cannot count Tod Jesu among the masterpieces. What an infinite, infinite distance separates it from the Passion music in the "Messiah!"

BRESLAU (in Silesia), April 13th. Bring out the bull. Not Taurus—I am no matador ready for a bull fight. Bring out the Roman Bull; for I am—a heretic! From my heart of hearts I rebel against the fundamental principle of Opera. And yet if authority is authority, there can be no mistake that I am wrong, for do not the North and South poles in this matter agree and harmonize? Do not Fry and Dwight here coincide? Yet I can not believe! Out with the bull! Last night I again heard CHERUBINI's "Water Carrier," (Les deux Journées). Delightful! As a drama, beautiful exceedingly. The music always written with the actor in view, so that delicious as it is, it is always subordinate, and satisfied with adding to the joy or pathos of the play. It is deliciously expressive, and its effects, as BRYANT says of Nature, are such as sink into the soul "ere one is aware." And herein I find by experience is the greatness of the great masters of opera. They never say, "Now Mister, I am going to give you an aria, a duet, a trio—look out for yourself." The music grows out of the situation and the tears fill your eyes, you know not why. I was looking at a great picture the other day—I forgot all about the painter—the picture itself was all in all—it, not the artist, touched me.

Well, like 'Der Freischütz,' 'Oberon,' 'Magic Flute,' 'Fidelio,' 'Swiss Family,' and other favorites, the 'Water Carrier' is in great measure spoken dialogue, and the music comes in, just like blank verse in SHAKESPEARE, when the elevation of thought and sentiment requires it. I smile now to think how last evening, when the first words were spoken, a feeling of delicious relief went through me, as I uttered a mental "Thank God!" that I was to be spared the abominable bore of recitative!

Years ago I first heard recitative at the Handel and Haydn Society. It grated on my feelings like the filing of a saw. I have learned to like some recitatives—nobody better—but on the stage—! Give me Pop Emmons's eloquence, but don't compel me to listen to half an hour's talk upon trivial matters on the stilts of recitative, when three minutes of spoken dialogue is sufficient.

I hate recitative—kiss the book upon it, and am ready for excommunication.

Out with the bull!

April 14.—I went this evening with Prof. J.—to an Amateur Musical Club. The subscribers to this are the music-loving portion of the professors in the University, and others of like rank and character. They meet Saturday evenings in a couple of rooms at a leading piano-forte dealer's, the men in one, their wives and daughters in the other, and the cost is only a division of the necessary expenses of heating, lights, and attendance. The programme this evening was this:

Sonata for Piano and Violin, E flat, Beethoven.
Piano-forte Trio, E flat, Hummel (fine).
Quartet, B, Mozart.

All capitally played. Such music at such a cost!

April 15. 'Cleve' tells with great glee a story of tall George Bradburn—the manful advocate of freedom in the Massachusetts Legislature some twenty years ago. A little weasens-faced, sanctimonious man is the other actor.

Weasens-face. Brother B., have you got religion?

Brother B. (being a little deaf, bends down with hand to ear.) Hey?

W. (raising his voice.) Have you got religion?

B. None to speak of!

This morning I went to the Dom to hear mass, and as I sat listening, in that crowd all still as heart could wish, to the 'Kyrie,' the 'Gloria,' and so on, and they sank each more deeply into my heart, the above odd anecdote popped into my mind, and the question came up whether even one who has no "religion to speak of," can be wholly unmoved by tones which breathe so full of the religious sentiment?

The choir and orchestra are both small, but the voices are select, and especially touching was one of those rare, full, clear, ringing voices, at the same time powerful and mellow. This sweet, noble voice was felt throughout—without making itself disagreeably prominent in the choruses. What a glory there is in a pure, sustained tone, swelling and dying away without the slightest perceptible waver or variation of pitch. How such a tone will fill one with music! Oh ye wiggle-voiced men and women, will ye never learn that one such tone touches the heart more than a whole evening of tremolo, and that it is only she who is capable of the pure tone, who can touch your heart of hearts, when in the depths of feeling the voice begins to waver and tremble with emotion?

The contrast between the mass to-day and the boy-singing of the Berlin choir, was not in favor of the latter. Music is cold without soprano. Brass bands, too, are abominable. We must have the feminine—the wood instruments. Our Puritan ancestors banished poetry, painting, sculpture, architecture and music from their Sunday services. So they went into a barn and snuffed and drawled out: "The Lord will come, and he will not." Their descendants already erect fine churches, place good organs therein, and show a reviving taste for painting and sculptured ornaments; will they not by-and-by introduce Music?

Musical Correspondence.

From NEW YORK.

MAY 20.—It was a sad trick that the Fates played us, when, after a week of delicious Spring weather, they sent down upon us on Saturday, the day of Mr. EISELDE's Complimentary Concert, a very deluge of rain, which only increased during the whole day. The natural consequence was a very, very thin house, so much so as to really pain any one interested in the success of an able and zealous musician, to whom New York owes innumerable musical advantages.

To me, this state of things considerably marred the exquisite pleasure which I could not but derive from the concert itself. It was a real treat to all lovers of good music; both in point of material offered by the programme, and of execution, which, with a few trifling exceptions, was uniformly excellent. The orchestra, particularly, I have never heard play better. Instead of being discouraged by the small audience, they seemed to feel as if they must do their best to make up for other disappointments, and do credit to the conductor, who, though bearing the too evident marks of severe illness in his appearance, was yet at the post which he has so long, so faithfully filled. The opening piece was the fresh, graceful overture to Les deux Journées, by CHERUBINI—a piece of solid light music (rather paradoxical I must confess) which one is always glad to hear. The other numbers of the first part were solo-pieces, Mr. Eisfeld having introduced, in this concert, a feature new, or at least rare, in this country, namely, to have the Symphony end the concert, instead of begin it. I much prefer to have it so, particularly when a Symphony of BEETHOVEN, and more particularly when the C minor is given. Nothing else sounds well after it, and, when you hear it last you go away with the full impression upon your mind, and enjoy it much more in retrospect than when it is confused by the memory of several miscellaneous pieces coming after.

The solo performers were Messrs. KIEFER and SCHREIBER, on the clarinet and cornet-à-piston, Miss LEHMANN and Mr. HOFFMANN. The first-named gentleman played, in a most admirable manner, a Concertino by Mr. Eisfeld, which we have already heard this winter at the first Philharmonic concert. A second hearing only heightened the pleasing impression which I received at that time. It is finely instrumented and the two motifs are very original and beautiful. The Chanson d'Amour, also by Mr. Eisfeld, for cornet-à-pistons, did not seem to me to have as much character in it as the other. It was also very well played. I regret to say that Miss Lehmann did not do herself justice. The grand aria from Fidelio is excessively difficult—it presents a task to which Miss Lehmann did not seem equal: nor was she well sustained by the orchestra, who, in this one case, did not do very well, probably from insufficient rehearsal of the very difficult music, with which they were not familiar. The "Erlking," too, I have heard much better sung by Miss Lehmann at a concert of her own.

Mr. Hoffmann delighted his hearers once more with the exquisite Romance and Rondo vivace from a Concerto of CHOPIN, which he had played at one of last year's Philharmonic concerts. It is a most beautiful composition—first the dreamy, delicate, languishing Romance, then the bright, sparkling, pearl-like Rondo—that intoxicates one like the wine which it resembles. Mr. Hoffmann continues to improve, from year to year. I well remember the time when, a mere wonder-child or boy, he astonished people by his strength and brilliancy of execution, in pieces of the "prodigious school." For some years he continued more or less in this line. After a lull, he came out last year so able an interpreter of Chopin, as to prove that he was, after all, no mere trickster, but had depth beneath the surface; and this impression has only been confirmed by his performances in public, not too frequent, since that time. I have hardly ever enjoyed anything more than his share in the "Kreutzer Sonata" of Beethoven, at a Quartet Soirée this winter. I am sorry that there is still so much superciliousness in him as to allow him to play, in answer to an encore, on Saturday, one of the shallowest, flattest pieces imaginable: "The Last Hope," by GOTTSCHALK. I should call it a fortiori hope! He played it admirably, though.

The grand, glorious Fifth Symphony of "the Master," never made a deeper impression on me than on that evening. I had purposely not played or looked it over before, according to my usual wont, as, not having heard it for some time, I wanted it to break in upon me afresh in all its beauty. Fresh from HOFFMANN's wonderful analysis of it, in your last number, I followed it through in his spirit, without, however, allowing his impressions to disturb my own individual ones. Yet how true what he says—the restless striving and working in the Allegro—the "sweet spirit-voice" of the Andante, with the evil genius constantly peeping out from behind the thunder-cloud,—and lastly, "the glorious theme of the Finale, shining out like dazzling sunshine in the jubilant strains of the full orchestra!" It was in this symphony, particularly, that the orchestra surpassed themselves; never has a like composition been played with more "Schwung"—translate that German word if you can—than this.

I have been told that, as many who had purchased tickets were prevented from attending, Mr. Eisfeld thinks of repeating the concert next Saturday afternoon. Let us hope that the weather will be more propitious, and that not only those will be there who could not go last Saturday, but that also those who were there were enough interested to go again, of which number I myself shall certainly be one.

BORNOWIS.

Musical Chat-Chat.

Is there a Bobolink among composers? Read on another page WASHINGTON IRVING's charming description of that songster of our meadows and corn-fields in June, and of the sad metamorphoses which he is to undergo; then compare the gushing melody of Il Barbiere and Tancredi with the ROSSINI of these latter years!—FERDINAND HILLER, being asked what he thought of MEYERBEER's operas, replied evasively and with some impatience: "Ah! let us not talk of politics!"

We had a call last week from our townsman SAM-UEL PARKMAN TUCKERMAN, Mus. Doc., who had just arrived from England to enter upon his duties as organist at Trinity Church, New York, in place of the veteran Dr. HODGES, who has removed to the new Trinity Chapel, upon Twenty-fifth street. This appointment to so important a position is even a greater honor to our townsman than the doctorate of the English university, and we trust that it will give him full facilities for carrying out his high ideas of what episcopal church music ought to be.

That always readable and faithful friend of the artistic and the beautiful, The Crayon, has a letter from a German gentleman, describing the festival at Munich in honor of the completion of CRAWFORD's statue of BEETHOVEN, the gift of our townsman, CHARLES C. PERKINS to the Boston Music Hall. The letter is dated Munich, March 29, and is as follows:

"It was a glorious, beautiful festival, and I still revel in the enjoyment of the delightful recollection. I wish you could have witnessed the universal enthusiasm.

"The artist's permission has been obtained to place the Beethoven in the Concert Hall; but the general musical director, Lachner, would not allow the statue to be placed in an ordinary hall, but appointed an especial concert for the 26th of March, the anniversary of the great master's death, saying, 'That day shall be marked by a fête de Art.'

"A pedestal of six feet in height was prepared, having a background of dark green velvet, supported by gilt columns. It was a serious undertaking to get the statue up the high steps, but it was accomplished without accident—and the statue was placed upon its pedestal, in the midst of a forest of flowers and cypresses, lit by more than a hundred gas lights: the tout ensemble produced a most magical effect. The Concert Hall was filled to overflowing with more than a thousand persons, among whom King Maximilian and the Queen were most conspicuous. And, now began the execution of Beethoven's best compositions by more than three hundred singers, male and female, and musicians, in a manner that made me wish Mr. Perkins could have listened to their magic tones.

"The director of the theatre, Herr Dingelstedt, wrote a prologue in verse, which was finely recited by Madame Dämbock, the first actress: and, when the fête was ended—'Such a fête we have never had,' was the cry of hundreds of voices.

"King Maximilian remarked to a gentleman present, 'I only regret that this master-piece of Art should not remain in Munich:' the reply was, 'The artist who created it still lives,' at which his Majesty smiled, and said, 'Not easily does a work of Art please me as does this statue.'

"Ex-King Louis was unable to leave the palace on the evening of the fête, as the weather was very bad; and, still suffering as he is, he has not made any artistic visit. But, hearing that the Beethoven must be sent off, he went yesterday, in the midst of the snow and rain, to see it. The statue was once more placed on its pedestal for him—he was delighted with it; and, as he intends visiting Rome this summer, said that he would tell the artist, in person, how much the statue had pleased him."

A taste for better things is certainly spreading in our musically benighted towns and cities. We have already told of what has been achieved in Bangor. A correspondent from Worcester, Mass., commends to the notice of the Musical World a programme of choice music performed there at a private Soirée a few weeks since. He writes:

"Mr. B. D. ALLEN—an artist of eminent merit and of equal modesty—a pupil in every respect worthy of his distinguished teacher and friend, OTTO DRESSEL, and one of our own citizens, has established for himself a highly honorable reputation in our musical community, discouraging all trash, and cultivating the highest standard of "Musical Art." His programme, above referred to, embraced the following excellent selections:

"PART I.—1. Symphony in B flat, (Piano, four hands,) Schumann—(Miss Bacon and B. D. Allen.) 2. Four Part Song, The Nightingale, Mendelssohn—(Misses Fiske and Wright, and Messrs. Stocking and A. S. Allen.) 3. Sonata in A minor, Mozart—(Miss Bacon.) 4. Ave Maria,—Song, Franz—(Miss Wright.)

"PART II.—5. Hommage a Handel (Two Pianos,) Moscheles—(Miss Bacon and B. D. Allen.) 6. The Erl King,—Song, Schubert—(Miss Fiske.) 7. Andante Spianata et Grande Polonaise, Chopin—(B. D. Allen.) 8. Four Part Song, The Gondolier's Serenade, Wm. Mason—(Misses Fiske and Wright, and Messrs. Stocking and A. S. Allen.)

"We may be permitted simply to allude to the lady pianist, Miss Bacon—also a pupil of Mr. Dresel, and a performer of rare merit—and to the excellent vocalists who contributed so admirably to the evening's entertainment."

Messrs. Geo. P. Reed & Co. have just published a new "Course of Harmony," quite a formidable octavo volume, by Mr. L. H. SOUTHARD of this city, and forming but the porch or Propylæa, we believe, to a complete course of Counterpoint and Fugue, which has been long shaping itself in the brain of the same thoughtful and profound musical scholar. The volume is modest in its pretensions, but from what we know of its antecedents, and from what we gather from a very cursory glance at its contents, we suspect it to be a work of remarkable value; indeed we shall be disappointed if it does not prove to be the best treatise that exists in English on the subject; not taking into account of course the translations from MARX, and other German theorists. We shall report more fully of it ere long. Mr. Southard is one of our most indefatigable and successful composers too of music. He is at present engaged, with a genial literary gentleman who furnishes the libretto, upon an opera, the plot of which is based upon HAWTHORNE's "Scarlet Letter."—The annual Festival of the German Männerchöre, Liederkränze, &c., from all parts of the country, will take place in New York next month. CARL BERGMANN has accepted an invitation to conduct it.—Mr. JOHN P. GROVES, the young violinist of this city, sailed last Saturday for Europe, to pursue his musical studies in Dresden and Leipzig.—Miss ELISE HENSLEY still remains in Paris, and the slightly improved state of her father's health renders her future movements yet uncertain. We hope she may come at once, and sing to us in one of the two Italian opera troupes now dividing public attention.

The universal "free fight" between each and all concerned, which followed the attempted coalition of the two opera companies under the auspices of the Academy of Music, is sharply summed up by the N.Y. Times:

"Mr. Jacobsohn has a difficulty with the Management."

"Mr. Jacobsohn has a second difficulty with Mr. Ullman."

"Mr. Ullman has difficulty with everybody on general principles of policy."

"Signor Mirate (a singer not known here) has a difficulty with Signor Badiali."

"Signor Mirate has a second difficulty with the Management."

"Signor Mirate has a third difficulty with Mr. Maretzek."

"Signor Arditì has also a difficulty with Mr. Maretzek."

"Signor Arditì's chorus has a difficulty with Mr. Maretzek's chorus."

"Signor Arditì's orchestra has a similar difficulty with Maretzek's orchestra."

"Mr. Maretzek has a difficulty with the 'gentleman who manages the press,' and generally with every one who has the misfortune to be under the latter's influence and control."

"And last and most serious of all,

"Madame Anna Lagrange has a difficulty in her throat which prevents her singing."

We understand that there was no ground for the statement so far as Signors BADIALI and MIRAT were concerned. Meanwhile Mr. PHALEN has retired from the management of the Academy, in favor of Mr. PAINE, another of the committee of the stockholders, and they have had compassion on the houseless LAGRANGE troupe, and agreed to terms whereby said troupe occupies the Academy so long as the regular Academy troupe remain in Boston. They made their first appearance there on Monday evening in Lucia di Lammermoor. Mme. LAGRANGE, Sig. MIRAT and Sig. MORELLI, that is, all the new stars, were to take the leading rôles.

Italian Opera.

"William Tell,"—really ROSSINI's greatest work, as each successive hearing and perusal of the score has more and more convinced us,—was given at the Boston Theatre on Monday and on Wednesday evening, to large audiences and with very great success, especially the second time. It was produced on the same liberal scale and in the same effective style as at the Academy in New York; the same singers and supernumeraries, to the number of some 150 persons on the stage at one time; the same orchestral force, under the vigorous baton of the same conductor, MAX MARETZKE, in whom all have confidence; the same costumes and properties, and scenery, if somewhat different, yet quite as artistic and as picturesque, it seemed to us, as that of Sig. ALLEGRI's painting, at the Academy.

The inordinate length of the opera, requiring more than four hours in performance, necessitated large omissions in New York, and it has been very much farther shortened here. The whole of the ballet, connected with the wedding scene in the first Act, and with the Fair in the second Act, a good half hour of it in all, and for which Rossini has written some of the finest dance music in existence, was cut out. Entire choruses and songs in every Act were left out, and others much abridged. The only important female rôle, that of Mathilda, was reduced to less than one-half of the music which the composer and librettists have assigned to her. The fourth Act, melodramatic enough at best, was made still more so, by the omission of at least two-thirds of the music. And yet the papers cry out for still further "cuttings," not considering that the omissions already made are of themselves sufficient to account for much of the apparent want of unity, and therefore the actual tediousness of the last acts,—supposing the entire work to have a unity. But it is indeed true that this opera has not much dramatic unity or progress; that the musical climax is past with the second Act, and the dramatic climax with the third; so that some excisions could be made without touching any vital part. And it was quite important that it should be shortened somewhat. We have stated the above facts not to find fault, but for the information of those who heard "William Tell," that they might know what allowance was to be made on that score. The parts omitted were, in the main, those which could best be spared.

The musical performance, as a whole, impressed us as an improvement upon either that we heard in New York. The exceedingly rich orchestration throughout, from the well-known overture, which was vehemently applauded, to the Mosé in Egitto-like accompaniment of the jubilant final quartet and chorus,—and abounding everywhere with exquisite and piquant melodic figures, as well as with subtle harmonies and mighty combinations,—was rendered very effectively. Yet we must complain of the "over-muchness" of the brass instruments in the fortissimos, which often covered up the really elaborate and vivid violin figures so that the ear caught nothing of them even while the eye read the notes. If this was in a great measure owing to the acoustic nature of the room (as the confused and dull sound of the opening string passages in the overture led us to suspect) then there is one reason the more for favoring the stringed band at the expense of drums and trombones. The choruses, than which there are none finer in any opera ever heard here,—none so individual and various in expression, or wrought up with so superb a background of instrumental harmony, were generally sung with spirit and precision and a good musical blending of the voices—numerous beyond the measure of our operas hitherto.

Coming now to the principal singers, the musical and dramatic interest can scarcely be said to be concentrated upon any one leading part. Tell (baritone) is the patriotic centre. But Arnold Melchthal (tenor) unites the patriot and the lover, and thus becomes the focus in which the prime and secondary motives of the drama meet. To him are assigned more passages which "bring the house down," and which stamp themselves upon the memory; his songs are the most dramatic, of the kind in which each note is freighted with its separate weight of passion; besides, is not his of all tenor parts the most arduous, in both senses of the word; does not his music repeatedly run up to the C above the staff, and have not NOURIT and DUPREZ immortalized him, the latter by the famous Ut de poitrine, which sent all Paris into ecstasies? Sig. BOLCIONI lacks the heroic and commanding presence, and is but a feeble and automaton-like actor, ever confined to one conventional round of looks and starts and gestures. But his tenor is sweet and musical and flexible, and takes those highest notes with a rare and satisfying power; indeed his most effective tones appear to lie above the staff. He sings conscientiously, earnestly, with good style and expression, and in his first duet, with Tell: O Mathilde, (which demands a high B flat with full strength the first time, and a tone higher when the melody recurs), although he may have transposed it half a tone, produced a great impression. Admirable, too, was his delivery of those passionate syllabic phrases in the great Trio of the second act: Ses jours qu'ils ont osé proscrire, &c., contrasting with the flowing thirds of the two basses, Tell and Walter. In the love duet with Mathilda, just preceding, and in that delicious bit exquisitely accompanied, at the beginning of the last act: Asyle héréditaire, his singing was full of tenderness and sweetness. But his strength held not out for the last, most trying air of all, the war song: Siivez moi, which also climbs by emphatic half-tones to the C and dwells there with all possible power and volume; this trial was evaded, wisely too, by a great abridgment of the song. The other tenor parts also are written high. The picturesque little fisherman, who steps forward from his boat in the first scene, and sings his little song about his little loves, while earnest, anxious Tell is brooding on his country's wrongs, has to sing up to C, which Herr BEUTTLER (it was VIETTI in New York) achieved by the falsetto, rendering with his light, sweet, not over-much pinched German voice, the whole of his music cleverly enough. Sig. QUINTO (the Herr QUINT of the late German opera), both in voice and action filled the part of Rudolph, captain of the Austrian soldiers, better than such parts have been often filled here, and indeed he lent his voice effectually to some of the concerted pieces.

Sig. BADIALI's Tell, so far as voice and singing, and expressive, vigorous parlando went, alike in passages of heroic indignation and defiance, or of tenderness and grief, and in scrupulous fidelity to all the requirements of his part, was much the finest impersonation of the whole,—save only in the matter of looks, (which it of course lies not in his power to adapt to any one's preconceived notion of the character,) and in a tendency, habitual with him, to occasional grotesque over-acting. But he was the same ever reliable, artistic Badiali, with the solid, ripe and ringing baritone, which seemed as if Rossini's music here were written for it and for no other.—Signor COLETTI (basso) sustained well his part in the trio of patriot leaders, and throughout the whole of that grand scene of the conspiracy at Grütli.—Sig. ROECO makes a very Blue-Beard of a Geseler, as melodramatically fierce a tyrant as the composer in his funniest mood could wish. His costume, we are told, was historical.

But place aux dames!—and we may add aux garçons, for Jemmy Tell is certainly the leading soprano throughout the chief part of the opera, at least where the prima donna's scenes are reduced down to one or two. We can but compliment Mme. BERTUCCA-MARETZKE, upon her impersonation of Tell's dutiful, brave boy. She looked and acted the part charmingly, and mingled in the fray between villagers and soldiers as valiantly as a young Tell should. Never before (it is some years since she has sung here), have we found her voice so pure and clear and musical, and her singing so entirely satisfactory. On the top of those strong choruses, her soprano floated with a silvery clearness, and on the emphatic phrases each note penetrated and crowned the great mass of sounds with effect. Everywhere, in the concerted pieces, except in the second act, her voice is paramount, and its charm wears not out.

There always is a charm in STEFFANONE's singing, in spite of all defects. Her voice is evidently the worse for wear in some respects; it has grown husky in the lower tones, and there is an uncomfortable amount of tremolo, or (as our friend the Diarist calls it) of the "wobble" in her upper tones. Yet these tones are always rich, sympathetic, penetrating and surcharged with feeling, eminently suited to dramatic pathos, and there is a whole-heartedness about her singing which grows upon you in spite of a certain seeming physical nonchalance at the beginning of each effort. The part of Mathilda, to be sure, is not very dramatic. Her love for Arnold is but an incident in the play. Love is but a secondary motive in this opera; here, as in "Moses in Egypt," the main-spring is political, is patriotism. Yet that is certainly an admirable scene for her at the beginning of the second act, and full of beautiful, original and touching music. Her first recitative and the quiet, sweet, heart-felt melody: Sombre forêt, in which she (a princess) confides to the woods and to the evening star the secret of her love for Arnold and for simple Swiss life,—a melodic gem indeed—were sung with true expression, she only substituting for the final cadenza (as prima donnas will) another of her own. So too the dialogue with Arnold, and their duet, or rather two duets. The part, if not dramatic, has musical importance, and would have much more, if another equally long scene with Arnold, commencing the third act, were not left out, besides a Trio, &c., with the wife and son of Tell in the last act. As if to show her to better advantage than in that awkward riding dress, she is allowed to intervene once, for a moment, to claim Tell's son from Gessler, and her few indignant notes were there uttered with great spirit.

We have not room here to point out the musical beauties or dramatic faults of "William Tell;" although we have felt strongly tempted to enter into a somewhat regular analysis of the opera, or at least to sketch out a catalogue raisonnée of its musical contents. This we may yet do. Suffice it now to say, as we begun, that its charm grows upon us wonderfully. It is an exhaustless mine of happy musical inventions and effects. Even in point of melodic ideas, we had not half appreciated it, when we wrote our first impressions, some weeks since. Whatever the dramatic faults of "Tell," there can be no doubt of its great musical excellence, and that as a musical, a lyric composition it is far more important, and more worth a hearing—many hearings—than any opera of BELLINI, DONIZETTI, MERCADANTE, VERDI, or (what is more significant) of ROSSINI himself.

"William Tell" is to be performed this afternoon for the last time, and let no lover of good music miss the opportunity. We plead, however, that it may not be the last; and we could even wish we might have once a chance to hear Rossini's greatest opera, long as it is, entire.

Last evening, VESTVALI, "the magnificent," was to make her Boston debut as Orsini, and BRIGNOLI, the young tenor admired of New Yorkers, as Genaro, in Lucrezia Borgia. On Monday will commence the run of Il Trovatore, much to the joy, we doubt not, of all who love exciting, harrowing tragedy and Verdi, to whom we give the credit of being almost everywhere in the majority. The reduction of prices for the two upper circles—which places the opera now within the reach of almost all who want to hear it.

WHAT FOR AN ORCHESTRA NEXT WINTER? We publish to-day a communication from our old friend KEYZER, ever alive to the interests of classical music in this his chosen home. He gives us some good ideas, as usual; and he has known too long the musical temper and material of Boston to take the concert experience of the past winter as an evidence that musical taste is on the decline among us. We are only sorry, that in seeking other explanations of the winter's failure he could not help gravitating back again to his old hobby of abusing the Music Hall, in which he will find little sympathy, at least from younger ears. But every music-lover says Amen to his idea that for so large a hall there should be a large orchestra, and particularly a large body of string instruments. This is a prime desideratum; at the same time that we are bound to remember, what is beyond dispute, that the most effective, most enjoyed, and most successful Symphony concerts every way, ever yet heard in Boston, were those of the Germania Orchestra in the Boston Music Hall. As to the Hall, the question is not if it be a perfect room for musical effect, but if it be the best that could be for a room so large; and we see no cause yet to doubt that among all existing halls of the largest size it is unrivalled. The Philadelphia hall referred to is but half as large.

But this en passant. The main drift of our friend's article is to show what may be done next winter; to hint some practical measures towards placing classical orchestral concerts upon a foundation of certainty and permanency in this music-loving city. And here we are happy to agree with his suggestion, and doubt not it is practical, and that the money will readily and cheerfully flow towards the object, the moment that subscribers shall see that something solid and reliable is about to be done. We only think his demand too modest, and that he might safely strike for a much higher aim.

We have not room now, but we propose soon to discuss at length, and with a view to some practical movement, the whole matter of a permanent organization of great classical concerts in our city.

NEW MUSIC.—From the New York agency, (389 Broadway,) of J. Alfred Novello, London, we have received a number of standard classical works, in the elegant editions of that famous house. We mention for the present:

1. Short Melodies for the Organ, principally for Soft Stops, by VINCENT NOVELLO. This is quite a large and very varied collection of organ pieces, voluntaries, &c., already extending through three Books, each of six numbers, which are furnished separately, and a continuation is still promised. Each number, of eight or ten pages, contains from six to ten pieces, many of them composed by NOVELLO, arranged from his masses, offertories, &c., of which there is a great variety, and all good; many drawn from ancient sources, Gregorian hymns, &c.; and many adapted from pianoforte Sonatas and other works of BETHOVEN, CRAMER, PLEYEL, CHERUBINI, HESSE, PURCELL, and many others. We have an aversion to Beethoven altered, as he must be to suit the organ, as in the case of a certain piano Andante which is not itself if it be not staccato. But others are less objectionable; and the collection abounds in really excellent and useful pieces for the organist.

2. Saul; an Oratorio, by HANDEL.—This is another of Novello's cheap and convenient octavo editions of the Oratorios, and now that copies can be had so easily, we hope that some of our societies will begin to think of bringing out the "Saul."

Boston Theatre.—Tuesday and Thursday evenings next are set apart for the benefits respectively of the Doorkeepers and the Ushers, to whose obligingness and courtesy all our opera and play-goers have certainly been under obligation.

THE AMERICAN HARP: A COLLECTION OF NEW AND ORIGINAL CHURCH MUSIC, COMPOSED AND ARRANGED BY CHARLES ZEUNER.

THE above excellent work has been the basis of a majority of the popular collections of Sacred Music for the last dozen or fifteen years; and though nearly a quarter of a century has elapsed since its first issue, it yet retains an unquestioned superiority over all similar works, and is esteemed by musical amateurs as the choicest volume to which they have access. It has been for a number of years out of print. Copies could but with great difficulty be obtained; and the value in which the few to be found were held, together with the actual merits of the work, repeatedly alluded to by the best judges of Church Music, induced the undersigned to publish it, and the public can now be supplied at the following rates:

NEW COURSE OF HARMONY, BY L. H. SOUTHARD.

The Publishers call the attention of the musical profession to this work, as one eminently calculated to lighten the labors of the teacher, and rapidly advance the pupil. It is emphatically a PRACTICAL work, serving both as a Manual of instruction on the one hand, and a Text-book on the other; and it is believed that the peculiar arrangement of the work, together with the very large number of exercises and examples, presents great advantages, to both scholar and teacher, over any similar work yet published. Price $1.50.

From the New York Daily Tribune.

There is no better musical critic in the country than John S. Dwight, of Boston, and few men are able to express what they have to say about music in a manner at once so poetic and precise. His articles are sure to please the learned in music, and to delight its lovers. We commend his Journal unreservedly to our musical friends as a work which will be an able running commentary upon musical events, extracting from each its significance, varying its critical notices of music and musicians, both new and old, with biographical and entertaining details; and always true to what is most interesting and commanding in this noblest of the Arts.

From the Boston Evening Transcript.

Wherever there is a piano-forte, this Journal ought to be lying on it.

From the Boston Atlas.

We need just such a paper. One which is subservient to no particular clique of book-makers, or society agents, or managerial interests. One which tells truly what is good and what is bad, in the honest convictions of the writer. Mr. Dwight unites more qualifications to hold the judge's chair than any other writer with whose powers we are acquainted. His genial warmth of feeling is united to an acute perception of the beauties of executional Art; while a long and earnest study of the great composers of the world has rendered him familiar with, and an appreciator of, their noble works.

Of Modern Instrumentation.

[From the German of A. B. MARX.]

The new construction of the orchestra has penetrated everywhere, especially into the Opera, and has everywhere exerted its influence, an influence of the most important kind. It has formed itself gradually, and without preconceived plan; BERLIOZ is not its founder, but its completer; he is the intelligence of this movement, of which MEYERBEER and WAGNER are the most significant, and—if you once admit the principle—the most inspired adherents.

The first peculiarity which one remarks in the new orchestration, is the greatly increased variety of instruments, especially of the wind band, thereby necessitating a strengthening of the mass of stringed instruments. Hence there is opposed to the vocal parts (in Opera and Cantata) a mass of sound, which now forces the voices upward and to extravagant accentuation, and now stifles the voices and crowds even the chorus into violent outbursts, leading the composer to employ an unfavorable choice of instruments if he would have a solo penetrate through so much noise. Thus Meyerbeer in a certain mournful love-song in G minor, (I think in Robert le Diable), uses the trumpet for a pathetic cantilena; the same thing might be pointed out in AUBER and others.

The second feature is the unmanning of the trumpet and the French horn (they have even begun upon the trombone) by the introduction of the valve. So soon as one ceases to consult truth, the only characteristic quality that there is left becomes irre recognizable and unendurable; for character is any nature faithful to itself and complete in itself, which cannot operate, cannot avail through any thing other than itself. Now in the whole series of tone-personifications there are no characters of a more decided stamp than the heroic trumpet, the dreamy Wald-horn in its natural state. Even the limitation and incompleteness of their scale of tones is something peculiar to their character and nature; Achilles with the eloquence and cunning of Ulysses were no more Achilles; the trusty, sturdy mountaineer cannot have the many-sidedness of the polished, short-winded denizen of the city; just so little can the trumpet have the flexibility of the clarinet, or the horn the supple serviceableness of the bassoon. The character of those instruments, their very limitation as to the power of producing all tones of the scale, has constantly challenged the appreciative composer to invent characteristic passages, and has quite frequently rewarded his fidelity with the most happy inspirations. By the very fact, that they have drawn these natural beings out of their native and appropriate tone-element, that they have tried to refashion their naïve peculiarity into an imitation of all sorts of creatures, have the composers entangled themselves in a mesh of half-ness and of falsehood. The use of valves and pistons has certainly extended the domain of tones; but the new tones are partially impure; the characteristic, pure tone-color is entirely blurred and sophisticated, the power of tone entirely broken.

The third trait is the introduction of the so-called soft or mellow brass band—the Cornets, Sax-horns, Tubas—as you may please to call them—into the orchestra.

By no means do I declare war here against newly invented instruments, or old instruments restored; it would ill become me, who have found one such at least (the chromatic tenor horn, in my oratorio "Moses") indispensable. If our masters down to BEETHOVEN have done great things without it, it does not follow that we should despise means which they could not use, because they did not know of them,—any more than that they should have confined themselves to the more limited means of BACH and HANDEL. Some of the new instruments have already found a really artistic application (as the bass clarinet in Wagner's Lohengrin, where its place could hardly be supplied in any other way); others may attain to like importance, who knows how soon and where? Even the application of them in whole bands or choirs may somehow or other become necessary. Every medium may possibly, for some artistic moment, be both fit and indispensable—and then it is the right one. Nevertheless the use of this new family of brass, as now employed, must appear questionable, nay, generally speaking, a perversion. For this, together with the introduction of the valve in horns and trumpets, obliterates the characteristic features of the orchestra, so that you hardly recognize them. And this consideration outweighs any favoring of single moments.

In the old orchestra the quartet of strings and the wind band, the latter including the brass (horns, trumpets, trombones, with the kettle drums) and the reed band (clarinet, oboes, &c.),—formed decided opposites. Splendor, power, warlike appeal, and solemn pomp lay in the trumpets and trombones; each band or family, each instrument, had its distinguishable character. Was it required to mitigate the opposition, or suspend it, instantly the French horns of themselves stepped in between the stern brass and the reeds; the insight of the composer found in covering the heavy voices by more mild ones, in veiling them by accessory parts, in a hundred turns, continually new and even genial means, which operated more excitingly upon his own and upon his hearers' mind, than would be possible by any mere material increase of mass.

And now stepped in the choir of cornets and of tubas. Even to the eye their conically widened, speaking-tube-like, intestinally winding bodies, interrupted by the weight of their cast metal valves and choked in their vibration, suggested beforehand the idea of a choked and suddenly outbursting, a muffled and yet violent sound; just as the shape of trumpets, horns and trombones indicates their quality of tone. This choir, particularly by the bastard nature of its sound, weakens the opposition of the brass and reeds. The cornets, which are neither horn nor clarinet, and yet resemble both (as if a painter should combine blue, green and yellow, and shade them into one another); the large tubas, half trombone, half horn-like, and neither altogether;—add to which the choking and muffling of the trumpets and the horns;—all this veils and blunts the sharpness of the character, allows the significant diversities of the orchestra to melt into a homogeneous mass, and merely increases the fullness, but not at all the power of sound. The drawn sword is mighty; in the scabbard it is thicker and heavier to be sure, but it has lost its conquering power of sharpness.

Once increase the mass of tone, and you have changed all relations. We artists are "dependent on the creatures we have made." New voices once acknowledged, they are eager to take part; when they have once spoken out, their weight of sound hangs upon every step; the masses with their swell and diminution (from a few instruments to many, to the whole, and the reverse) become broader; the finer execution of the shifting instrumental dialogue is crowded back; the spiritual yields to the material; the orchestra gives up its thoroughly soul-fraght dramatic character, that costliest legacy of HAYDN and BEETHOVEN, in order to resound like a many-voiced, sublimely powerful lyre (organ, if that sounds better.) Even in the choice of the principal voices care must be had, to mould them to the more sonorous, although often inappropriate instruments; or, in those grotesque Meyerbeer-ish alternations of one or two solo instruments (it might even be the piccolo and contrabasso) to conspire with the most wide-mouthed massive tutti. The banishment of certain important instruments goes hand in hand with this. Thus the characteristic Bass-horn is crowded out by the more flat and meagre Alto Clarinet; and so the not very sonorous, but yet often deeply impressive Contrabagotto has had to give way to the bull-voiced Bass Tuba.

Would you note these consequences of the new construction of the orchestra in a simpler body, consider the organization of Military Music, so far as it can be learned from the Prussian, Austrian and Russian army. With the skilfulness of our military bands and their directors, which seems greatly improved in comparison with earlier times, we are not now concerned. What from an artistic point of view now can and must be demanded of military music in general? In the first place (as it seems to me) a warlike feeling; then a characteristic expression for the kind of troops to which each corps of music belongs. Now supposing this last requirement to be fulfilled out of the means of the old orchestra, we should have for harnessed troops of heavy dragoons, trumpets (high and low), trombones and kettle-drums; for light dragoons trumpets, (mostly high, the deep ones only as bass); for the Jagers, horns, (perhaps those old primitive forest signal horns, which howled so wildly in the ears of the French in 1813, perhaps also the smaller ones, more trumpet-like, of the French and Belgian voltigeurs);—for the many-sided, far-stretching infantry, besides the drums, the full Janissary music, with the screaming clarinets at the head, but supported also and more highly colored by the brass. The cavalry music would present itself far more simple and more poor in tones; but its very peculiarity would consist in those natural tones and natural harmonies, in which, according to the example of all natural singers and all masters, the simple, native, fresh, downright Heroic ever finds its truest utterance; but that very poverty of tones would drive the composer to a strong marking of the rhythm, to the most peculiar expression of will and courage, of strong impetus and firm resistance, so far as any excitable spirit lives in him.

I step back out of that half-foreign sphere. Let any one examine for himself, who feels concerned to know, and see how much of those requirements is fulfilled or given up, since the troop of valve instruments has placed itself at the head of all sorts of martial music and has trained the harnessed brass band to each opera aria and to all the chromatic sighs of sweetish sentimentality. In a long peace the brightest sword rusts; the valves, brutal and tame, are the fit voices for our carrying on of war.

Mlle. Paradies.

MARIA THERESA PARADIES, a remarkable composer and eminent pianiste, was born in Vienna, the 15th May, 1759. Stricken with blindness at the early age of five years, she found in the study of music a consolation for her great misfortune. She evinced the most singular aptitude for this art, and was moreover endowed with marvellous facility for the acquirement of languages and sciences. Mlle. Paradies was equally familiar with Italian, German, French and English, well versed in the inductive sciences, a proficient in geography and history, danced with grace, and possessed such extraordinary facility of conception, and so tenacious a memory, that she played at chess, regulating her own moves according to the play of her adversary, as if she could have seen the board herself. Koze-luch and Righini were her masters for the piano-forte and singing; and she learned composition from the chapel-master, Freibert, receiving the advice of Salieri in the dramatic department. She was only eleven years of age when the Empress Maria Theresa granted her a pension of 250 florins, after having heard her play some of the sonatas and fugues of Bach, with rare perfection. In 1784, Paradies set out on her travels, visited Linz, Salzburg, Munich, Spire, Mannheim, Switzerland, and Paris, in which latter city she played with extraordinary success at one of the Concerts Spirituels in 1785. From Paris she proceeded to London, where she achieved a decided triumph. The most celebrated artistes of the period—among others, Abel, Fischer, and Salomon—considered it an honor to assist in her concerts. On her return from England, Paradies went to Holland, then to Brussels, Berlin, and Dresden, and was everywhere received with marked approbation at her public performances. In 1786, she returned to Vienna. She there applied herself to composition and teaching, published a variety of instrumental pieces, and wrote several operas, which were favorably received at Vienna and Prague. Her house became the rendezvous of the most eminent and distinguished persons of Vienna; foreigners solicited as the highest favor, to be introduced to her; and all were equally captivated by the charms of her conversation and the amenity of her manners. This remarkable woman died at Vienna on the 1st of February, 1824, at the age of sixty-five. In 1791, she produced at Vienna Ariadne at Naxos, an opera in two acts; and this was followed by Ariadne and Bacchus, a duo-drama in one act, a continuation of the foregoing opera. In 1792, Mlle. Paradies gave at the National Theatre of Vienna, Le Candidat Instituteur, an operetta in one act; and in 1797, a grand opera, entitled Rinaldo and Armida, at Prague. A grand cantata of her composition, on the death of Louis XVI., which was printed with pianoforte accompaniment, was brought out at Vienna in 1794. She had already published her funeral cantata on the death of the Emperor Leopold. Among the other compositions of Paradies, may be mentioned Six Sonatas for the harpsichord, Op. 1 (Paris, Imbault); Six Sonatas, Op. 2 (ditto); Twelve Italian Canzonets, with accompaniment, for pianoforte (London, Bland); and Leonora de Burger (Lieder, Vienna).

FETIS.

Emidee, the Negro Musician.

[From the Autobiography of James Silk Buckingham.]

He was born in Guinea, on the west coast of Africa, sold into slavery to some Portuguese traders, taken by them to the Brazils when quite a boy, and ultimately came to Lisbon with his owner or master. Here he manifested such a love for music, that he was supplied with a violin and a teacher; and in the course of three or four years he became sufficiently proficient to be admitted as one of the second violins in the orchestra of the opera at Lisbon. While thus employed, it happened that Sir Edward Pellow, in his frigate the Indefatigable, visited the Tagus, and, with some of his officers, attended the opera. They had long wanted for the frigate a good violin player, to furnish music for the sailors' dancing in their evening leisure, a recreation highly favorable to the preservation of their good spirits and contentment. Sir Edward, observing the energy with which the young negro plied his violin in the orchestra, conceived the idea of impressing him for the service. He accordingly instructed one of his lieutenants to take two or three of the boat's crew, then waiting to convey the officers on board, and, watching the boy's exit from the theatre, to kidnap him, violin and all, and take him off to the ship. This was done, and the next day the frigate sailed; so that all hope of his escape was vain. In what degree of turpitude this differed from the original stealing the youth from his native land, and keeping him in slavery, these gallant officers, perhaps, never condescended to consider. * * *

Poor Emidee was thus forced, against his will, to descend from the higher regions of the music in which he delighted—Gluck, Haydn, Cimarosa, and Mozart, to desecrate his violin to hornpipes, jigs, and reels, which he loathed and detested; and being, moreover, the only negro on board, he had to mess by himself, and was looked down upon as an inferior being—except when playing to the sailors, when he was of course in high favor. As the captain and officers judged, from his conduct and expressions, that he was intensely disgusted with his present mode of life, and would escape at the first possible opportunity, he was never permitted to set his foot on shore for seven long years! and was only released by Sir Edward Pellow being appointed to the command of a line-of-battle ship, L'Impetueux, when he was permitted to leave in the harbor of Falmouth, where he first landed, and remained, I believe, till the period of his death.

Here he first began by going out to parties to play the violin, which he did to a degree of perfection never before heard in Cornwall; this led to his being engaged as a teacher, and then a leader at concerts; so that, by degrees, he made rapid progress in reputation and means. Though he was one of the very ugliest negroes I ever remember to have seen, he had charms enough to fascinate a young woman of a respectable tradesman's family, whom he married, and by whom he had a large family of children. Though anticipating by some years the proper period of this narrative, I may mention here, more appropriately than further on, the following anecdote connected with his life. Emidee had composed many instrumental pieces, as quartets, quintets and symphonies for full orchestra, which had been played at the provincial concerts, and were much admired. On my first leaving Falmouth to come to London—about 1807—I brought with me several of these pieces in MS., to submit them to the judgment of London musical professors, in order to ascertain their opinion of their merits. At that period, Mr. Saloman, the well-known arranger of Haydn's symphonies as quintets, was the principal leader of the fashionable concerts at the Hanover Square Rooms. I sought an interview with him, and was very courteously received. I told him the story of Emidee's life; and asked him to get some of his pieces tried. This he promised to do, and soon after I received an intimation from him that he had arranged a party of professional performers, to meet at a certain day and hour at the shop of Mr. Betts, a musical instrument maker, under the piazza of the Royal Exchange, where I repaired at the appointed time; and in an upper room, a quartet, a quintet, and two symphonies with full accompaniments were tried, and all were highly approved. It was then suggested by Mr. Saloman, that Emidee should come to London and give a public performance. But Mr. Betts and all the others thought his color would be so much against him, that there would be a great risk of failure; and that it would be a pity to take him from a sphere in which he was now making a handsome livelihood and enjoying a high reputation, on the risk of so uncertain a speculation. To show, however, the sincerity of their admiration for the man and for his works, they originated on the spot a private subscription, which, being extended for about a week among others of the profession not then present, realized a handsome sum, which I had great pleasure in transmitting to him, with several complimentary letters from those who had been present at the performance of his compositions.

I record these facts with pleasure, as while they speak well for the liberality of the musical profession to their less fortunate brethren, they at the same time offer another splendid proof of the utter groundlessness of the fallacy which supposes the negro intellect to be incapable of cultivation, on arriving at an equal degree of excellence with that of the whites, if placed under equally favorable circumstances.

PROGRESS OF CIVILIZATION.—The St. Paul (Minnesota) Daily Times has a musical critic worthy of any oyster house in Broadway. He piles up the passion in truly artistic style. A juvenile fiddler having given a concert in St. Paul, the critic aforesaid was affected in the following manner:—"A passion of most sweet music was rained on us from his deep eyes, a supreme sensation filling the soul brimful, and subduing all thought and feeling within. In the exultation of some passages we could have bowed down and worshipped. He is a great boy. He can't help it. He is the embodied soul of music. You see the article in the flash of his dark, spiritual eye." Pretty tall fiddling we think that must be.—Atlas.

THE DAYS OF JUNE.

BY JAMES RUSSELL LOWELL.

Not only around our infancy
Doth heaven with all its splendors lie;
Daily, with souls that cringe and plot,
We Sinais climb and know it not.

Over our manhood bend the skies;
Against our fallen and traitor lives
The great winds utter prophecies;
With our faint hearts the mountain strives;
Its arms outstretched, the druid wood
Waits with its benedictio;
And to our age's drowsy blood
Still shouts the inspiring sea.

Earth gets its price for what earth gives us;
The beggar is taxed for a corner to die in,
The priest hath his fee who comes and shrives us,
We bargain for the graves we lie in;
At the Devil's booth are all things sold,
Each ounce of dross costs its ounce of gold;
For a cap and bells our lives we pay,
Bubbles we earn with a whole soul's tasking:
"T is heaven alone that is given away,
"T is only God may be had for the asking;
There is no price set on the lavish summer,
And June may be had by the poorest comer.

And what is so rare as a day in June?
Then, if ever, come perfect days;
Then Heaven tries the earth if it be in tune,
And over it softly her warm ear lays:
Whether we look, or whether we listen,
We hear life murmur, or see it glisten;
Every clod feels a stir of might,
An instinct within it that reaches and towers,
And, grasping blindly above it for light,
Climbs to a soul in grass and flowers;
The flush of life may well be seen
Thrilling back o'er hills and valleys;
The cowslip startles in meadows green,
The buttercup catches the sun in its chalice,
And there's never a leaf or a blade too mean
To be some happy creature's palace;
The little bird sits at his door in the sun,
Attilt like a blossom among the leaves,
And lets his illumined being o'errun
With the deluge of summer it receives;
His mate feels the eggs beneath her wings,
And the heart in her dumb breast flutters and sings;
He sings to the wide world, and she to her nest,—
In the nice ear of Nature which song is the best?

Now is the high-tide of the year,
And whatever of life hath ebb'd away
Comes flooding back, with a rippling cheer,
Into every bare inlet and creek and bay;
Now the heart is so full that a drop overfills it,
We are happy now because God so wills it;
No matter how barren the past may have been,
"T is enough for us now that the leaves are green;
We sit in the warm shade and feel right well
How the sap creeps up, and the blossoms swell;
We may shut our eyes, but we cannot help knowing

That skies are clear and grass is growing;
The breeze comes whispering in our ear,
That dandelions are blossoming near,
That maize has sprouted, that streams are flowing,
That the river is bluer than the sky,
That the robin is plastering his house hard by;
And if the breeze kept the good news back,
For other couriers we should not lack;
We could guess it all by yon heifer's lowing,—
And hark! how clear bold chanticleer,
Warmed with the new wine of the year,
Tells all in his lusty crowing!

Joy comes, grief goes, we know not how;
Every thing is happy now,
Every thing is upward striving;
"T is as easy now for the heart to be true
As for grass to be green or skies or to be blue,—
"T is the natural way of living:
Who knows whither the clouds have fled?
In the unscarred heaven they leave no wake;
And the eyes forget the tears they have shed,
The heart forgets its sorrow and ache;
The soul partakes the season's youth,
And the sulphurous rifts of passion and woe
Lie deep 'neath a silence pure and smooth,
Like burnt-out craters healed with snow.

Herr Wagner.—Another Opinion.

[From the London Morning Post.]

In a book entitled Kunst-werk der Zukunft, replete with imagination and eloquence, Herr Richard Wagner explains his ideas of Art generally. He says here so many things "novel or strange," that his work might furnish numerous columns to a weekly contemporary, in whose broad sheet a quantity of information regularly appears under the above heading. He thinks the sister arts of dancing (not mere capering, but the art of gesture in its highest sense), music and poetry, originally combined by the ancient Greeks, should never have been separated; for this unnatural proceeding rendered impossible that greatest of works, the drama, which united all the modes of expression in one living picture of human life, where each illustrating the other, all could be easily understood by the people (taking this word in its most comprehensive significance), whose senses and sympathies were thus acted upon simultaneously. That to revive true Art, which is to be the mission of the future artist, the cold monumental beauties of sculpture, the special forms and science of music, together with that style of so-called dramatic poetry which, merely displaying acquired learning, dealing with metaphysical subtleties or abstract reasonings, admits not of combination with the sister-arts, must give place to such vital realities as can only be produced by the combination of demonstrative gesture—music based upon the exigencies of tonal expression, and literature whose words are called forth by the requirements of dramatic action, or well up from the heart as the necessary and immediate manifestation of thought, sentiment, or emotion, and colored by all the graces of intonation and vocal inflexion. Separated, says Herr Wagner, these arts are egotistical and incomprehensible to the many; united, they are universal and easily understood. In the former of these states they are the property of a selfish few, in the latter, that of human nature generally. Thus, celebrated modern dancers, like Carlotta Grisi, Ellsler, Rosati, etc., are mere deformed posture-mistresses—wretched figurantes, whose only object is to please a depraved multitude by vulgar displays of agility and fascinations of doubtful decency—creatures of heartless luxury, whose performances have no intellectual purpose, no psychological expression, and are, therefore, unnatural, unnecessary, and unartistic. The art of double counterpoint, fugue, and canon is a mere mathematical sport of the understanding—music playing egotistically with itself—and those who excelled in it (nearly all the greatest masters), were, in this respect at least, mere selfish cunning tricksters, whose proceedings bore a strong affinity to the shrewd reckonings of Hebrew speculators in the money market.

Dramatic poets are supremely ridiculous when they write unactable plays, only fit to be read; and Goethe's Faust, driven from the stage by metaphysics, prolixity, and a poodle, affords a striking illustration of this. Art, says Herr Wagner, is not a product of Art—it cannot be taught ex cathedra—it grows out of the requirements of civilisation, as civilisation emanates from the exigencies of social man, and stands in the same relation to him that he does to general nature. As man's mind is but the conscious reflection of general nature, and all his true ideas can only be impressions derived from her, so should the true, universal work reproduce these reflected impressions, and be a complete picture of the man himself. Seeking and comparing, imply error; and it is only when the man no longer chooses, but impelled by internal necessity abandons himself to the immediate and natural expression of his ideas, that he is a real artist. If he feel this necessity, he will have something new to tell us—if not, he had best be silent, for arbitrary custom or unnatural abstraction will rule his thoughts, and his work, however skilful, will be egotistical, unnecessary, and meet with no genuine sympathy from the many. The great masters of past times were all necessary (though erroneous in their principles) for they were so many links in the great chain of events; and the gradual progress expressed in their works has led up to the brilliant present, begun by Beethoven and to be continued by Herr Wagner, who proposes to re-unite the three Art-sisters. Although we dissent altogether from many of the doctrines here set forth, it were most unjust not to recognize, in the author of the Kunst-werk der Zukunft, an original thinker, full of conscientious earnestness and poetical fancy; and we, therefore, give him that respectful attention which intellect and honesty of purpose should always command. To judge a composer like Herr Wagner in ex pede Herculeum fashion, would indeed be unfair; and we can only wonder that a gentleman, who sets out with the principle that the only perfect rule is that which embraces the mimetic, musical and dramatic elements, should expose himself to such misconception as must infallibly arise from a performance of his operatic productions in the concert-room, where they must necessarily be deprived of two of their essential properties, and depend only upon one which, according to his own theory, should never stand alone. We must, however, speak of things as we find them, and shall, therefore, endeavor to do as much justice as possible to the works given on this occasion, under what must be considered disadvantageous circumstances. The selection made from our author's compositions was a scene belonging to the opera of Lohengrin, the Knight of the Graal, the words of which, no less than the music, are from the pen of Herr Wagner.

In one respect the music disappointed us. We expected to find it highly, if not extravagantly original, but failed to remark this quality which, in the latter, even more than the former degree, has been given to it by rumor. We observed no marked individuality of style in the score, no epoch-making innovations, such as the very original literary works of the composer had taught us to look for, but, instead, a succession of very brilliantly instrumented pieces, which contained nothing strikingly new either in rhythm, harmony, or orchestral arrangement. It has been said elsewhere that Herr Wagner's theories have merely been framed to suit his creative abilities; if so, the latter were certainly not by when they were measured, for a worse fit do we not remember to have seen. A great deal of this music is excessive and needlessly luxurious in mere loudness and meretriciousness of sound, as the unhappy dancers whom he castigates so unmercifully are in show; and it assuredly contains as much that is "unnecessary" and "customary," as any modern production with which we are acquainted. Herr Wagner, however, condemns his own music more than we are disposed to do; for, as we have said, it has very great merit in respect of instrumentation, and is also highly dramatic in character, and expressive of the words and action it is meant to illustrate. Strikingly original, however—like, for instance, that of Berlioz—it most certainly is not.

The best part of this selection was the introduction, the clear and beautiful scoring of which betokens an amount of strictly musical "knowledge," and mere "science," which we cannot but wonder the author of the Kunst-werk der Zukunft ever condescended to acquire. But Herr Wagner has deigned to learn even more than this, for we understand that he knows the scores of the great though erroneous masters by heart, and can direct a rehearsal of their "progressive" works perfectly well without referring to them. The selection from Lohengrin, very favorably received by a highly critical and, we may add, somewhat prejudiced audience, left the impression, at least upon us, that Herr Wagner is a very clever though not a great composer.

Musical Correspondence.

From NEW YORK.

May 29.—I regret to be obliged to report another very thin audience at the repetition of Mr. EISEL's Complimentary Concert last Saturday afternoon. This time there was really no excuse, for the weather was beautiful, and those gentlemen who could leave their business of an afternoon to attend a Philharmonic rehearsal, might have done so just as well on this occasion. Perhaps they could not talk as much at a concert as at a rehearsal (though with some, according to my experience, this seems to make no difference). As it was, the audience consisted mostly of ladies, and such only, I hope, as did not suffer their regret at the absence of the Philharmonic beaux to impair their enjoyment of the music. The general rendition of the latter was even finer than at the first concert. Miss LEHMANN, particularly, sang the Aria from Fidelio much better than the week before, and did ample justice to the "Wanderer" by SCHUBERT, which was inserted, for some reason, instead of the "Erlking."

With this concert, in regard to which, as well as its predecessor, we regret exceedingly that it did not better fulfil its purpose, we take leave, for the present of Mr. Eisfeld, who we understand intends to sail next week for Europe. He was to have conducted the German Liederfest, which will take place here the end of next month, and has long been busied in making preparations for it; but the necessity of change of climate for him became so obvious, that he was obliged to resign this plan. His place will be filled by Mr. BERGMANN, as you mentioned in your last. Mr. Bergmann has also been elected conductor of the Musical Fund Society, which is waking up after a long nap, and preparing itself for activity next winter. With its concerns under Bergmann, and those of the Philharmonic Society under Eisfeld, we have a rich treat in store for the next season. BORNONIS.

May 30.—The LA GRANGE troupe have now performed four times at the Academy and only once has the house been really full, and then it could not compare with the audiences which "Tell" and Trovatore drew. On Friday, and also last night, Ernani was given. Mme. La Grange's Elvira was too "Frenchy" for my taste in her acting. Her singing is truly wonderful. The new Ernani, Signor MIRATE, makes a fine appearance and generally acts and sings well. But his voice is no longer fresh. MORELLI was excellent. On Friday the house was full. On that evening as also on all others, the audience was much troubled by the noise of regular claqueurs who applauded everything, never minding whom or what they interrupted by their hubbub. They had to be hissed down quite frequently. For to-night Ernani is again announced as 'the last performance but four.' On Friday I Puritani will be given.

At Niblo's there is the PINE troupe, "with a poor orchestra and a poorer chorus," as I am told.—

HACKETT, at the Metropolitan last night, produced a version of Massaniello which he announces as a "grand operatic and melo-dramatic ballet." Why "operatic" I cannot say, as there is not a single vocalist mentioned in the bills.

The Buckleys go on in their good work. They have produced a version of Norma, which, though it is a broad burlesque, still retains all the best music.—From the following card you will see that there is an opportunity offered for some of our resident composers.

CHANCE FOR NATIVE TALENT.—The Messrs. Buckley, grateful for the liberal patronage which has attended their untiring endeavors to present entertainment in a degree of excellence above the mediocrity usually characterizing comic minstrelsy and burlesque; and anxious still further to elevate their reputation for superiority in catering to the taste of a refined and intellectual public, give notice that they are now prepared to treat with American composers for the production of original operas, adapted to the peculiarities of their Company. They must embrace in their caste, rôles of 1st and 2nd tenors, soprano and contralto, bass and barytone; and all accepted Operas will be produced under the most favorable circumstances, regardless of expense. Communications in relation to the subject will meet with prompt attention.

JAMES BUCKLEY & SON.

I hope Mr. FRY and Mr. BRISTOW (who, by the way, is conducting the English opera orchestra) will pay attention to the above. Perhaps, as the Academy will not give the Stabat Mater, Mr. F. can change it to a comic opera and let the Buckleys produce it. Some parts are said to be comic enough already. But seriously, I am anxious to know with what responses advertisement will meet. R.

Musical Chat-Chat.

There is a curious anecdote connected with the first performance of ROSSINI's "William Tell" at the Académie Royale in Paris, 1829. The authors of the libretto were Messieurs JOUY and HYPOLITE BIS. Immense was the success of this (then and now) last opera of the maestro, and after the performance the enthusiastic orchestra went to serenade him. The crowd, delighted with the music, cried out bis! bis! (equivalent to our encore). When Mons. Bis, the librettist, who resided in the same house, and fancied that they meant to call him out, appeared bowing and smiling at the window, was very sorry to inform them of the absence of his colleague, M. Jouy, hoped they would accept the heart-felt thanks of his collaborateurs and himself for the kind reception given to the new work, and retired amid the shouts and laughter of the crowd, who relished the joke as keenly as the serenade.

A newspaper in Frankfort-on-the-Main, (April 29) congratulates its readers on the prospect of hearing at the next week's Philharmonic concert the pianist ALFRED JAELL, who had already been admired there as a boy in '49. It advises them to make the most of this opportunity, since Jaell thinks of terminating his concert-giving career and settling down domestically (häuslich) in Paris. What are we to understand?

The fête of the Immaculate Conception has been celebrated with great splendor at Naples. MERCADANTE composed a hymn for the occasion, which was performed in the open air by 1573 musicians, of whom 893 were instrumentists, and 680 vocalists. The Neapolitan journals declare that the like was never heard. . . . A curious law-suit has just taken place in Paris, showing that the law is sometimes a ruthless interferer with the rights of woman and of song-birds. "Mme. LABORDE, it appears, does not live in the most loving manner with him she has chosen for her husband. The lady has a voice, which she looks on as her private and peculiar property, 'settled to her own use,' as the lawyers say. M. Laborde thinks otherwise, and declares that her voice, as well as all else pertaining to her, belongs to him, her lawful husband. The lady was restive, and made an engagement with M. CROSNIER for the Grand Opera, whereupon the husband appeals to the tribunal of justice, which he prays will prevent his wife singing without his consent. The tribunal has decided, and adjudged the husband to be in the right, having forbidden Mme. Laborde to accept an engagement without first receiving the authority of her liege lord." . . . The story that FANNY CERITO, the danseuse, has been studying music and singing, and is about to make her debut as prima donna at Covent Garden, is pronounced a canard. . . . M. ORTOLAN is the "savory name" of one of the present French operetta composers:—is he too a descendant of blithe Bob-o'-Lincoln? Speaking of names, we notice among the performers of Verdi's Rigoletto in Vienna lately, one Sig. CARRION as the tenor. Not so bad, considering the plot and music of that opera. Again, the Spanish dramatist, from whom was borrowed the grim plot of Il Trovatore, rejoices in the cut-throat name of GARCIA GUTIERREZ.

A London correspondent gives the following information about recent changes among the leading Feuilletonists of the Paris newspapers:

"The theatrical critic for the Moniteur during some years past was M. THIERRY, a gentleman whose good taste, able criticism, and invariable courtesy are well known. The musical critic for the same ministerial journal during some years has been M. P. A. FIORENTINO, who, under the nom de plume of A. de ROVRAY, has, week by week, delighted his readers with feuilletons second to none for wit, humor, good sense, and critical acumen. The musical critic for the Constitutionnel was the same M. P. A. FIORENTINO; the dramatic critic, M. LIREUX, whose pen, light, gay, and airy, could discourse about nothing better than that of any other man in Europe, save, perhaps, the great and immortal JULES JANIN, who for some twenty years has never missed a single Monday in the Journal des Débats. The musical and dramatic critic of the Presse was M. THEOPHILE GAUTIER, than whom there is no abler writer at present living in France. So much for the past.—Now for the changes which have taken place. M. Thierry has left the Moniteur, and M. Th. Gautier has supplied his place, so that he is now the dramatic, and M. P. A. Fiorentino, under the signature of A. de Rovray, the music critic of that journal. M. Lireux has quitted the Constitutionnel, and M. Fiorentino assumes his duties, and becomes dramatic as well as musical critic for that paper. M. NESTOR ROQUEPLAN succeeds M. Th. Gautier on the Presse.

A correspondent of the N. Y. Evening Post, under the head of "Art Gossip in Boston," has much to say of those private musical parties to which we have alluded. The following passage will be appreciated by a number of our readers:

"The Mendelssohn Quintette Club have done much in this way at private soirées through the whole season, both in the city proper and in the suburban cities, and have led great numbers into an intimate knowledge and love of the beautiful chamber music of the great masters. Can any more perfect enjoyment to a refined taste be conceived than such as your correspondent cannot but recall, as often experienced at the mansion of a gentleman of this city, of rare taste in all the arts, and in whose hospitable parlors, while listening to the divinest music, you at the same time may feast your eyes and your soul by gazing on the most beautiful works of modern painters, where the chefs-d'œuvres of Overbeck and Ary Scheffer are before your eyes, and the Divine Poet and Beatrice in Paradise almost seem to move before you to the sweet sounds, as you look at them on the breathing (no, not breathing—Beatrice is a spirit, without the breath of life, and Dante dares not) canvas of Scheffer. You may turn to the Divine Comedy and read the page if you will, for the poets are here, and it will lose nothing by being read in such surroundings. After such an evening with musicians, painters and poets, (and some of each, too, of no little note among the guests,) one cannot but have pleasant dreams at night and many pleasant memories hereafter."

Paris.

April 21.—(From the Correspondence of the London Musical World.)—There is at last an effectual break in the dull monotony which has so long characterized the musical world of Paris. M. ADAM's new opera, Le Cour de Célimène, has been produced at the Opera-Comique; and the Lisette of M. ORTOLAN (savoury name), has seen the light at the Théâtre-Lyrique. Both have succeeded, and each deserved the success it obtained, which is of the quiet and mild, rather than the enthusiastic and violent description.

The fair Célimène is a countess of noble birth and ancient descent, endowed with beauty, wit and wealth, tempered by the coquetry and flightiness which form the basis of her character. Her sister, the Baroness, possesses equal beauty, less wealth, and more steadiness.

The countess resides in her chateau in Brittany and is surrounded by a court of aspirants to her hand and fortune, consisting of one commander, one chevalier, four youths, four full-grown, and four elderly gentlemen. To each of these she holds out some hopes of success; but, in her secret heart, the commander is the favored lover; and he, at first divided between the charms and merits of the two sisters, puts their names into a hat, and, drawing forth that of Célimène, determines to devote his attention to her. The chevalier is a Gascon, full of the hot blood and boastful speech for which his countrymen are proverbial. He first courted the baroness, but, receiving no encouragement, changed his wooing to Célimène. She, with her innate coquetry, led him on to hope for success, but one fine morning quietly informed him that her choice was made, and that she would bestow her hand upon the commander. The chevalier is furious, declares to the countess that he will show her that a gentleman of his standing cannot be so treated with impunity; that she shall not marry the commander; that to prevent her so doing he will have recourse to prudence, deceit and force; the scaling ladder and the narcotic. He rushes from her presence furious, seeks the commander, insults him, and provokes a duel, wherein the unfortunate commander is hit in body, limbs and head, and falls, declaring that nothing can stand against the rapier of the furious Gascon. Célimène, in despair, sees that she must pour oil on the troubled waters, and sends the baroness with tender messages on her part to the chevalier. He, on seeing the baroness, feels his old affection revive in full force, and, fancying that she delivers on her own behalf the tender messages wherewith she is charged by her sister, falls at her feet and pours forth his passionate vows. The baroness is delighted, as she sees a way of relieving her sister, and she has a weakness for the chevalier, whom she regrets having refused. She therefore encourages him and accepts his hand; the commander weds Célimène, and so ends the opera. The libretto is exceedingly well written by M. BOISIER, the phraseology is neat, pointed, and terse, situations well worked out, and the plot clearly developed. The music is lively and replete with the comic element. The opening chorus from the twelve aspirants leads at once in medias res, the melody serving in a duet for the two sisters, which follows.

M. BATAILLE, as the Commander, sang and acted extremely well; and M. JOURDAN, in the Gascon chevalier, presented an admixture of true passion and exaggerated ardor, full of buffoonery, while he sang like an artist, as usual. Mme. MIOLAN (Célimène) sang brilliantly, and was a good specimen of the tantalizing coquette, fair and cruel, inspiring love and hate at once; but she could not look the character. Mme. COLSON (Baroness), exhibited talents of no mean order; and the chorus of the Twelve Lovers was what a chorus should always be; what it generally is at the Opera-Comique, and seldom elsewhere.

The Lisette of M. Ortolan is the daughter of a Norman magistrate. The curtain rises on a group of peasants gathering apples and gay with cider, which, like their song, has been somewhat sour. The drum beats, and the youth of the district come forth to draw lots for the Conscription. Germain draws a blank, and remains at home; Moly draws a prize—if it be one—and becomes one of the defenders of his country. A demoiselle of a neighboring chateau, lately arrived from Paris, next appears on the stage, and, being unacquainted with the beauties of her own domain, takes Lisette for her guide. This demoiselle loves and is beloved by the Count de Thalbourg, but her "cruel parents" have chosen for her the Marquis de Gerville, newly arrived in the district as commander of a recruiting party. The marquis, however, has no idea of marriage, being a thorough unbeliever in the sex; and, on his first introduction to the young countess, proposes to her a rendezvous at midnight in a neighboring ruin. She is furious at the insult, but, concealing her wrath, consults Lisette who advises her to avenge so gross an outrage, and offers to change dresses with her, and go to the place assigned. Midnight arrives, and with it the marquis and Lisette, the countess being concealed among the ruins. The marquis presses his love with so much warmth and affection as to alarm Lisette, the false countess, who thereupon proceeds to administer to him some vigorous soufflets, well delivered, after which she takes to her heels and to flight. Next day the marquis boasts everywhere of his bonnes fortunes, which, coming to the ears of Thalbourg, he demands an explanation, and Lisette declares it was she, and not the countess, who received the kiss and administered the blow. But the explanation falls like a thunderbolt on the head of poor Germain, the lover of Lisette, who, in despair at his mistress's infidelity, takes Moly's place and departs for the wars. The last act takes us to a chateau of the young countess, near Paris. She has been accompanied by Lisette, who grieves at the loss of Germain; he becomes a captain in the French army, still maintains his affection for Lisette, though he still believes her culpable. However, at length the countess unveils the mystery, and all the lovers are united and made happy. The music is that of a composer with original ideas, but inexperienced in his art. There is too much emphasis in his instrumentation, and too much noise throughout.

April 28.—On Monday, April 30th, the vigil of the Exhibition, a grand performance will take place, in the Church of Saint Eustache, of "Te Deum," composed for the occasion by M. Hector Berlioz, who will conduct the orchestra. The executants will number 950; namely, 800 in the chorals, and 150 in the orchestra, which will contain most of the best instrumentalists in Paris. After the "Te Deum," Mr. Henry Smart, who comes from London expressly, will play various selections from Handel on the new organ just built for the church by M. Ducroquet. On the same day the new chapel, painted by some of our best artists, will be thrown open to the public for the first time.

Considerable discussion arose in the committee on the Budget, respecting a proposition of one of its members. He desired that subventions should be granted to one theatre in each of the large provincial towns of Lille, Rouen, Bordeaux, Lyons, Marseilles, Toulouse, and Strasbourg, the latter town being, with the exception of Paris, the only one in France whose theatre receives state assistance. This subvention was supported on the ground that the provinces have a fair right to some portion of the national funds so lavishly expended on the theatres of the capitol, of whose good fortune they are not a little jealous. The pupils of the various conservatoires might then be sent to make their débuts at these theatres, whereby they would be somewhat prepared for the terrible ordeal of facing a Parisian audience. No result ensued from the discussion; but it is by no means improbable that the large provincial theatres of France will, ere long, enjoy considerable subventions.

Meanwhile I believe it is settled that the Italian Opera will be open three times a week during the summer, and that the city of Paris will grant a considerable subvention to the manager who has been bold enough to undertake the speculation, which will probably terminate in a heavy loss.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA.—On Saturday, May 5th, L. BLACHE made his first appearance this season as Dr. Dulcamara in L'Elisir d'Amore. Mme. BOSIO was Adina; Sig. GARDONI, Nemorino; and GRAZIANI, Belcore. Rossini's Il Conte Ory followed, for the fifth time, and seems to have given more and more delight. Then followed the last work of "Young Italy's" idol, the Trovatore. We give the Musical World's account of it:

In the accumulation of horrors the Trovatore gives the sack even to Rigoletto. But the terrible earnestness of the last scene of Rigoletto would redeem a multitude of sins. The final scene of Il Trovatore is horrible without relief, and ineffective in the bargain.

Signor Verdi so frequently "surpassed himself," that we looked forward to much pleasure from the music of Il Trovatore, where he is said to have "surpassed himself" once more. It is apparently written with more care than the majority of his works; the unisons are fewer; and the desire to give a true dramatic interest to the scene is more manifest. On the other hand—which surprised us—the tunes are not so frequent as in his former operas. Much of the music of Il Trovatore, however, has character, is often pleasing, oftener well adapted to the situations, and occasionally in point of freedom and breadth—for example, the air Ah! ben mio, in the third act, so magnificently sung by Sig. TAMBERLIK—worthy of unqualified praise. The audience, though favorably disposed towards the work and its composer, were not roused to enthusiasm. There were only two encores. Nevertheless, the friends of Sig. Verdi never had greater cause to be satisfied. Nothing was left undone by the management to ensure a perfect execution and complete success.

The singers acquitted themselves admirably. It was Mme. VIARDOT's first appearance. The part of Azucena suits her, and the music lies well for her voice.—The dramatic energy and artistic feeling of Mme. Viardot were exhibited to evident advantage. The scene where Azucena makes the confession to Manrico was intense and powerful, and made a deep impression.

Mlle. JENNY NEY appears to greater advantage as Verdi's Leonora than as the Leonora of Beethoven.—

Her acting was natural, and occasionally forcible and earnest. Her singing, too, was greatly to be admired, and frequently elicited the approbation of the audience. Mlle. Jenny Ney, by her execution of the music, showed herself a thorough proficient in the modern Italian bravura school, and sang with admirable facility.

Of Signor Tamberlik's singing and acting it is impossible to speak too highly. He was magnificent, and electrified the house in more than one scene.

The ballata, sung behind the scenes, at intervals with the choral "Miserere," in the last act, was given with such expression and tenderness that a unanimous encore ensued. The scenes with Leonora in the third act, and Azucena in the fourth, were equally fine and impressive. In the concerted music, Signor Tamberlik's voice produced all the effect the composer could possibly have contemplated.

Signor GRAZIANI, in the Conte di Luna, displayed to more advantage than ever his singularly fine voice and the apathy of his manner. He was encored in the cavatina (second act), Il balen del suo sorriso—one of the most popular airs of the opera; but hardly produced the fuore ascribed to him in Paris. He does not improve as an actor. In the little part of Ferrando (played by M. Gassier in Paris), Signor TAGLIAPICO was all that could be wished, and gave the descriptive scena (Act I.) like a true artist.

Italian Opera.

Lucrezia Borgia on Friday, and "William Tell," for the third time, on Saturday afternoon, completed the performances of last week at the Boston Theatre. Our stay was limited to the first act of Lucrezia: but we heard enough to convince us that this happiest and best-wearing opera of DONIZETTI was never, as a whole, cast so effectively upon any Boston stage. Report (of the appreciative) confirms the promise of the opening act, or Prologue. STEFFANONE, to be sure, is not GRISI; yet the fresh recollection of the Grisi did not make one indifferent to the very high excellence of her lyric impersonation, which includes soul, action, voice and execution, blended and inspired to one dramatic and artistic end. In neither was the voice in very perfect preservation; but in both you feel that the voice always answers to the lightning summons of passion. Steffanone is indeed the greater vocalist, and there is that sympathetic, truly lyric quality in her tones, that makes them go to the mark and tell, in spite, as we have said before, of any tremolo or hoarseness. Her contrast of the mother's tenderness and of the insulted Borgia's pride and rage in the first scene, was, both as singing and as action, admirably true and beautiful and touching.

Sig. BRIGNOLI, the young new tenor, was not a BENEDETTI, nor a MARIO, as Edgardo. Yet it was altogether a very pleasing and sufficient rendering, save a feebleness in his highest notes, which in the strong concerted passages were frequently drowned by the rough blasts of the trombones. He is a youth of rather an elegant and distinguished presence, although his stage gait was awkward; his voice is sweet, fresh, flexible, sympathetic, and of good volume, sometimes reminding one of Mario's by a certain elasticity of tone, and capable of some strong, effective outbursts. He sings with taste and feeling, and (to his credit be it said) is given to a simple, faithful, unembellished rendering of the music of his author. We needed not to wait the appearance of BADIALI as the Duke, to know that we have never had that part better done. The charming picturesque rôle of Maffeo Orsini defines itself so satisfactorily in the first act, that one needed not to witness more to estimate the peculiar aptitude therefor of the new and beautiful contralto Signorina VESTVALI. The nobleness and refined elegance of her tall figure, with the beauty of her head and face; the tastefulness and rigorous propriety of her Venetian male costume, and the freedom, grace and animation of her movements, made her look a sort of beau ideal of the character. Her voice in its ordinary range is of a fresh and pleasing quality, though not remarkable. Nor is her singing, although she has fair execution and expression, and sang (so long as we heard her) in tune,—which was not always the case as we remembered her one evening in New York. She commands some remarkably strong, mannish low notes, which she seems too much tempted to employ, because they win that loud applause which always follows any feat, that is exceptional, although not pleasing to the cultivated ear, and not æsthetic. We must confess, with all the charms of the Vestvali, we liked not the low notes, either on the score of beauty or expression. It is true they were powerful; it is true that with the eyes closed we might have thought it a man's, or a full grown boy's voice; which doubtless charmed some listeners, as marvellously suited to the part; but the true ends of Art would have been better served by expending upon the legitimate voice the pains taken in developing a monster contralto. Yet taking her all in all, we must admit, that we have never witnessed a more fascinating Orsini.

When to four such principals we add Sig. COLLETTI as Gubetta, and such better than average singers as filled the parts of the various nobles, whose voices are so essential in the rich concerted music of that first scene; when we add so large, well-voiced and well-trained a chorus, and so effective (would that it were not sometimes much too effective) an orchestra, with the ever-at-home, sure MARETZK for the conductor; also a crowded audience, familiar with the piece and always happy to recall its musical richness and dramatic completeness,—we may safely say that even without GRISI and MARIO, without TRUFFI and BENEDETTI, without BOSIO and BETTINI, we had yet the materials of a more perfect presentation than this opera ever enjoyed here before. So it was generally felt to be, the further it went on, and we hear a call on all sides for a repetition.

But we should neglect a duty, if we did not mention one most serious drawback; namely the overwhelming, deafening crash of the brass instruments, lashed up to furious fortissimo in all the stronger passages. We could actually feel the hoarse and angry waves of sound smite and thump upon the walls of the auditorium behind us, and rebound thence on our private tympanum. Bad enough in itself, but doubly bad, when it so drowned the voices of the central persons in those spirited ensembles of the first act, that you only saw their singing. We suppose there is something in the whole tendency of modern Italian Opera which leads a conductor unconsciously into the habit of exaggerating all the powerful signs of expression, of employing all the musical intensives to get up all the excitement possible upon the least occasion. It is a sort of musical swearing; a taking of great names in vain, a borrowing of emphasis so often and so thoughtlessly that nothing any more can be emphatic. "O, reform it altogether."

"William Tell" again, Saturday afternoon, delighted a large audience, composed very much of ladies. The musician and the cultivated amateur have found more in it for sense and soul to feast upon, than in all the common run of Italian operas. In spite of its length and in spite of the curtailments, those who have heard it repeatedly have found the charm of its wholesome subject and its fresh, vigorous, original, rich music growing on them greatly. After two such happy inspirations as this and Lucrezia Borgia, wide as the distance is between them, how was it possible that there should be crowds and enthusiasm about —

Well what about Il Trovatore? What of VERDI's "last and greatest," after a second hearing, and in Boston? Of the performance, as compared with that first one in New York, we may say, better; of the music we can only say the same. Of the reception, it was warmly demonstrative enough to warrant the eulogistic passion of the newspapers, and the "tremendous successes" and "immense enthusiasms" of the next day's advertisements; yet the audience warmed slower than in New York. There was plenty of applause; but this, as usual, was meant more for the singers than for the composer, more for the stage effect, the scenery, the gipsies, anvils, &c., than for the music. We have been even agreeably disappointed in meeting so many who were proof against the loud assault of Verdiism.

But the singers made the best of it, and even in this ungrateful music added to their laurels. STEFFANONE threw all her power of voice and soul into her part of Leonora, and was enthusiastically applauded. Yet it was a severe task for her; the music and the situations kept her voice continually on the strain, demanding her utmost strength and volume; it is a part with no repose; and consequently her hoarse low tones conveyed ere-long a painful sense of effort. VESTVALI, as the gipsy mother, did not this time disguise the youthful beauty of her face, and was dressed more tastefully, though perhaps less gipsy-like than in New York. She displayed a great intensity of tragic action, though of a somewhat studied kind; and indeed how could one expect much naturalness in the impersonation of a character, whose ruling motives are an ever haunting imagination of being burned at the stake, mingled with a mad thirst for revenge! Much of her music was finely sung; the mannish low tones could not be said to be out of character in a rôle that is altogether unnatural; and yet contrasted with that fair maiden face, with the æsthetic ideal suggested by so beautiful a presence, they appealed more to the superstitious associations of witchcraft and gipsies, than to the artistic feeling.

Sig. AMODIO, as the Count di Luna, a man heavily moulded physically, put a great deal of fire and energy into his part, and sang the music with a fresh, strong, ringing baritone, of which no note was ever lost. Sig. BRIGNOLI's musical, true tenor continued to grow upon his audience. His serenade in the first act: Deserto sulla terra; his duet with Azucena, and his strain heard from the prison tower, amid the pauses of the Miserere,—which are among the few sweet passages of the music—were sung with good style and pathos. These four were so well seconded by subordinates and chorus, as well as by scenery and costume, that the performance as a whole was about as effective as Verdi's best admirer could have wished. Of course there were those, and not a few, with whom it took marvellously, and the managers saw their interest in repeating it on Wednesday night, and in announcing it again ("for the last time") for this afternoon.

With regard to the music of Il Trovatore, we must still say, what we know that many of the thoughtful ones in these audiences have felt as deeply as ourselves—(and by thoughtful ones we do not mean those who regard music from a cold, scholastic point of view, but those who have "warmth and imagination" enough to feel, accept, enjoy whatever in Art does truly address itself to these qualities of our nature)—that it is a kind of music which aims simply to create excitement; it makes its appeal as to a jaded and blasé appetite; it does not trust our wholesome, simple sense of beauty, nor seek to approach us through our every-day and natural sensibilities. It must excite, astonish, startle, even terrify, and in the momentary outburst of applause which follows the identifying of such shocks with musical means and processes, it finds its cheap triumph. To do this it must assault the senses with loud and powerful effects; with brazen fortissimos; with short, strongly marked dance rhythms, as the tragedy deepens; with hard-enamelled, flinty unisons, where passion would fain seem at the white heat; with ominous tremolos of the orchestra accompanying the recitatives. That Verdi has his own peculiar cut of melody, from Ernani downward, (we can scarcely call it, for it does not freely flow), and that this melody is brilliant, is ingenious, is effective, no one will deny. But it is hard melody; his musical ideas come upon you steel-clad; they are knights in armor, with their visors down; they may excite your young romantic fancy, they may overthrow you with their shock, but you feel not their warm human embrace, and their soul speaks not to your soul through their eyes. It is a kind of music which leaves the heart cold. We hear the opera through, we are surprised, sometimes excited, sometimes pleased; we go away, and what has it left with us? Has it deposited anywhere in the recesses of our memory and our soul any of those honeyed secretions of melody and fancy and fine feeling, which will flow out unbidden ever and anon as long as we live, to remind us of a rich and deep experience? We doubt it. Since we have heard Don Giovanni, since we have heard "William Tell," &c., &c., it has been as if perennial flowers of music were implanted evermore within us. But if strains of Il Trovatore haunt us, it is more as in annoying dreams, like impressions stamped upon the senses, but still unaccepted by the soul.

Death of Sir Henry Bishop.

This most popular and most voluminous, if not in every sense the greatest English composer, after PURCELL, died on the first of May, at about the age of seventy-two. He has been chiefly known of late years by his fine Glees and Choruses, many of which are still sung and admired, and will ever rank among the best works of their kind. But he has also had his day as a composer of English operas, which were much in vogue among his countrymen, before the new passion for Italian Opera made all such things seem antiquated. There is a list of some seventy operas, operettas, ballets, &c., of which he was the author, wholly or in part, between the years 1806 and 1824. Some account of these was given in our Journal for May 5th. He was long a leader in the musical affairs of England and shared all the honors. He was a Director of the Philharmonic Society from its foundation, and for some years Conductor of the Concerts of Ancient Music. He was professor of Music in the Universities of Edinburg and Oxford, Member of the Royal Academy of Music, and was knighted by the Queen in 1842 (the only composer, it is said, on whom that order has been conferred). In 1820 he was tendered the freedom of the city of Dublin. In 1836 he married the lady who is so widely known in this country as Madame ANNA BISHOP. Of this unhappy union and the consequent separation there has been perhaps enough said. The cause commonly assigned was, that Madame, being a fine singer and having been educated at the Academy, desired to sing in public, and that her husband was opposed. A son and daughter by this marriage are both living.

Bishop is said to have earned more money than any other English composer; yet he died in a state of great pecuniary embarrassment. For some months previous to his death, there had been strong appeals made in the papers to the patriotic pride and gratitude of English music-lovers, and a series of benefit concerts, chiefly of his own compositions, was commenced in Hanover Square and Exeter Hall, by Mr. MITCHELL, who has also exerted himself to organize similar series in all the principal towns of England. One or more of these concerts was conducted by Sir Henry in person, which led to vain hopes of his recovery. The Times, in forwarding this appeal, had the following appreciative remarks on his artistic career and character as a composer.

It cannot be asserted that Bishop was an idle man, or that he did not work hard to communicate all he possessed. No English musician has composed so much—few so well, as Henry Bishop; and probably none has produced so many things that are likely to endure. In every house where music, more especially vocal music, is a welcome guest, the name of Bishop has long been and must long remain a household word. For these reasons we feel it a strong duty to plead his cause, and to proclaim him among those who are entitled to consideration for the benefits they have conferred. Who that has been soothed by the sweet melody of 'Blow gentle gales,' charmed by the measures of 'Lo! here the gentle lark,' enlivened by the animated strains of 'Foresters, sound the cheeful horn,' touched by the sadder music of 'The winds whistle cold'—who that has been haunted by the insinuating tunes of 'Tell me, my heart,' 'Under the greenwood tree,' or 'Where the wind blows,' which Rossini, the minstrel of the South was wont to love so well—who that has felt sympathy with

'As it fell, upon a day,
In the merry month of May,' admired that masterpiece of glee and chorus, 'The chough and crow,' or been moved to jollity at some convivial feast by 'Mynheer Van Dunck,' the most original and genial of comic glees, will not be grieved to hear that the inventor of them all—and they were all included in Monday night's programme, with so many more of equal merit and beauty—is in sickness and distress, without money, and no longer able to toil for it, deprived indeed of ALL 'that should accompany old age?'

To this we may add a few sentences from the obituary notice in the London Musical World:

That we have had and have more accomplished and learned musicians than BISHOP is unquestionable; but that we ever could boast, with the single exception of PURCELL, a composer so individual and so identified with the sentiment of English national melody, is equally doubtful. DIBDIN was a melodist only; while ARNE did so little which can last, that we only remember him as the author of "Rule Britannia," "Where the bee sucks," some of the airs in Midas, and an opera after the manner of his day*—an imitation and not a very good one. But Bishop was not merely genuine; he was prolific, and produced a great many things that are likely to endure as long as the Art itself, which, after all, can only be said of a few composers. The melody of Bishop was a pure flowing spring that had its source in nature, and was, therefore, a gift from above.

Bishop was not, like Purcell, a discoverer; he did little, in short, to advance the Art; but he added to the stores of wealth which are heaped in Music's granaries, and among the minstrels of his time his harp was ever of the sweetest and most silvery. His tune was varied and abundant. Now gay, now sad, now grave, now humorous, it ever flowed spontaneously. His vein of melody, as in the instance of far greater masters than himself, seems to open without an effort. Nothing forced, exaggerated, square cut, or otherwise uncongenial, was to be traced in his productions—we allude, of course, to his best, not the mere chaff of his labors, but the good grain from which time has sifted it.

Beethoven's Symphonies.

BY "A FRIEND OF ART."

From the German.

The deepest insight into the nature and peculiar character of any Art is only possible when this Art has reached its culminating point, and when its efficacy is the greatest. Thus the Greeks, to whom the deepest nature of the plastic Arts and of Poetry revealed itself in their statues of the gods, in Epos and in Drama, attained to no deep perception of the nature of Music, since they possessed no real musical art. Music in its distinctive character, as afterwards developed, remained to them a closed domain. The same was true also of the first Christian centuries; indeed we can only speak of a really classical art of Music since PALESTRINA. As with the Musical art in general, so with the special kinds of music. The nature of the so-called ecclesiastical and spiritual music was already, with BACH and HANDEL, in the middle of the last century, unfolded in its full peculiarity, without their so much as dreaming at that time of the immeasurable meaning and omnipotence of the pure Tone-Art, that is, of Instrumental Music; in fact this still remained a riddle, when dramatic song music had reached its bloom in GLUCK and MOZART. For then BEETHOVEN had not created the Eroica. In this work did the genius of pure music first begin to unveil its deepest, inmost nature.

The world now recognizes Beethoven as the true Messiah of Instrumental Music, and in him the essence of this form of Art is manifested in the most comprehensive and the deepest manner. And then again Beethoven is the tone-poet, who has most richly developed the single branches of instrumental music; the solo Sonata not less than the more comprehensive string Quartet, and this not more than the gigantic work of Symphonies. But it is the Symphony above all, which has glorified the name of Beethoven; in that you think involuntarily first of Beethoven; he and it have grown together by as intimate a tie as GOETHE and his "Faust." Just as Goethe's peculiarity is revealed to us most deeply in his deepest work, the "Faust," so Beethoven's Symphonies give us the deepest insight into his nature, at the same time that they reveal to us the inmost peculiarity of pure Tone-Art, its richest fulness. Let us approach then these creations, with the hope to gain a genial image of their general and special characteristics, which may fill us with admiration for the creative power of the master and for the lofty signification of his works. — But first a brief consideration of the immediate predecessors of Beethoven in the realm of Symphony, of HAYDN and MOZART, will be useful.

HAYDN is the acknowledged founder of the Symphony. The Symphony developed itself in him out of the pianoforte Sonata, and one may safely call his symphonies, of which he has written a very great number, Sonatas for the orchestra. And this in regard to form, as well as substance. The forms of the Haydn symphonies seem, in comparison with Beethoven's, small; the single pieces (movements) of these works move in scarcely larger form-relations than we meet in Sonatas for the pianoforte. As to the subject-matter of the Haydn symphonies, it is throughout quite simple, at bottom not essentially, specifically distinct from that of the Sonata; its horizon limited, in comparison with the boundless perspective in Beethoven. We recognize the difference here between the child's and the man's circle of vision. In these tone-works we find expressed the careless cheerfulness of the child, his playful joy, his wanton, roguish humor, not the deep earnestness of manly life, not the proud, self-conscious joy of the man. Where Haydn oversteps that child-like sphere, where the child seeks to play the part of youth and manhood, there appears his limit. This is proved by a Symphony of this master, which he has called the "Military Symphony." The subject-matter of this work has not in the remotest degree the military character, unless you make the roll of drums and crash of trumpets in the second movement point to that; but even this passage seems so naive, so corresponding with the whole, which is pervaded by the most child-like, harmless spirit, as to betray at once the innocent and playful child, concerned about nothing less than military matters. But in that limited sphere Haydn appears so rich, so multifarious, so sound, and so original, that on this ground itself, as well as on the ground of his significance in the history of Art, he is justly counted among the heroes of the art of Music.

It is a consequence of this peculiarity of Haydn's artist nature, that his orchestra wants the significant individual richness of Beethoven's. The child lacks the individual significance of the man's organs of expression. And so in the Haydn orchestra we miss the lifesome characteristics of the single instruments, the use of each according to its peculiar nature. It is merely the alternation of the sensuous charm and of the coloring of the instruments, which determines their separate introduction; it is not called out by any inward necessity of lending to a precise ideal subject-matter, this or that precise expression through this or that precise instrument. Hence in these tone-creations the dramatic soul-life of Beethoven does not unfold itself; the pure lyric element predominates.

With MOZART, too, the Symphony is still thoroughly lyrical. Otherwise, however, Mozart distinguishes himself entirely from Haydn, at least in his principal symphonies, both in form and substance. The form of his leading works in this kind is larger, broader, although it is essentially the Haydn form, in contradistinction to the freer form of Beethoven. The working up, or treatment, as it is called, is richer with Mozart; indeed in the last movement of his great Ode Symphony he wrote a fugue composed of four independent themes. In regard to subject-matter Mozart distinguishes himself from his predecessor by greater significance and depth. It is enough to allude here to the G minor symphony of this master, in which work Symphony first takes for its theme the earnestness and sorrow of man's life, and in which there resound moods far removed from Haydn's child-like nature. Accordingly the world of instruments in Mozart's symphonies becomes a richer, more inspired world. We miss the individualizing power of Beethoven, but quite as little do we find the insignificant and child-like play of Haydn. In the "song-delighted," "song-abounding" Mozart the single instrument approaches the expression of the human voice, it acquires a soul. And now that instrumental music, or rather now that the genius of Symphony had, in the final fugue of the C major symphony of Mozart, so subdued and spell-bound the severe elements of Counterpoint, that these could receive into themselves the charm of Melody; now that free Melody had so got the upper hand of the strict form, all was ready for the Messiah to appear, who with new subject-matter at the same time created a new form. That Messiah was BEETHOVEN.

But not in his first symphonies does this Messianic character show itself; it is only in his third symphony, in the Eroica, as we have said before, that Beethoven begins his epoch-making career. The two first symphonies of Beethoven belong essentially to the first epoch of his artistic creation, in which Beethoven is not yet himself, in which he still walks mainly in the paths of his forerunners, Haydn and Mozart; so that these works might be in many respects ascribed to one of these two masters; a remark which bears application to the charming Septet and to the first Symphony. One who can feel as high a degree of enthusiasm for these works, as for the later peculiarly Beethovenish creations, gives evidence that he has not received into himself the latter works with true feeling and understanding, and may take a lesson from Beethoven himself, who regretted having written his first twenty works. Nevertheless, ex ungue leonem. Already in his first works the later Beethoven does not deny himself; the genius flashes through them here and there. This is especially the case with the symphonies, which we are now to consider in an æsthetic point of view.

The first Symphony (21st work) in C major still breathes the Haydn spirit altogether; it is distinguished by a certain child-like feeling; a careless, guileless cheerfulness pervades the whole; a purely lyrical outflow of feeling predominates in the work; the forces, which are so active in the completed symphonies, still slumber; as yet no presentiment of the coming greatness is awakened. How could Beethoven, when he wrote this work, have anticipated that it would not be very long before he would compose the Eroica and finally the Ninth Symphony! In Beethoven's first symphony we have throughout the Haydn form, as shown especially in the second and fourth movements. Nor does the instrumentation enjoy as yet the significant individual life of the complete Beethoven creations; there is no pregnant characteristic stamped upon the instruments; all is still too colorless. This follows from the spirit and contents of the work, from the whole artistic step of development, on which it stands. The child cannot yet show the individuality of the man. And the first symphony is filled entirely with the child-like spirit. But even in this work the bold originality of the master announces itself palpably enough, and in a remarkable manner at the very beginning. The first chord of the symphony is a dissonance. Significant indication of a genius, which has been called one steeped in sorrow, but whose real nature was not sorrow; or rather it was this, but not only this; it was joy; and that too not without sorrow; but such joy as is born of sorrow, the fulfilled, highest joy, joy achieved through struggle. And so that dissonance proceeds to resolve itself into pure consonance. And so we find the ideal, organic relationship of the child-like C major symphony with its later sisters, above all with its last sister, the Ninth Symphony; thus it stands no more forsaken and alone there in the Beethoven world, it reaches its hand out friendly to its sisters. We take this hand and with it we approach the second symphony, in D major (36th work.)

It is another life that comes to meet us now. There is youthful fire in these tones; there is a bold, spirited, self-conscious marching and storming away upon the arena of Symphony.

Here, on the other hand, we have a love-intoxicated yearning, a dreamy languishing and tender supplication, which often seems to lose itself in sweet self-forgetfulness. But then again it roars and storms away in youthful extravagance, in unbridled ecstasy, as if to enjoy thus the fulness of its being, of its power. A type and compendium of true youthful life. Beethoven in this work has ripened from the child into the youth, and this sketch indicates the ideal purport of the second symphony. Courage and energy is the main character of the first movement; the tender longing and soft languishing of love are mirrored in the thoughtful Larghetto in A major; unbridled joy and youthful overflow of spirits in the third and fourth movements. So storms away, so loves and so enjoys the youth. But the youth's circle of vision, the field in which he moves, is larger and more comprehensive than that of the child; the youth breaks through the narrow limits, which are set before the child, and moves in freer paths and forms. And so Beethoven necessarily in this work proceeds in larger forms. Hence all is more extended than in the first symphony, the periods become richer, for the master has more to say. To be sure, the pure lyric principle prevails decidedly in this work; the Larghetto is kept lyrical throughout; but in the first and fourth movement the dramatic life penetrates into this lyric palpably enough.

Beethoven already begins to move in opposites, although these opposites still lack the pregnancy and the decision, shown in the later symphonies. I may allude here to the two leading themes of the first and last movement, which reveal the contrast of the spirited, the resolute, the strong and self-concentrated on the one hand, with the mild, the soft, the gentle on the other; perhaps one might say of the masculine with the feminine; whereas in the themes of the first symphony no marked difference and peculiarity appears, but rather a certain homogeneousness of character. But all this necessarily, as we have said, is conditioned and called forth by the peculiar idea of this work. And this also causes, that the world of instruments in the second symphony is a richer one, more fondly individual and more inspired.

If now Beethoven in the second symphony appears a greater man than in the first, if already "the eagle soars into the space of heaven," yet it is only in the third symphony that he first soars with complete success.

Rigoletto is rather tragical. A frivolous duke, full of curses and anathemas; a mad jester, elopements and rope-ladders, seduction, a lady of somewhat easy virtue, banditti, and a very suspicious sack; all this, in our opinion, is far from comic. But is there not some merit, that the composer has somewhat softened all this horrible stuff by the adoption of a lighter character in his music? There was a time when it was quite fashionable to attend the performances of such tragedies. At that time the romantic school of VICTOR HUGO had, at last, triumphed; and the Parisian public hailed the powerful genius of the author of Ernani and similar works. Time has swept away the romantic school as well as its founder; (poor Victor Hugo! his love of the romantic, even in politics, has driven him into exile;) but unfortunately, it has left one of his darkest works, Le roi s'amuse. Verdi, who was fond of the romantic horrors of the French, and even of the German school, and owed to them one of his best inspirations, Ernani, chanced one day to find the above, now almost forgotten tragedy of the French dramatist, and at once decided to make an opera upon it. But as the French names, and other accessories of the original, would not answer for certain musical purposes, the plot had to be Italianized; and instead of Le roi s'amuse, the public received Rigoletto. The plot, which we copy, is nearly the same.

"The Duke of Mantova was no less celebrated for his personal bravery and beauty than for his systematic and profligate inconstancy. At the commencement of the opera, he is troubled in spirit by a passionate love for two beautiful women: one the Countess Ceprano, the other an incognita. His Jester, the hump-backed Rigoletto, suggests that he should steal the Countess away from her husband, and dispose of him by poison or otherwise. In the midst of this conversation, the Count Monterone forcibly enters, and confronts the King, demanding reparation for the dishonor of his house through the shame and desertion of his daughter. The Jester, mimicking the voice of the King, scorns and insults the old noble, who, repelling this insult by indignant words, is seized by order of the King, and conveyed to prison. Ere he goes he solemnly curses the heartless Jester, who could mock the sorrows of an agonized heart. The courtiers, even with all their habitual moral indifference, were outraged at the insolence of the Jester. Each of them had some wrong to right, some bitter, pointed sarcasm to resent; and, with one accord, they vowed vengeance upon Rigoletto. One said that the hump-backed buffoon had a mistress whom he loved, and it was determined that night to steal her from him. Rigoletto, in the dusk of evening, with the curse of the old lord weighing heavily on his heart, goes towards his home. He is accosted by Sparafucile, a bravo by profession, who, seeing his troubled look, offers, for a small sum, to put an enemy out of his way; saying, that he keeps a retired inn, and that his sister, who is very beautiful, lures the victim into the house where he is quietly made away with. Rigoletto refuses his assistance; but takes his address. He approaches his home, and meets near by, not his mistress, but his daughter. He urges her to keep close within the house; and after a tender interview, he leaves her; when the Duke, who has tracked his incognita from the church, steals in unperceived, and hears that she has observed him often, and loves him. He makes himself known to her as a young student, and vows of mutual affection are exchanged. Hearing footsteps, he leaves, and she enters the house. Maskers approach; they are the conspirators come to steal away his supposed mistress; they are about placing the ladder against the terrace, when Rigoletto enters and discovers them. They pretend that they have taken his advice, and have come to steal the Countess Ceprano; that he must assist them. He agrees; they put a mask on him, and tying it with a handkerchief, literally blind him. While they ascend, he holds the ladder. They come forth, bearing away the Jester's daughter, who screaming in despair, invokes her father's aid. The Jester, tearing aside the bandage, beholds his daughter in the arms of the conspirators, who bear her away in triumph. Gilda is borne by the conspirators to the palace, and placed in the apartment of the Duke, who is wild with delight at the unexpected appearance of his beloved. Rigoletto pursues his enemies, and at last tracks them to the palace; he seeks the Duke, but the courtiers stop him. They learn that they have mistaken the daughter for the mistress, and half regret the part they have played. Suddenly, Gilda rushes from the chamber of the Duke into the arms of her father. They quit the palace, Rigoletto vowing a terrible vengeance on the Duke. The plan is laid, and the scheme begins to work. The sister of the bravo, Magdalen, has been thrown in the way of the fickle Duke, who, quite forgetting Gilda, throws his whole soul into the pursuit of the new beauty. At last, the end of the contemplated tragedy approaches. The Duke is to visit the house of Sparafucile, who agrees with Rigoletto to murder him, place his body in a sack, and deliver it to Rigoletto at one o'clock. The Duke, disguised, arrives, and becomes more wildly enamored of the beautiful Magdalen; Rigoletto and his daughter Gilda observe and hear him through the open window; Gilda is heart-broken at the falsehood of her lover; but Rigoletto bids her be comforted—she shall be avenged. He sends her home, assures himself that the bravo is true to him, and then retires. A terrific storm has now set in—rain, hail, thunder, and lightning; the Duke vows he must stay all night, and the bravo consents to let him have his bed. The Duke retires. In the mean time, Gilda, disguised in man's attire, approaches the house stealthily; she could not rest; she fears for the life of her faithless lover. Trembling amidst the pitiless storm, she overhears the sister pleading to the brother for the life of the handsome stranger, whom she has learned to love. The bravo says his honor is concerned, and the man must die and be delivered at one o'clock. But he consents at last, that if any body else should arrive before that time, to make him the victim and spare her lover. The clock strikes half-past twelve; Gilda hears it; there is no time to be lost. In the pureness and holiness of her love, she determines to give her life to save his! She knocks at the door, it opens; she enters, it is closed. Rigoletto advances in the storm and darkness, knocks at the door; Sparafucile brings forth the sack, receives his pay, and retires. Rigoletto, gloating over the idea of his consummated revenge, before committing the body to the river, prepares to untie the sack that he may gaze upon his victim, when from the house he hears a voice, a voice he knows—the voice of the Duke. Whose body is contained within the sack? His hands tremble, his heart beats, and with a cry of horror, by the aid of the flashing lightning, he discovers the features of his beloved child! She still breathes; and blessing her lover and her father, dies in his arms. The curse of Monterone is accomplished."

The appearance of Rigoletto in Italy, Paris, London, and Vienna has been marked with success; not one of those brilliant successes which accompanied Ernani through Europe, but a quiet, acceptable success. It has pleased, especially where the rôle of Rigoletto, which requires an actor of the first order, has been committed to able hands. But its success must be attributed not alone to this, but also to some charming pieces of music contained in the opera. There is, for instance, the duo, Gilda and the Duke, in the first act: Signor re principe, and the succeeding very brilliant and grateful aria of Gilda: Caro nome che il mio cor, which must sound very agreeably to dilettanti, and which will prove very effective. The rôle of the tenor is decidedly the best treated by the composer, so far as regards melody. The aria in the second act, Par mi veder le lagrime, and the canzone in the third act, La donna è mobile, prove this sufficiently; they are the freshest and the most natural in the opera.—The part of the baritone (Rigoletto) interests more by the dramatic resources it calls forth than by happy melodious phrasing. The grand scene where the poor father, under his jester's mask, has to conceal his anxiety for his stolen daughter, is, in a musical sense, rather too—schottische. The most pleasant piece of the whole is undoubtedly the quartet, Un di, se ben rammentomi, one of those encore pieces which sometimes decide the fate of an opera. Whenever and wherever it has been performed, its repetition has been demanded; and we doubt not the same will be true here. It is extremely pleasing, well adapted to the different voices, and very effective.

We need not say that the music of Rigoletto is thoroughly Italian, modern Italian; that is to say, as music a little worse than Donizetti. This is quite natural. If one pursues the same path which others have tried before him, he must of necessity be always behind them. But for all that, if well given, Rigoletto will please the public, and—voilà tout.—N. Y. Musical Gazette.

Auber's "Muette de Portici" (Masaniello).

The First Act opens in the Royal Gardens of the palace of the Duke of Arcos, with ladies, knights, peasantry, &c., assembled to witness the nuptials of Alphonse and Elvira. After a chorus of rejoicing Elvira enters, and in a brilliant air expresses her happiness. A Guaracha and Bolero are danced, at the termination of which the festivities are disturbed by Fenella, the dumb girl of Portici, rushing in to claim the protection of Elvira from the pursuit of Selva and soldiers. Fenella, in action, depicts her sad history; she has been the victim of some unknown Cavalier, from whom she has received a scar; she has been arrested and imprisoned, but has escaped from prison, her life being in danger from the musket of a sentinel. Elvira promises to protect her, and then enters the chapel with Alphonse. The chorus invoke a blessing on the newly-married, but during the ceremony in the chapel Fenella has recognized in Alphonse her seducer; the soldiers prevent her entrance, and the dumb girl hears, with dismay, that the marriage rites are completed. On the return of Elvira and Alphonse from the chapel, the former presents Fenella to him, and then Elvira discovers that he is the betrayer of the girl she has protected. The finale of this Act paints the varied emotions in this scene of disorder and excitement.

The Second Act opens on the sea-shore, in the environs of Portici. Fishermen are assembled to greet the rising sun. Masaniello is seen brooding over the sufferings of his countrymen; his comrades call upon him to cheer them with his songs: he sings a Barcarolle, promising that the day of freedom will soon come, and impressing upon them the policy of caution, "to throw their nets with silence and skill, to make their prey more sure." Pietro, the friend of Masaniello, then enters, and an impassioned duo succeeds, in which the grief of Masaniello for his missing sister and the mutual resolution of the friends to strike a blow for freedom are expressed. Masaniello perceives Fenella, who is about to throw herself into the sea, but recognizing her brother, she descends from the rock, and, in animated signs, conveys to him the history of her wrongs and sufferings. Masaniello vows revenge, and in a spirited finale rouses his comrades to arms. Pietro and Borella assisting him to organize a rising of the people.

In the Third Act, after an Air by Elvira, are depicted the varied aspects of a Neapolitan market-place, amidst the turmoil and confusion of which are slumbering the stormy passions of an enraged populace. After a Tarantella, the attempt of Selva to arrest Fenella is the incentive to the insurrection, and she is rescued from the soldiers by the fishermen. Masaniello then gives the signal for the general rising, and before the people rush to the combat, they kneel and sing the celebrated Prayer which has immortalized Auber as a composer.

The Fourth Act opens in Masaniello's cottage. In an Air, he deplores the day of horror and slaughter, and laments that he has not strength of mind and resolution for such an enterprise. Fenella enters and depicts the disorder of the city, and she sinks exhausted with fatigue. Auber has composed a beautiful melody universally known as "L'Air du Sommeil," in this situation. At the termination of this air, Pietro enters and excites Masaniello to further revenge, announcing that Alphonse, the son of the Duke of Arcos, has escaped. The fishermen retiring for a moment, Alphonse and Elvira enter the cottage and demand protection from Fenella, who at first is disposed to take revenge, but is moved by the appeal of Elvira for mercy. A concerted piece ensues, in which Masaniello promises safety and defence to Alphonse, and on Pietro denouncing him as the Viceroy's son, he adheres to his pledge of hospitality, and consigns Alphonse to the care of Borella, Pietro and his companions vowing vengeance. The sail in the background of the cottage being withdrawn, the magistrates and citizens enter and present Masaniello with the keys of the city and royal insignia in token of submission, and he is proclaimed king by the insurgents, the Act concluding with a grand march and chorus in his honor.

In the Fifth Act, Mount Vesuvius is seen in the distance, the fore-ground being the Viceroy's Palace. Pietro sings a Barcarolle with his companions who have just left a banquet. Borella enters and announces that troops are in march against the fishermen, that Vesuvius is even conspiring against them, as an eruption is impending, and that Masaniello's reason has fled, unable to resist the horrors of the revolt. Masaniello enters, and his insanity is manifested beyond a doubt. He is, however, roused by Fenella, and learning the approach of the foe, once more heads his companions. In the fight, as Alphonse announces to Elvira, Masaniello is killed by his own comrades, and, on his fall, the soldiers are successful in defeating the revolted fishermen. Fenella joins the hands of Alphonse and Elvira, and, in despair at her brother's death, plunges from the terrace into the burning lava from Mount Vesuvius, the crater of which emits torrents of fire and smoke.

The Consecration of the Infant.

FROM THE GERMAN OF ANASTASIUS GRÜN'S "LAST KNIGHT."

In yonder castle-chapel, upon the infant's brow
The consecrating fountain hath poured its waters now;
His eyes, then, heavenward lifting, cried Salzburg's holy man:
"In God's name I baptize thee—MAXIMILIAN!"

O Eleanor and Frederick! sure, till this very day,
No star upon your union had smiled with friendly ray;
But proudly now beholdeth, in blissful, fond embrace, Lisboa's high-souled daughter her purple consort's face.

The glittering ring of courtiers around the cradle blaze,
Thus early to such splendor to train the infant's gaze;
Lenora brings her darling—ha! that impassioned kiss!
Forgets that she's a princess in all the mother's bliss.

But lo! I mark, unbidden, beside that cradle stand
Two other guests—none sees them in all that stately band;
The one of lofty stature, a fresh and blooming dame,
A grim, old sage the other, with bowed and withering frame.

We give the haggard grey-beard the name of Death—
the wife,
So lovely and so stately, is called among us Life;
Unseen, amid the circle they stood, and thus began
To speak his fair companion the bony, pale old man:

"To which, now, shall this infant belong—to you or me?
A kingly crown awaits him—then mine he sure must be.
A king—all's one whichever the man be, bad or good;
No king on earth died ever, with hands quite clean of blood.

"He is not yet accustomed to taste of life's sweet breath,
It will not pain him now, then, to be dethroned by Death;
Happy if now he perish! His heart shall never know
At once a monarch's torments with all a monarch's woe.

"This lamp of life extinguish—quench now these infant eyes—
A thousand lives are blooming, he else shall sacrifice;
A thousand eyes shall glisten with joy, instead of woe;
Where he one day plants graveyards, should then rich gardens glow.

"Dry up this brain: then never shall brood the thought one day,
How many graves are needed a throne to underlay;
Stop now this blood—then never the people's blood shall gush
To give his fading purple a dye of richer flush.

"Humanity lies bleeding—kings are its sore complaint;
Though this should be the best one that heaven had ever lent,
His land a bitter sorrow shall suffer for his sake,
When, his fair work half ended, his heart one day shall break."

Death ceased. In all that circle, I ween, none heard his voice,
Yet, as he spake, each heart's blood did trickle cold as ice;
The nosegay at the window was seen to fade and die,
The first-born tremulous tear-drop bedewed the infant's eye.

"O no! not yet extinguished shall be this eye-light's glow!
This heart shall throb with rapture, these rose-bud cheeks shall blow.

I lay my hand upon him—mine is the infant, mine!
A son of life I hail him—this kiss shall be the sign!

"He shall be king, his forehead with gold untarnished crowned;
Of all life's sons the fairest on earth the King is found;

The towns that now are burning shall be rebuilt one day,
From eyes that now are weeping, wipe all the tears away.

"His hand shall pluck with rapture the wreath of evergreen, Humanity's pale forehead to crown with hope serene,
And build to Peace and Freedom temples o'er many a grave,
Where Golgothas are blackening and churchyard grasses wave.

"His people's bliss—the pillow his head at night rests on,
His people's hearts—the columns that well uphold his throne:
That deems he eye too little, and these too few by far,
His Chancellor is Confidence, and Love his Almoner.

"And, like the sun in heaven, so floats, though hid from view,
High over his dominions the King's warm blessing too;
Joy dwells in all the hamlets, concord in princely halls,
Rings 'freedom' from the mountains, and 'Peace!' each valley calls.

"As troops of larks rise pouring their song in morning dim,
So thousand souls go soaring to God in prayer for him;
And where his dust shall slumber, there springs a harvest too,—
All this a monarch may be, and so shall this one do."

Thus, wondrously transfigured, spake Life, and no one heard,
In all that throng of courtiers, her high, triumphant word;
Yet larks, out 'doors, were trilling, spring-breezes swept the space,
And a faint smile, the earliest, played o'er the infant's face.

And, with the smiling infant, smiled the beholders all;
But now the Kaiser, thoughtful, went from the glittering hall;
With his seers and his sages, his watch-tower he climbs,
To read the starry record of the infant's future times.

But Eleanor more warmly around her darling flung Her twining arms and, fondling, still closer to him clung,
And gazed with look of rapture into his two blue eyes:
"Twin-stars of my good fortune, O ever light these skies!"

Music in the Society of Friends.

The Society of Friends has at all times opposed the introduction of vocal or instrumental music into the families within the pale of its organization. If we mistake not, music has been expressly proscribed in its discipline. This feature is peculiar to both branches of the Society—the Orthodox and Hicksite—the division in 1828 and '29 having been followed by no marked change in the letter or spirit of the discipline of either branch—at least with respect to the toleration of music. But during the past twenty years there has been a manifest tendency on the part of the younger members of the Society to ignore such sectarian peculiarities as seemed to them merely formal, and having nothing to do with the essence of their religion. The shad-bellied coat and broad-brimmed hat having been cast aside, there is nothing at the present day in the external appearance of the young Friend to distinguish him from the ordinary citizen. It is true that elderly Friends of both sexes still preserve the pristine plainness of their Society in speech and dress, but there are not a few middle-aged Friends who are among the innovators.

In this march of innovation it would be strange if a love for music should not manifest itself among the members of this Society, unless we admit that Quaker nature and human nature differ from one another. That there is really no such difference we find in the fact of the protest against this proscription of music which exists in the minds of very many, and the practical protests in the shape of piano-fortes that exist in the houses of not a few Friends who reside in cities.

Slow, conservative members of the denomination have deprecated these evidences of a growing degeneracy in the Society. Others, however, have placed a different estimate upon these facts, believing that the desire manifested by Friends to cultivate a taste for music, is an evidence of progress. The question of tolerating this innovation has been in quiet agitation for some time; the matter was settled finally so far as the Society is concerned. The facts as we have been able to collate them are as follows:

A year or two since a Friend residing in Madison-st. was brought before the monthly meeting of the Hicksite Friends of this City, because he had purchased a piano-forte and had the same in his house. The fact was not denied, but it was averred that the offending Friend had ever been an exemplary member of the Society, and further, that the piano had not caused any visible deterioration in his religious zeal, piety or morality. But the monthly meeting was not satisfied with this and the sense of the meeting, as expressed by its clerk, was that the offending Friend should be disowned.

The disowned member was not satisfied with this decision and he appealed to the quarterly meeting. There the decision was confirmed. He again appealed to the yearly meeting which sat in this City last week. There the subject was fully canvassed. The good character of the offending Friend was fully sustained by ample testimony. But there was the piano—a hideous contrivance when viewed through Quaker spectacles—still standing, and probably in perfect tune, in his parlor in Madison-st., and the New-York yearly meeting confirmed the righteousness of the decision of the inferior tribunal. We believe that the piano is still standing there, but its owner has ceased to be a member of the Society.

The decision is a very important one in its consequences. It seems that there are about forty Friends in New-York, who, with their families, are liable to the same condemnation. Most of them stand high in the Society in every respect, except in entertaining a taste for the tabooed art. Among the number is at least one preacher. Under the decision of the yearly meeting, the monthly meeting of course will commence casting out the remaining offenders until the Society is purified of all music-loving persons.—N. Y. Tribune.

Mlle. RACHEL.—The main articles of the contract signed by Mlle. Rachel, are given as follows:

"Mlle. Rachel engages to give, in fifteen months, two hundred performances in America, including the Island of Cuba, for the sum of twelve hundred thousand francs, or 6,000 francs for each performance. She will receive, each evening, that sum from the receipts, and her brother was to be provided in advance of departure from Paris, a security of three hundred thousand francs in specie. Mlle. Rachel and her father, will defray all expenses of the travel and hotel. She will have two chambermaids, in each town, and a carriage with two horses will be put at her disposal. She will be entitled to four benefit performances, with twenty thousand francs guaranteed as the minimum proceeds of each. She can rescind the contract by giving her broker six months notice in advance. If she completes her appearance, the father will be entitled to one third in the benefit of the daughter, after three millions of receipts, and Mlle. Rachel will be entitled to a proportion of said benefits, after four millions and a half of receipts."

Musical Chat-Chat.

The European papers announce the death of CAMILLE PLEYEL, the celebrated pianoforte maker in Paris, a man much loved and respected. He was son of the composer, IGNAZ PLEYEL, whose graceful instrumental works were so much admired in the early part of this century, and was born Dec. 18th, 1788. He died in his sixty-seventh year, May 4th, 1855. His father, anxious that he should be an artist, placed him under the classical tuition of DUSSEK, who made him a pianist of the purest taste, as (it is said) his own compositions show. KALKBRENNER declared that the three pianists with the best gift for improvisation were HUMMEL, CHOPIN and PLEYEL. Few persons (says the Gazette Musicale), except his intimate friends, have had an opportunity to convince themselves of this, "for he possessed that modesty which becomes more and more rare among our most admired pianists." Associated with his father for some years in the manufacture of pianos, he established in 1825, with Kalkbrenner, the house of Pleyel & Co., which has been highly flourishing during the thirty years that he has been at the head of it. He saw the importance of uniting the artist with the mechanic in such a manufacture, and for some years past has associated with himself M. AUGUSTE WOLFF, "who seems the natural heir of the artist and the great mechanic, so well known for his love of fine instruments as indispensable to the interpretation of the fine works of the great masters of the art." His pianos received the gold medal at the Expositions of 1827, '34, '39 and '44. He was named a member of the Legion of Honor in 1834, and in 1849 was excluded from the competition "as having already reached the apogee of merit in the construction of pianos of all kinds." The house of Pleyel sends out from 1,400 to 1,500 pianos annually and employs about 350 workmen.

They have in Paris a society called the Calco-Philharmonic, composed (if we may judge by the name) of the lovers of brazen harmony. There is a composer among them, M. BELLON, who actually writes symphonies for brass instruments. This exceptional sort of symphony should place him high among the class of musical innovators and originators, so much desiderated by friend FRY and others.

Mme. LABORDE after all returns to the Opera. A judgment of the civil tribunal has declared the contract with M. Crosnier valid, in spite of the husband's opposition, and she must execute it under penalty of 50,000 francs damages. . . . VERDI's new opera, Les Vêpres Siciliennes, was to be brought out in Paris in a few days.

The Paris correspondent of the N. Y. Tribune mentions two new works of interest to music-lovers.

"A new biography of MOZART is announced by OTTO JAHN, (German), made up from 3,000 letters of the great composer. CASTIL BLAZE writes and publishes the first of two volumes with this promising title: 'Theatres Lyrique de Paris, (L'Academie Imperiale de Musique), a Literary, Musical, Choregraphic, Picturesque, Moral, Critical, Facetious, Political and Galante History of this Theatre from 1645 to 1855.' Another volume is to follow on the Italian Opera, and another on the Opera Comique. If I might judge from what little I have read, for my sins, of Castil Blaze's writings, I should say that this book would not be an important contribution to literature or to documentary lore. I venture to guess that old anecdotes—doubtful and scandalous—occasional facts and dates easily to be got at, floating about in a sea of watery comment, that must pass for the original portion of the work, are the components of Castil Blaze's volumes. They cost seven and a half francs each."

A musical Bostonian, over the well-known signature of "L' Aboyeur," is writing pleasant letters from London about music, art, &c., in the Evening Gazette. He suspends judgment about the music of Il Trovatore, though he seems to have found much to delight him; but his memory was certainly at fault when he wrote: "After a few bars of introduction of great beauty of instrumentation, the curtain rose," &c. Now the few bars of introduction chance to be three long, lugubrious rolls of the kettle drums and nothing else; or they have an improved version of the opera in London.

The Atlas reminds us that MAX MARETZKE, for whose benefit Rigoletto was announced for last night, has been seven years in this country engaged in the conducting of Italian Opera, and that under his conductorship twenty-three different operas have been produced before an American public for the first time. . . . Mrs. EASTCOTT, the American prima donna, late of Naples, is in London (as we learn from the N. Y. Musical Review); so too are BOTTESINI, the contrabassist, Mme. FIORENTINI, the prima donna, and SALVI, all recently in America, and it is rumored that BADIALI (may the fates forbid!) is soon to join them. . . . ROSSINI, by advice of physicians, has gone to Paris to recruit himself. Such was his dread of steam, that he insisted on travelling the whole distance from Florence by vetturino. . . . The copyrights of certain operas have yielded the publishers, Messrs. BRANDUS & Co., of Paris, the following round sums: Robert le Diable $30,000; Masaniello $30,000; La Favorita, La Juive, and Le Domino Noir, each $20,000. . . . VON FLOTOW has written another opera, called Albin.

The bronze statue of BEETHOVEN has arrived in New York. It will be placed in the Boston Athenæum gallery for the summer, until arrangements can be made for properly placing it in the Music Hall, when, probably in the autumn, by way of solemn prelude to the musical season, it will be duly inaugurated, not without grand and fitting music, such as the Choral Symphony, &c. We have seen (at the house of the donor) a plaster cast of the bust, of the full size, which is considerably larger than life. It is indeed a grand, a noble head, more suggestive of all the great qualities of Beethoven's life and music than any bust or portrait we have ever seen of him. We doubt not CRAWFORD has produced the Beethoven of the world so far. No element, of massive strength, depth, fire, earnest, spiritual struggle, suffering, sweetest ideality and love and tenderness, seem wanting in that head and face. Its presence filled the room, so that through a long evening, listening to music, we could not keep our eyes from it. Once, while a fine composition of FRANZ SCHUBERT was being played, the Jove-like head seemed actually to nod, as when he said of Schubert living: "This young man has the true fire in him!"

From a French paper we translate the following: "At Balaklava every day the bands of the garrison give concerts in the square. The birds, who know very well the hour when these musical soirées in the open air commence, assemble in innumerable multitudes upon the trees and roofs of houses. The first piece is heard in profound silence; but the moment the second piece begins, the winged songsters join in and make such a hubbub, that a flute or obœ solo can scarcely be heard twenty feet off."

BOSTON, JUNE 9, 1855.

Boston Theatre.—Italian Opera.

On Friday evening of last week Lucia di Lammermoor was given. This afforded opportunity for Mme. BERTUCCA-MARETZKE to assume for once the principal rôle, after the very pleasing impression she had made in the boy's part in "Tell." The lady has certainly gained both in voice, style and action since she was last above our lyric horizon, several years since. Her Lucia was really a fine performance, and called forth hearty and repeated plaudits. Her execution of its elaborate and florid melody was neat, artistic and effective; an eminently clever, not an inspired, effort. In singing and in acting all was conscientious, thorough and consistent. Some of her tones, especially the high ones, are very pure and silvery and powerful; others, as of old, especially on certain vowels, have a singularly pinched and Frenchy quality, which sounds as if the reed of the throat were pressed and forced beyond its power of free vibration. You notice it in rapid running passages, where the outline of the musical figure comes out full and bold in one part, and is pinched and smothered in another.

BRIGNOLI's rendering of the music of Edgardo was delicate, pathetic, pleasing; but he lacks strength for such a part; he was no match for the orchestra and BADIALI and chorus in the great sextet of the second act; and he had to husband his forces for the lamentable finale by the omission of the challenge scene with its strong masculine duet. BADIALI was of course a grand Enrico; COLETTI's Raimondo was satisfactory, only that his best piece was omitted; and the Herren BEUTTLER and QUINT, with their German conscientiousness and truth, made the secondary part of the captain of the huntsmen, and the husband, Lord Arthur, more acceptable than they were wont to be, as heard so often out of tune and murdered. The forester choruses of the first scene were well done, and the ensemble was generally good. Lucia we are inclined to place next to the Lucrezia among DONIZETTI's operas; it has many sweet, pathetic, gracefully ornate melodies, some fresh, effective choruses, a sextet which will endure as long as anything in modern Italian opera, and the benefit of a story which is dramatic in the best sense. But it has the fault of a too protracted monotony of lacrymose, sentimental sweetness, which makes it tedious in the end. The charm wears out.

On Saturday afternoon Il Trovatore was given for the third time, and with much the same kind of success as before; there being a sufficiency of fresh audience to offset those whose appetites already were beginning to crave other and more nourishing food.

The present week has been a week of benefits, closing our feast of opera, with this afternoon's performance, for some time to come. First came the benefit of Signorina FELICITA VESTVALI, Monday evening, when Donizetti's best opera, at least the one that wears best with the music-lovers here as elsewhere, his Lucrezia Borgia, was again performed in about the most satisfactory manner as a whole that we remember in the long series of operatic seasons, in which it has always borne its part here. Rather a droll, eleventh-hour controversy has been raging in some of the newspapers during the past week on the merits of this opera; one of the high contending parties fortifying his condemnatory criticism thereof by liberal citation of the musical authorities of London journalism at the period of its first production there—the Athenæums, Spectators, and the like. To any one who knows the strength of English prejudices in the matter of music, and who remembers how these same authorities once scouted much which is now commonly held classical; how they greeted each successive work of CHOPIN with contemptuous satire; how they sneered at poor BELLINI as a feeble imitator of ROSSINI; how they (some of them, at least,) not many years ago joined in the hue and cry of crazy man against BEETHOVEN, now the god of their idolatry, such appeals will carry little weight. Meanwhile there is no work of the Italians since ROSSINI, which the most musical and most exacting among the frequenters of the Opera seem so glad to have repeated as Lucrezia Borgia. Nor need one look beyond the work itself to find the reason thereof. In the first place it is one of the best constructed operas as to dramatic unity and progress; its characters are interesting, individual and well contrasted; its situations apt for music; it mingles the naïve and the festive with the romantic and the tragic; it relieves the fever heats and chills of passion with frequent and as it were accidental peepings in of natural sunshine and summer, conveyed in the genial luxury of the music. Then the music itself abounds in spontaneous beauties and felicities; there is a freshness and unbidden charm in many strains in little incidental scenes and passages, which do not seem to claim to pass for much, but to have flowed out of a truly genial musical mood, like so much in "the Barber," and in works of Mozart; for instance, that accompanying the encounter of the two spies, the choruses in the street, &c.; and the whole of the festive chorus in the first scene, and the music of the banquet scene, is genial, lifesome and refreshing, with a bright and rich Venetian coloring. And how dramatic is much of the music! Take the passage in that stirring first scene, where the nobles one by one accuse and taunt the Borgia: Maffeo Orsini, Signora, son' io, &c.; take the trio and the whole scene between the duke and duchess; take the whole of the picturesque contralto rôle of Orsini. Surely we have to look among greater and deeper tone-poets than the modern Italian opera has been blessed with, to find music which is at once so dramatic and so musically genial and refreshing withal. With good interpreters, we cannot wonder that it still proves a sure card.

The good interpreters we had that evening. STEFFANONE's Lucrezia was from first to last one of the finest lyric impersonations we have ever witnessed, short of GRISI, and in the same school essentially. Her voice was remarkably at her command that night, and she looked, sang and acted splendidly. Indeed, there were points in the great scene with the Duke, which surpassed anything that we have seen before; as where, after exhausting all her powers of menace and persuasion, she throws herself into a chair, before the wine of Borgia is administered. VESTVALI looked and moved more beautiful and manlike than ever, as Maffeo Orsini, and sang better than we had before heard her. Her rendering of the Brindisi had a certain ecstasy of refined voluptuousness in it, which seemed original, peculiarly hers; but the exaggeration of the low contralto tones still deducted from the artistic enjoyment of the whole.

BADIALI, in voice, style and bearing is never so magnificent as in the part of Duke Alfonso, and never seemed he more so than on Monday. Signor BRIGNOLI lacks still the sustained power of voice for so trying a part as Gennaro. He shades too much of his music into sotto voce to save himself for a few strong phrases or isolated notes; yet there is great purity and sweetness in his singing, and he has a sympathetic quality of voice that grows upon you. Of the excellence of the ensemble we need add nothing to what was said last week. After the curtain fell, and the artists were called out, Signorina Vestvali returned and, with that ready genius for all sorts of languages which characterizes the Slavonic races, read in correct, clear English, and with that certain charm of accent which reminded one of KOSSUTH, a little speech full of grateful and graceful acknowledgments, much to the enhancement of the whole charm of the evening.

On Wednesday evening the performance was for the benefit of Signora BALBINA STEFFANONE, when we were sorry to see the house very far from full. This was perhaps owing to the want of novelty in the programme, and even seemed to indicate the waning popularity of Il Trovatore, which formed the bulk of the entertainment, the first act only being left off and the glorious second act of "Tell" given in its place. It was a real satisfaction to listen once more to that admirable music, for the second act is musically the best; only it is too rich and full of musical ideas for popular effect, requiring to be heard many times, and sure to repay the more closely and repeatedly it is observed. Moreover the protracted series of recitative, air, trio, chorusses, single, double and triple, by male voices only, probably needs the lighting up of some soprano to make it catch the flagging general attention. But the trio of the three patriots, and that magnificent music accompanying the oath, and all the little orchestral ideas and harmonies which represent the arrival severally of the three cantons,—what have we had so satisfying to listen to, since we had Don Giovanni? It would have been better policy, we think, to give also the first act of "Tell," in which there is so much that is fresh and sparkling; a sombre, night-fall coloring lies over all this second act. Steffanone, though not in her best health, sang well her air: Sombre forêt and duo with Arnold. Sig. Bolcichi was not always quite in tune; yet the act as a whole was well performed, Badiali and Coletti doing full justice to the music of Tell and Walter Fürst. We must say the music of the Trovatore (so much as we heard of it) suffered by such comparison.

NEW OPERAS.—The Italian troupe leave us with a taste of two new operas—that is, new to us.

First, Rigoletto was the attraction for last night, on the occasion of conductor MARETZKE's benefit. Rigoletto was the last production of VERDI before the Trovatore. It is the seventeenth upon his list of operas and was first produced in 1851. We have already (Vol. III, page 82) given a very good description of it from the Athenæum, and to-day we copy the story from the libretto with some just comments by one of our New York contemporaries. We write before hearing it; but an examination of the score inclines us to the opinion that the music in itself is considerably better than that of the Trovatore. It has more relief; more that is light, genial, sparkling, alternating with the tragic; more felicitous ideas, more luxury of melody and accompaniment. Both works abound in dance rhythms. The difference would seem to be that in Rigoletto the dance music means real dancing and feasting, whereas in Il Trovatore it means roasting alive. The plot is as absurd and monstrous as that of the Trovatore; but the characters are more individual and interesting; it admits of more scenes that are light, natural and agreeable; it is not all wrapped in the lurid atmosphere of horrors, not so much of the harrowing kind from first to last.

The other is Masaniello, AUBER's most important work, which is to be given by way of farewell of the Italian troupe, and for the benefit of Sig. BRIGNOLI, the young tenor, this afternoon. Next to "William Tell," this work should excite more interest here than any which this company have offered; and we could have wished that it might not be given merely on a Saturday afternoon. Naturally the artists thought it as familiar in Boston as it is in almost all other musical cities. But it is as good as new to us,—at least to the present generation of opera-goers. A sort of English abridgement of it was given many years ago here, we believe, by the SEGUINS; and the more salient pieces of the music, the overture, the barcarolle, the prayer, the dances, &c., have long floated on the musical atmosphere which we all breathe. All the more should we rejoice at an opportunity to hear the famous work for once in its entirety.

RICHARD WAGNER has pointed out the striking relation in which "Masaniello" stands to "William Tell." We are tempted to re-produce the passage. He is speaking of the renovation of Opera from popular melodies, begun by WEBER:

... And now the grand hunt for popular melodies broke loose. . . . Our Frenchmen were quickly on their feet; they merely looked into the hand-books for tourists, and set out in person to see and hear, upon the spot, wherever any bit of popular naïveté was to be found, both how it looked and sounded. . . . There, in the beautiful and much defiled land of Italy, whose musical fatness Rossini had exhausted with such elegant complacency for the lean world of Art, sat the careless and luxurious master and looked on with a wondering smile upon this rummaging about of the gallant Parisian popular melody hunters. One of these was a good rider, and when he got off from his horse after a hasty ride, people knew that he had found a good melody, which would bring him in much gold. This man rode like all possessed through all the fish and vegetable markets of Naples, till every thing flew around about his ears, scoldings and curses followed him, and threatening fists were raised against him,—so that with the lightning-speed of instinct he snuffed the idea of a magnificent fishermen's and market-men's revolution. But there was still more profit to be made out of this! Away to Portici gallops the Parisian rider, to the barks and nets of those naïve fishermen, who are singing there and catching fish, sleeping and throwing knives, stabbing and killing one another, and still singing on. . . . The rider rode home, sprang from his horse, paid Rossini an uncommonly gracious compliment (he knew well why!), took the extra post to Paris, and what he there got ready in the turning of his hand was nothing more nor less than the Muette de Portici ("Masaniello.")

—This "Mute" was the now speechless-grown Muse of the Drama, who, sad and lonely in the midst of singing and tumultuous masses, wandered about with broken heart, only at last from satiety of life to smother herself and her irremediable anguish in the artificial fury of the theatrical volcano!

ROSSINI looked on from afar upon the gorgeous spectacle, and when he journeyed to Paris, he thought he would just stop and rest awhile under the snowy Alps of Switzerland, and listen how the healthy and brave fellows there held musical communion with their mountains and their cows. Arrived at Paris, he paid Auber his most gracious compliment (he knew well why!), and placed before the world, with much paternal joy, his youngest child, which by a happy inspiration he had baptized "William Tell."

The "Muette de Portici" and "William Tell" became now the two poles of the axis, about which the whole speculative world of opera music turned. A new secret for galvanizing the half effete body of the opera had been found.

Query: if the mute Fenella typifies the speechless Muse of the effete Opera of twenty years ago, have we not the final plunge into the fiery volcano in the lurid works of Verdi?

The opera this afternoon (which, please observe, commences half an hour earlier than usual) is to be followed by the last scene of Lucia, in which our townsman, Mr. HARRISON MILLARD, is to make his first and only appearance in opera, since his return from Italy, as Edgardo. It is an event of no ordinary interest, and will stimulate the competition for good seats.

Has Musical Taste Improved among us?

MR. EDITOR:—I was pleased to read an article in your tasteful "Journal," a short time since, reflecting upon recently made intimations that Boston was declining in musical culture and appreciation. I think the circumstance you mentioned of the many private gatherings for the enjoyment of classical music, is ample refutation of these charges; although I have no doubt but many persons, from want of knowledge that such gatherings are frequent, have a strong conviction that want of patronage to musical entertainments results from a want of real musical taste in our community.

But I must think quite differently. It would seem rather that this want of patronage has a contrary cause,—that it exists because the tastes of those who can afford to pay good prices for good music is elevated by continued cultivation until they desire something beyond what they have offered them in the concert room.

Some are fond of sneering because a well appointed Italian opera troupe will draw good houses, while a most exquisite singer of English opera warbles to empty benches. But the cause of this seems plain. The English troupe had but one or two real attractions. One prominent member was at least a dead weight: some would speak more harshly than even that. The Italian troupes which have succeeded have done so by strong combined attractions in the form of artists, to say nothing of the music. This is one very evident key to their superior success. Another is, that very many of our citizens have learned to appreciate the niceties of artistic vocal music and to value it above a mere understanding of words. English Opera is,—much of it,—mere talk; some of it even weaker and more aimless talk than the regular drama will allow: hence the very many who visit the Theatre from pure love of music, stay away when English opera is announced; while its dramatic attractions are insufficient to gather those who merely wish to see and hear a Play. Partly from this reason then, and partly from lack of much other attraction than the single one of LOUISA PYNE's exquisite vocalization, English Opera was not as successful as Italian. These thoughts aid me in retaining belief that Boston is still musical, and still ready to prove the fact,—still ready to patronize whoever will offer entertainments in accordance with a constantly refining and more exacting taste.

It can hardly be assuming too much then, to say that Operatic Music is winning a decided preference. And again, that class of Opera, which is most wholly music, is gaining ascendancy over that which is partly merely drama.

In this progress may we not soon hope to have offered some of the deliciously entrancing GERMAN Opera?—or failing that, may we not hope to see German Operatic music take a prominent place in concert programmes?

There is a sweetness and purity of bewitching scientific movement in German music that makes it a welcome visitant to the cultivated ear, and I hope yet to see it in high favor with Boston audiences.

I have noticed with pleasure a recent promise of movement in regard to a permanent system of instruction in Italian, French and English Operatic music; and were German included, I should hail the plan with enthusiasm, and predict unbounded success, if the work be followed with diligence and perseverance. There is material in Boston for an Academy with an object like this, which may become an honor of unmistakable prominence, and afford an amount of beneficial instruction to our citizens, which shall place them beyond a question of their musical appreciation.

Under proper management such an enterprise would succeed, and would then become a fount from which lovers of Music would draw a vast deal of delicious pleasure and solid gratification; and in which those who had rallied to its first aid and support would take an earnest and increasing pride. ST. BERNARDE.

It strikes us "St. Bernarde," for a grave saint "smit with the love of sacred song," has seized hold of rather the most secular corner of the subject in the above. His remarks are true as far as they go. But are we to look wholly, or mainly, to the love of Opera, of any kind, for the real test of a progressive, deepening taste for music? Witness the clamorous plaudits with which a melodramatic Trovatore is received, in comparison with the really musical "William Tell," and judge how far the popular or fashionable support of opera springs from a really musical passion. The singers in the first place (and even then quite as much the actors as the singers,—or it may be only a beautiful or stately presence), and then the plot, the situations, the scenery, the harrowing tragical excitement, seem to have as much or more to do with the success of an opera, than the real merit of the music, in Boston, as in every other place, except it be in Germany.

But we second the Saint's call for German opera; there would be proof of musical improvement in a hearty welcoming and cherishing of that. Only "bewitchingly scientific" is scarcely likely to become a cant phrase among opera habitués; it is in the concert room, in Symphony and Chamber Concerts, and in the private soirées of late so often referred to, that our most real and sincere love of music is to be measured. Because to the concerts go the music-lovers; while in the Opera, that opera will always be announced which draws the greatest number of persons, that is of spectacle and play-goers as well as of music-lovers. The crowded audience of the last work of Verdi is only in small part a musical audience; it is an audience of new comers, young and raw recruits into the operatic army, who are excited and delighted in a musical performance by just that which is the least musical feature in it. When, on the other hand, an opera appealing to the truer love of music as such is announced, these keep away, and the audience is drawn from the of course smaller public of the musical, whose delight is quiet, who make no furors even when they are best pleased, and whose "house" is not in the habit of "coming down" in the way that delights managers and prima donnas, and gives the newspaper paragraphists a nice chance to air their stereotyped superlatives.

But looking at our musical public, properly so called, although it may be small compared with the great miscellaneous public, whose eyes so readily yield tears to the red pepper of the most stunning modern opera, yet compared with musical publics elsewhere, we believe it to be both large and highly cultivated and in a sound direction. This everywhere limited public, even if not large enough to support so costly an institution as the Opera and make it partly German, has yet shown in other things, in its love and support of Oratorios, orchestral symphonies, &c., enough, we think, to satisfy our saintly correspondent's most glowing imagination of what is due to the "delicious entrancingness," or the "entrancing deliciousness" of German music.

MADAME DE LAGRANGE.—Our readers will rejoice to read the announcement that this wonderful vocalist, of whom we wrote our impressions after a recent visit to New York, is to commence a series of concerts in the Boston Music Hall on Monday evening. She will be accompanied by the other distinguished artists of her troupe: namely, Sig. MIRATE, one of the first tenors of Italy, who sang in Milan with Miss HENSLEY; Sig. MORELLI, an admirable baritone; Sig. MARINI, the well known basso profondo, and others. We can assure our concert-goers, they will hear some of the most admirable singing they have heard for many a day.

Among the passengers by the steamer Washington, from Bremen, which arrived in New York Wednesday evening, were Miss ELISE HENSLEY and her father. Their many friends will be glad to know that both arrived in good health, Mr. Hensley having been benefitted greatly by the voyage. We trust our own ears will soon confirm the uniformly good reports which come to us from Milan of our young Boston prima donna. She is our third, Mme. BISCACCIANTI having been the first, and Mme. LORINI (VIRGINIA WHITING) the second. When shall we have the fourth, still in Europe, Miss ADELAIDE PHILLIPS?

It will be understood that Miss Hensley returns to us for private, and not professional reasons.

W. J. PARKERSON, NO. 8 LA GRANGE PLACE, BOSTON.

Having resided thirteen years in Europe with a view of adapting the Italian style of Singing to the English voice, and of remedying weakness of the voice, and thoroughly correcting harsh, guttural, nasal, or other unpleasant peculiarities, proposes to give lessons on the Voice, and in Singing, in the Italian, French, and English Languages.

Many who have spent years of severe study to attain musical excellence, after struggling to conquer some guttural, nasal, or other unpleasant mannerism, abandon the pursuit from the belief that they are afflicted with a natural defectiveness: when, with a fractional part of the application which they bestow on the other branches of their musical education, and with much less physical effort (if properly directed) than they have been accustomed to use, their voices might be rendered comparatively beautiful.

To singers of eminence he would say, with a just appreciation of their high attainments, that a brief practical examination of his system will convince the most sceptical, that he can afford them such assistance in beautifying the voice, as might delight the most fastidious.

"Being acquainted with the course of vocal discipline pursued by Mr. W. J. PARKERSON in forming and developing the voice, I take pleasure in bearing my testimony to its excellence; believing it to be far preferable to any other method known to me."

MODEL ORGAN-HARMONIUMS, MANUFACTURED BY MASON & HAMLIN.

THE Organ-Harmonium is an entirely new (patent) musical instrument of the reed species, having two manuals, or rows of keys, and eight stops, as follows:—1. Diapason; 2. Dulciana; 3. Principal; 4. Flute; 5. Bourdon; 6. Hautboy; 7. Expression; 8. Coupler. It is designed more especially for the use of churches, lecture-rooms, and other large public halls, having power nearly equal to a thousand dollar organ! It is also capable of many solo-effects, and has great variety in the property or quality of tone. It is especially adapted to the use of organ-teachers and students, being an admirable substitute for organ-practice. Examination from all interested is respectfully solicited.

Mason & Hamlin's Model Melodeons!

Recommended by the best musicians and organists in the country, (as superior to all others,) among whom we mention the following: Lowell Mason, Wm. B. Bradbury, George F. Root, G. W. Morgan (late organist to the Harmonic Union, London), S. A. Bancroft, L. P. Homer, L. H. Southard, E. Bruce, etc. etc.

There is no better musical critic in the country than John S. Dwight, of Boston, and few men are able to express what they have to say about music in a manner at once so poetic and precise. His articles are sure to please the learned in music, and to delight its lovers. We commend his journal unreservedly to our musical friends as a work which will be an able running commentary upon musical events; extracting from each its significance, varying its critical notices of music and musicians, both new and old, with biographical and entertaining details; and always true to what is most interesting and commanding in this noblest of the Arts.

We need just such a paper. One which is subservient to no particular clique of book-makers, or society agents, or managerial interests. One which tells truly what is good and what is bad, in the honest convictions of the writer. Mr. Dwight unites more qualifications to hold the Judge's chair than any other writer with whose powers we are acquainted. His genial warmth of feeling is united to an acute perception of the beauties of executional Art; while a long and earnest study of the great composers of the world has rendered him familiar with, and an appreciator of, their noble works.

Beethoven's Symphonies.

BY "A FRIEND OF ART."

With the third Symphony in E flat (55th work) BEETHOVEN opens the series of his really great symphonic creations, in which he will ever remain unapproachable. This has long been a settled point among real connoisseurs of music, and only the grossest ignorance can speak here still of grotesque extravagance, of lack of form or symmetry, where an ocean of tones is spread out and the whole fulness of profound human emotion is mirrored in its depths.

What an immeasurable fulness of the richest feeling is unfolded in this Eroica! THEODORE UHLIG (in the Leipzig Neue Zeitschrift für Musik) has already called attention to the fact, that the Heroic in this work is not to be sought in its attempt to represent the life of an actual hero. This hitherto current idea of the work is, to be sure, somewhat countenanced by the first and second movements, seeing that the first suggests the struggle, the suffering, the victory and the death of the hero, in a word his life; while the second, the funeral march, represents in tones his burial, with all the painful and elevated feelings connected with this solemnity; but in that view the two last movements become a mere unorganic appendage, they show no ideal connection with the first parts of the work; the organic ideal unity of all the parts is broken, and it ceases to be an artistic creation of the first rank. Nevertheless the work was produced at one cast, and the cultivated mind, surrendering itself more intimately to it and penetrating more deeply into its meaning, felt its unity. But this feeling could not attain to any definite expression of itself, until a great artist succeeded in finding the key to the unconscious felt understanding, and in reproducing the idea of the creation in familiar words. This was done by RICHARD WAGNER in his "Programme to the Heroic Symphony." This programme forms an epoch in the history of the understanding of the works of Beethoven, and we may be permitted to present here its leading features.*

According to Wagner, the moving principle and soul of the work is found in all the various, mutually and mightily complicated feelings of a strong, complete individuality, to which there is nothing alien that is human, but which contains all the truly human in itself, and expresses it in such a manner that it seems, after the frankest revelation of all noble passions, to reach a consummation of its nature, marrying the most feeling tenderness with the most energetic strength. The progress to this consummation constitutes the heroic tendency of this work of Art.

The first movement includes, as in a glowing focus, all the feelings of a rich human nature in their most restless moods of young activity.—Gladness and sadness, musing and yearning, languishing and luxuriating, boldness, defiance, and an unsubduable self-consciousness, alternate and interpenetrate; but all these emotions proceed from one main faculty, Strength, which in the over-fulness of its being gathers itself up, towards the middle of the movement, to an annihilating energy. This crushing power hurries on to a tragical catastrophe, whose earnest significance is announced to us in the second movement under the garb of a funeral march, in which a feeling of deep, suppressed pain, of solemn grief resounds; an earnest, manly sorrow modulates from complaint to tender emotion, to recollection, to tears of love, to inward exaltation, to inspired appeals. Out of sorrow germinates a new strength, which fills us with a sublime glow; for nourishment of this strength we turn involuntarily again to sorrow; we give ourselves up to it even to melting away in sighs; but precisely here once more we gather up our fullest strength; we will not succumb, we will endure.

We do not shrink from sorrow, but we bear it up on the strong waves of a brave and manly heart. Strength, chastened by its own deep suffering,—strength, cured by its annihilating excess, is what the Third Movement shows us now in its bright serenity. Its wild impetuosity has become transposed into a fresh and cheerful activity; we have now the loveable, glad man before us, who walks happy and delighted through the fields of nature, smiles upon the landscape, and listens to the merry hunting horns resounding from the wooded heights. If in the second movement we have the deeply, greatly suffering, here (in the Scherzo) we have the glad and brightly active man. These two sides Beethoven brings together in the Fourth and last Movement, to show us the whole Man in harmony with himself. This movement is the well won countertype of the first.

As there all human feelings are seen now blending and now mutually repelling, so here these differences are united into one harmonious result, which presents itself to us in a beneficent plastic form. This form is first fixed in an extremely simple theme, capable of development from the tenderest delicacy to the highest power. It represents in a certain manner the firm, manly individuality. About it from the outset twine and hover all the tenderer and softer feelings, developing themselves into the announcement of the pure feminine element, which finally reveals itself to the manly principal theme as the over-mastering might of Love. At the close of the movement this power opens for itself a full, broad path into the heart, penetrating and filling the whole manly heart down to its lowest depth. Here it is that the heart once more utters the thought of life suffering: the breast heaves with fulness of love—the breast, which in its bliss embraces also woe. Once more the heart throbs, and the rich tears of noble humanity gush forth; but out of the ecstasy of sadness boldly bursts the jubilee of Strength,—Strength married with Love, and in which now the whole, the complete Man exulting claims our recognition of his divinity.

Such, according to Wagner, is the idea of the work. But the tone-poet found the then prevailing symphonic form inadequate to the most living representation of such an idea; it was too narrow for the expression of such wealth. With singular boldness therefore Beethoven burst the old form and created an essentially new one, in which he could proceed unfettered. The essence of this new form however must be partly sought in this: that the purely musical principle of development and working out of the musical thoughts, in other words, that regard to the strict rules of Harmony and Counterpoint, no longer determines the single movement in its musical career; but that the Idea itself in its progress and development determines the musical mode of expression; that not a specifically musical mode of expression, but an actual poetic design determines and moulds this form. This is not saying that Beethoven set at naught the everlasting natural laws of Harmony, but only that he adopted a freer harmonic working up of the musical periods, that he resorted to bolder harmonic modulations, and when the idea of the work required it, indulged fearlessly in the boldest, most unheard of dissonances; for instance, in the well known four measures in the second part of the first movement, which alone could suggest "Strength gathering itself up to an annihilating power."—Then again we recognize the novelty of these forms in their dramatic element. This too was necessarily conditioned by the dramatically moved inward life to be represented. Accordingly the music moves in constant antitheses, as for instance in the first Allegro, where the swelling and subsiding of the tones forms an essential contrast to the pure lyrical outflow of feeling in the symphonies of Haydn and Mozart; so also the two leading themes of the concluding movement are placed in a pure dramatic antithesis to one another.

With this new subject-matter and this new form the instrumentation grew up in the most intimate union. The world of instruments had by an inward necessity to shape and expand itself into one richer and more individual. In this work accordingly Beethoven reaches that inspiration and individual significance of the single instrument, whereby it becomes capable of expressing a definite side of a poetic idea, and only comes into distinct prominence through the poetic necessity of expression; its use is no longer determined by mere regard to the variety and alternation of the sensuous colors of the tones. Here every instrument is, so to speak, a self-centred, independent individuality, which Beethoven in the course of his creation strives to fashion to an even more precise peculiarity. With this we take leave of the grand work, and turn now to the Fourth Symphony.

The Fourth Symphony of Beethoven, in B flat major (60th work) holds in several respects an isolated place among its sisters. While the third, fifth and ninth symphonies stand in an intimate relationship to one another, on the one hand through the earnestness and elevation of their subject-matter, and on the other, through the conflicts of feeling and the sufferings represented in them; while the sixth, seventh and eighth symphonies in their common cheerfulness compose an intimate trinity, the fourth floats in a peculiarly fantastic region, which it pursues into its airiest distances. Moreover while the other symphonies are distinguished from the third by the ideal inward connection of their single parts, while they manifest an actual organic development of certain moods determined by an inward necessity, while they are each supported by a unique fundamental idea, in the fourth symphony we miss all such ideal unity of its parts, it suffers by a certain heterogeneity of character. Finally, while those symphonies, as compared with Haydn's and Mozart's, as well as with the two first of Beethoven, contain an essentially new form, distinct in principle from the earlier forms, the fourth symphony rests substantially upon those older, and already superseded formal bases.

Now it is remarkable and has already become recognized as a fact, that the genuine, unprejudiced, unaffected admirers of Beethoven,—of course not those who wax equally enthusiastic about every work of the master—have been less satisfied with the B flat major Symphony. And in fact whoever has been filled by Beethoven in the Eroica, finds himself unable to receive this symphony with the same inspiration. If the ever onward-striving composer is not to be considered in this work as having retrograded or halted in his artistic career, certainly he shows no real advance in it upon the Eroica; it is rather a solitary digression and aberration from the main path, into which Beethoven had struck; it is a side star, a production which owes its origin to a momentary special direction of ideas in the Beethoven genius; it sprung from a period, in which Beethoven for the time being perhaps did not feel himself in his highest state of creative energy. "Even the good Homer sometimes nods." Apart from this, however, this symphony also bears the stamp of the Beethoven genius. The fantastic-romantic character of the work stamps itself in the first movement universally.—The slow introduction transports the feeling soul into a peculiar state of suspense; the fantastic powers seem as yet bound and fettered by an invisible limit, until this is broken through in a genuine Beethoven climax, and now the jocund host rustle away upon the waves of tone, now losing themselves in unobserved solitude, now finding one another again, and, re-united, beginning their dances anew.

In the Second Movement a deep silence is first introduced, a deep-felt, sustained cantabile commences and unfolds into a tranquil, musing wave-like movement, lifting itself even to the spheres of ecstasy,—think of the magical entrance of the G flat major in the middle of the movement—till the loud chord closes the movement and the ethereal world has vanished at a blow. Now in the Third Movement the fantastic play begins anew and soars in the concluding movement even into the finest nuances, the most individual shadings and the most evanescent figures, where it ends. The heterogeneity of sentiment in this symphony lies in the relation of the second to the third and fourth movement. This ecstasy in the second movement stands in no organic consistency with the jovial character of the last. This has been very justly pointed out by a musical critic, THEODORE UHLIG, as also the violent termination of the second movement, which betrays a contradiction of feeling with the essential spirit of the whole, and was evidently designed to mediate the transition to the following movements; whereby Beethoven himself, as Uhlig strikingly remarks, gives us to understand that he has felt the want of organic consistency.

If, after all, then, Beethoven's Fourth Symphony cannot maintain an equal rank with the Eroica and the later symphonies, yet by the originality of its tone-pictures, by its life-like instrumentation, especially by its countless beauties of detail, it is one of the noblest blossomings of the Beethoven Art.

Musical Talent of the Americans.

The failure of all attempts hitherto to introduce congregational singing in place of that of a choir, ought to have suggested long ago an inquiry into the cause, why so much effort should have been made in vain. Were that more distinctly developed and more generally understood, it is possible that a great deal of the ink which is being shed in so profitless a discussion would be reserved for more useful purposes. I call it profitless; because, after all that has been said, and much of it well said, on the superior fitness of congregational singing in public worship, I am mistaken if one of my readers can point to a single parish within his knowledge, where the change has been made.

Now, the cause, which is patent to every one, and lies on the surface, is obviously this: that three-fourths of the members of any given congregation are not singers: but this is only carrying us back a single step, where we are confronted with the question—why is it so? why is not music taught in our common schools as in Germany? Why are not our children initiated into the mysteries of an art so easily understood, and the source of so much innocent pleasure? This brings us to the point; and the correct reply is one, I fear, not calculated to inspire any very sanguine hopes for the future. However mortifying the confession, our whole failure may, in my opinion, be traced to the simple fact, that the Americans are NOT a musical people; that they have not the fine musical organization which delights in song, and enables them to appreciate highly, and feel strongly, the power of melody and harmony over the soul; and therefore it is, that music is so little cultivated amongst us. It is common, I know, to ascribe the passion for music among the Germans to its being taught them in childhood; whereas, such teaching is the effect rather than the cause of the musical taste so generally prevalent, though it doubtless tends greatly to augment and perfect the latter.

As some evidences in support of an opinion so heterodox as the one I have expressed, may be expected, I will indicate a few as they occur to me.

The experiment of making the study of music a branch of elementary education, was faithfully tried a few years ago in Boston, by a no less competent teacher than Mr. Mason. He had just returned from the Continent, glowing with the sanguine hope of making our land another Germany, and for a time appeared to succeed with his juvenile classes; but when the novelty of the thing had worn off, it became an up-hill work, and is now, I believe, relinquished. At least, no report of any remarkable success has come to our knowledge; and the failure, if there was one, of an experiment so auspiciously begun, can be ascribed only to what I must regard as a fixed fact, that we as a people are not endowed with much sensibility to the charms of music. The English have perhaps as little as we have, and the French are no better. Unless Auber is a Frenchman as the French claim him to be—though the name has a German look—neither of the three countries has yet produced an Opera of any celebrity, though they all affect a passion for that kind of music. The same may be said of the sacred Oratorios which are occasionally performed amongst us. They are all of foreign growth—none American—none English. Yet musical compositions of high merit are the real test of the musical genius of a people; and all we can boast of in this line is, a few songs for misses to warble to the piano, with certain anthems of doubtful merit, and psalmody of a very mediocre character. Our country has given birth to orators and statesmen of world-wide fame; our sculptors, painters and architects vie with the best in the old world; in military and engineering talent we are inferior to none; even our poets "micant inter minores stellas"—for the gods seem for the present to have sealed up the fountain of plenary inspiration from all people; but of musical composers, even approximating towards excellence, we have not one, nor ever had. Even the merit of Yankee Doodle is not ours.

Now, it is in vain to contend that a soil, so barren of creative talent, is not necessarily indicative of great poverty of musical genius; especially when regard is had to the liberal encouragement which eminent professors of the art meet with in this country.

Ah, says the objector, then you concede the point that music is encouraged and rewarded in America: is not that a conclusive argument that it is appreciated too?

Yes; we have had the Malibrans, and Jenny Linda, and Sontags, with others of lesser fame; and we have the Marjos and Grisis; and we have given them, in stereotyped phrase, "an enthusiastic reception." Yet we are not to forget that the celebrity they had achieved in the old world preceded them hither, and that their advent was heralded by long and loud blasts of the trumpet on every possible key. Not to have recognized their surpassing excellence, and fallen into ecstasies at their vocalization, would have been to confess that we are insensible, unmusical, without taste, and above all, unfashionable; and that would have been killing to our vanity.

But let us examine a little the character and quality of the plaudits with which their exhibitions have been hailed, and see what they are worth as proofs of our musical taste? An Opera, by one of the great masters of song, is being performed. One of the three or four movements—for there are rarely more in a single piece—is reached, into which the composer has thrown all his inspiration, and created a strain original, simple, unadorned by meretricious finery and fantastic flights, but full of a strange, mysterious pathos, which suspends the breath, and stirs to the very depths the souls of the favored few, to whom the divine sense has been vouchsafed,—sending the electric thrills in wave after wave along the nerves, till the ecstasy almost becomes insupportable. How is it appreciated by the majority of the audience—by most even of those who would feel offended if they were not allowed to pass for musical critics? If I may trust my own observation, it is likely to be thought tame and spiritless, if not something of a bore. But let a passage of extraordinary difficulty be triumphantly encountered—a trill spun out to an interminable length—a flourish made up of seeming impossibilities for the voice to compass, and expression of no musical thought; and, presto! “the house comes down” in a thunder of applause. Let us now suppose the scene to be suddenly changed, and an acrobate to take his place on the stage, poised on his thumb, with his heels in the air, and a ladder on the top of them, and a boy on the top of that; and the same uproarious applause would follow, with probably just as true a perception of music in the one exhibition as in the other. It is the adroitness of the feat, and that only, which is appreciated in both cases. A German or Italian audience always applauds in the right place; an American as constantly in the wrong one. While some glorious strain is being delivered, the German or Italian does mental homage to the genius that conceived it; an American never thinks of that—all his talk is of the singer, and his chief delight in those unnatural exploits of voice, which are the abhorrence of all true lovers of music. And I may add—what is not without significance—while the approbation of the former is commonly expressed by a low murmur, and a rustling of fans, and a general but slight movement in the audience, “The Free Democracy” is not satisfied without bringing hoofs, and fists, and cudgels, into play. Approbation, then, of music, to be worth anything as a proof of musical sensibility, must be discriminating, and bestowed where it ought to be; otherwise it is a damaging sort of proof on the other side.

I have spoken of the Americans as a people, but am far from denying that many of them are endowed with the mens divini to feel and appreciate music of the highest order. Such, however, must be regarded as exceptions to the general rule. And if the fact be so, it sufficiently explains why music is no more cultivated amongst us. Admitting our low musical organization and temperament, the futility of attempting to make musicians of a majority of our population, or even of any considerable proportion of them, and consequently of carrying out the proposed design of substituting congregational singing for that of a choir, becomes apparent. Little can be argued from the success of the early Methodists in this particular: their religious fervor enabled them to succeed for a time, but now it is believed that, with few exceptions, they have fallen away from their first love.

The writer would regret having penned these remarks, if he supposed that their practical tendency would be to discourage the cultivation of whatever musical talent we have, since that is the only way in which our choirs can be sustained and improved.

Bad compositions thou must never play, nor even hear, if thou canst help it.—Schumann.

INVITA MINERVA.

The Bardling came, where, by the river, grew
The pennoned reeds, that in the westwind blue,
Gleamed and sighed plaintively, as if they knew
What music slept enchanted in each stem,
Till Pan should choose some happy one of them,
And, with his wise lips, thrill it through and through.

The Bardling thought,—“A pipe is all I need:
Once I have picked me out a daintier reed,
And shaped it to my fancy, I proceed
To blow such notes as yonder, 'mid the rocks,
That strange youth blows, who tends Admetus' flocks,
And all the maidens will to me pay heed.”

A long June day he searched the rivage round,
And many a reed he marred, but never found
The one wherein the strange youth's tones were bound;
At last his vainly-wearied limbs he laid
Beneath a darksome laurel's flickering shade,
And sleep about his sense her cobwebs bound.

Then shone the Mighty Mother through his dreams,
And said, “The reeds that grow beside these streams
Are mine; and who art thou that layest schemes
To snare the melodies, wherewith my breath
Inspires the double-pipes of Life and Death,
And harmonizes that which discord seems?”

“He seeks not me, but I seek oft in vain
For him who shall my voiceful reeds constrain
To free his heart of its melodious pain:
He flies the fatal gift, for well he knows
His life of life must with its overflows
Flood the unthankful pipe, nor come again.”

JAMES RUSSELL LOWELL.

A London View of Verdi's “Trovatore.”

If not precisely the best, Il Trovatore is one of the longest operas of Signor VERDI, and in some respects the one in which he has attempted most. We cannot perceive in any part of the music, however, that thorough transformation of style which some of the Continental critics have announced. On the contrary, we find the composer of Ernani and Nabucco as plainly declared as in either of those works, with the same forms of melody, the same disregard of construction, the same straining of voices, the same choruses in unison, the same violent contrasts, and the same poverty of instrumentation. Nevertheless, we think, that dramatic instinct, at times even dramatic power, is more frequently indicated in the Trovatore than in any other of Signor Verdi's operas, not excepting Rigoletto. The tunes are not so simple and rhythmical, but the coloring is more appropriate, and the general “effect” better. To deny merit altogether to the Trovatore would be just as unfair as to go the extreme length of Verdi's admirers, who proclaim it the grandest dramatic work of modern times. It is no more to be despised than it is to be raised to Olympus. But how many works are there, occupying that border-land between the contemptible and sublime, which, accepted by the world, have pleased, continue to please, and are likely to please? It were easy to cite examples. A work may be dramatic, and afford gratification to mixed audiences, without being profound or even correct; and Sig. Verdi is neither one nor the other. It is for the public to applaud, but for the critic to do his duty and examine. Il Trovatore is written in contempt of all rules; no ad captandum qualities, no temporary success, however imposing, can atone for the want of refinement, the coarseness of style, the habitual contempt for pure forms, which are as apparent as in any of the previous attempts of the composer, and the more to be regretted, since, even with such evidence of dramatic feeling, individuality of manner, and fluency of execution, they render it impossible to hope for any newly awakened desire on the part of Signor Verdi to become essentially an artist. The question of art is distinct, however, from the question of popularity. Of the growing popularity of this one Italian composer—who, now that Bellini and Donizetti are dead, may be said to have inherited the footstool of Rossini, though still living, dead to music—there cannot be a doubt; that it is founded on certain attributes which distinguish Signor Verdi from the common herd of producers is equally indisputable; that he is, in some measure, gifted, it would be absurd to deny. On these points, indeed, the reasoning of his admirers becomes what Shelley calls, “refutation-tight.” But when his enthusiastic compatriots, dissatisfied with fair admissions, are disposed to apostrophize the author of Ernani and Nabucco as a lamp to illumine the circuitous corridors of Art, a minstrel singing as never minstrel sang—in plain language, a musical phenomenon—those who know how preposterous are such assumptions incline to be unjust themselves, and refuse to acknowledge merits that should be unquestionable; or, if not, whence comes the popularity Signor Verdi has acquired, and not so much with the uneducated crowd as among the cultivated classes?—and why have not other Italian composers, (Mercadante, for example, who had twenty times his knowledge and experience) been equally fortunate.

Signor Verdi, had he known more, there is no doubt, would have done better. As it is, he may rest satisfied with the applause of the mob, and effect to despise the educated few. When Oberon failed to obtain the success anticipated, and some one told the composer that “It was too abstruse for John Bull.” “Hang John Bull,” cried Weber, “I wrote Oberon for de world.” He may have written with a view to immortality, but he did his best, for all that, to please John Bull. John Bull was enchanted with Der Freischütz, and why not with Oberon? Here is matter for speculation. Signor Verdi also wrote for “de world,” but in a different way. He writes for “de world” in which he lives, and is heedless about “the future.” Applause is to him as the breath of his nostrils. To gain applause he must conciliate mobs, and ignore “ears polite.” From mobs he takes his cue, having studied their tastes, feelings, sympathies, and prejudices. He writes exclusively for mobs, and is accepted and worshipped as their idol. His aim is to be less a musician than a popular composer. He has revolutionized the musical stage in his native country; for his operas all others are forgotten. In time he made himself a name on the other side of the Alps. Other mobs caught up the enthusiasm, which spread from kingdom to kingdom, until new countries were invaded and conquered, and the mob-idol of one land become the mob-idol of all. Is this, or is it not, the secret of Signor Verdi's career? Could this have been effected without talent, and is Verdi the nonentity that musicians would make him out? We say nothing. It is amusing to compare the opinions of “judges” with the emotions of the public. Meanwhile grumblers are in a minority; Il Trovatore is applauded; and the directors of the Royal Italian Opera put money in their pockets every night it is performed.—Musical World.

MISS HILL.—The Florence correspondent of the Newark Daily Advertiser writes, May 10th, as follows:

Several young Americans are now in course of preparation for the opera. One of them, Miss Hill, of Boston, was sent to Italy by a wealthy gentleman two years since, and being not yet seventeen, will no doubt succeed in adapting the language impressively to her voice, which is a clear soprano, not large but pleasing in quality. A few evenings since she sang for trial to the Impresario. There he sat on the critical bench in stern judgment, while the young aspirant tremblingly began to lay open the treasures of her chest; as his tuned ear and attentive attitude said “Go on!” she grew stronger, and poured forth all her vocal wealth—singing as it were for her life. It was easy to see that he was not displeased—that was something; was he pleased? Certainly the injunction to study was given with an encouraging air, and the word giovane (young) said with promise for the future. At least the tremulous songstress thought so, and expressed her determination to excel if time and labor enabled her to do so.

These, aided by native gifts in voice and person of no common order, with a good foundation of early study, cannot but succeed in giving Italy another prima donna; who, after a "first season," will be of course given back again to the bosom of native American patronage.

The "Tannhäuser" Overture—A London Criticism.

We have before given specimens of the contemptuous and flouting style in which the Musical World and other London papers have uniformly noticed RICHARD WAGNER's conducting of the Philharmonic concerts, as well as his compositions, and his theories of Art. We in the distance here could only read and wonder. But the last point of their attack was the Tannhäuser overture, a composition with which we here are somewhat familiar. From the manner in which the said World speaks of that, we may now judge somewhat of the degree of value to be attached to all that it has said of Wagner. Rather than "slice" any portion from so curious a "cake," we copy the entire criticism:

The fifth concert took place on Monday night. The audience was again anything but numerous. The "Music of the Future" is evidently not attractive to the amateurs of this dull and "unartistic" capital. The programme was as follows:

PART I.

Sinfonia in E flatMozart.
Aria "Agitato," Signor Belletti.....Paer.
Concerto, Piano-forte, M. C. Hallé.....Chopin.
Aria, Mlle. Jenny Ney.....Mozart.
Overture, "Tannhäuser".....Wagner.

PART II.

Sinfonia Pastorale.....Beethoven.
Romance, "Robert," Mlle. Ney.....Meyerbeer.
Barcarola, "Sulla Poppa," Sig. Belletti.....Ricci.
Overture, "Preciosa,".....Weber.
Conductor—Herr Richard Wagner.

The manner in which Mozart's Symphony was executed defies description. Every movement was an innovation, and a bad one. The first allegro, and especially the opening, was drawled through, rather than played; the andante was the slowest and most somniferous performance ever heard; the minuet was quite dreary, and would have been only tolerable had the Prophet "of the future," and the members of the orchestra worn bag-wigs, lappets, knee-breeches and buckles; while—with a view to contrast, we suppose—the last movement went off like a rocket, and the end was attained almost before we could quite reconcile ourselves to the beginning. "O, by Abs! O, by Adnan!" muttered the elect, to whom Richard is, as it were, a herald and a trumpet—"Lo! here be great truths!" "O gemini," exclaimed the uninitiated, whose curse is sempiternal darkness.

Another slice from that cake of harmony to which the posterior world is destined was tasted in anticipation. This was Tannhäuser. In "the books" we find that Tannhäuser was a minstrel of the mid-ages, who, tempted by Venus, repaired to "the mount" and ministered egregiously to the sensual goddess, in song and verse, harping upon his harp with cunning digits. This is all set forth, in strong shadow, by the overture, which Liszt of Weimar, who carries the keys for Richard, blows the clarion in advance of him, and is in a manner as great a "clerk of nigromancy" as Merlin himself—during King Arthur's time, entoaded in a stone by a damsel "of the Lake," upon whom he was besotted—which Liszt of Weimar, who carries the keys, has declared "a miracle," in his "book" of the overture to Tannhäuser. This overture was played on Monday night—not so briskly as by Jullien and the Philharmonic Doctor (Wyde), but briskly and impetuously—under the wand of its finder, of him into whose mind it was "blown," as says Hobbs (not Hobbes) of Malmesbury, by the Boreas (not Æolus) of harmony. The effect was stunning, windy, and preposterous. The audience was evidently perplexed, and (the "elect" excepted) postponed their verdict to "the future." The orchestra, in an under current of chorus (in unison, ppp—not à la Verdi)—which began at the 39th bar, just after the subject, a faint parody of the slow melody for the Corno inglese, in the Carnaval Roman of Hector Berlioz; was suspended at the 71st bar, resumed at the 301st, and carried on to the climax at the end (when Tannhäuser has sung his last tetrastich, on "the mount")—murmured "Oh dear, dear, dear, dear, dear, dear, dear!" eight in a bar, an expression of the emotions experienced at fiddling and piping such Amphibionian strains. The overture to Tannhäuser was not encored.

Beethoven's symphony was well played, but hardly up to the Philharmonic mark. The "Rivulet" did not flow. Weber, the "stammerer," gave us a good notion of his stammering. The overture to his gypsy opera, Preciosa, by its simplicity, atoned for the Tannhäuserian mysteries, which, much more than the Eleusinian, would have puzzled Jamblichus.

Chopin's first concerto has some attractive motivi, but for the most part consists of an uninteresting series of bravura passages of greater or less difficulty. The instrumentation is as feeble and bad as Kalkbrenner's, and the form null and void. M. Hallé, however, played superbly, and was deservedly applauded.

Signor Belletti was in his best mood, and sang both his songs with admirable facility. Mlle. Ney has not flexibility enough for the curious aria from the Seraglio: but in Meyerbeer's cavatina she displayed no little sentiment.

The audience were by no means satisfied with the concert.

There is lucid criticism for you! There may be reasons plenty as blackberries, if you have scratched your hands among those thorny, brambly sentences in getting at them! But with regard to the tempi in the Mozart Symphony, and with regard to the alleged liberties which Wagner takes with tempi in his conducting generally, it is but fair to say that the English critics are sustained by so high a German authority as ROBERT SCHUMANN. Among the short sayings scattered through his collected writings we find the following memorandum:

"Aug. 11, 1848.—Heard Fidelio. Bad performance and incomprehensible tempo-taking by R. Wagner."

Similar in opinion, but clearer in statement, and with something like intelligible analysis in the matter of the overture, is the criticism of the Athenæum (CHORLEY), which may also interest our readers:

Herr Wagner makes no way with his public as a conductor. The Sinfonia of Mozart went worse than we ever heard it go. The violins were rarely together; the wind instruments were hardly able to hold out in the middle movement, with such caricatured slowness was that andante con moto taken,—and the finale was degraded into a confused romp, by a speed as excessive. That Chopin's Concerto, a work which is as delicate as it is difficult, pleased as it did, was owing to the exquisite playing of M. Hallé, who carried it through;—supporting, not receiving support from, the orchestra. A finer display of execution and taste has rarely been heard. Neither did Herr Wagner condescend to assist Mlle. Ney in her bravura; which, if well accompanied, might have produced a great effect, in spite of its rococo forms, thanks to her lovely voice and brilliant execution. It is fair to give currency to the plea which, we are told, is put forth,—to the import that Herr Wagner protested, when making his engagements, against taking charge of the vocal and of solo music, on the score of admitted incapacity. But how ill does such want of power assort with the consummate musical knowledge assumed by the pretension of conducting certain favorite works by heart! There can be nothing in either concerto or bravura to tax the quickness or resource of a conductor in comparison with the difficulties, violences and incoherences of "the music of the future." Due pains had been bestowed by Herr Wagner on his own overture,—but the pains had been bestowed in vain, for never did new work making such a noise, and concerning which so much noise has been made, fall more dead on the ears of a callous and contemptuous public.

Though we have already spoken of this long-winded prelude in general terms, we must be permitted a few more minute remarks on a composition for which such high honors have been claimed.

Our impression is, that the overture to "Tannhäuser" is one of the most curious pieces of patchwork ever passed off by self-delusion for a complete and significant creation. The first sixteen bars of the andante maestoso announce the solitary strain of real melody existing in the whole opera. This is the Pilgrim's chant, and is the half of a good tune in triple tempo,—which, however, seems to us no more ecclesiastic in style than the notturno in Mendelssohn's "Midsummer Night's Dream." The second part of the air is made up of those yawning chromatic progressions which seem Herr Wagner's only bridge from point to point. After it has been given once, comes the whole over again simply repeated with embroideries. In the allegro a rude imitation of Mendelssohn's fairy music may be detected, both at the opening of the movement and in the phrases from bars 8 to 12. To these succeeds a scramble, not leading into, so much as broken off by, the second subject. This is a hackneyed eight bar phrase, the commonplace of which is not disguised by an accidental sharp and the omission of an interval. As the allegro proceeds, one or other of the above "notions" is repeated with small attempt at working out:—and the ear is thoroughly weary ere the point is reached where a busy figure for the violins, identical with one used in Cherubini's overture to "Lodoiska," dresses up the theme of the Pilgrim andante, which for the third time is presented in its integrity, with slight modifications of rhythm, none of harmony, and no coda by way of final climax or close. When it is stripped and sifted, Herr Wagner's creation may be likened, not to any real figure with its bone and muscle, but to a compound of one shapely feature with several tasteless fragments, smeared over with cement, but so flimsily that the paucity of good material is proved by the most superficial examination. Of Herr Wagner's instrumentation as ill balanced, ineffective, thin, and noisy, we have elsewhere recorded our judgment. Yet, this overture is almost the sole coherent instrumental work from his hand which he could produce in substantiation of his claim to be considered the composer of the future. In London, we repeat, he fails to make any converts; either as a conductor or composer.

Music Abroad.

London.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA.—Madame GRISI has been over-persuaded into a series of "ten last last performances, after which she will positively retire to her Tuscan villa, so pleasantly alluded to in the bills." The Times, ever among the foremost of her admirers, reads her a lecture upon "inconsistency," and thinks a "farewell" should be a "farewell," and nothing less, no matter what regrets it leaves behind. Yet having MARIO, what could they do without GRISI, and she so near? And what a feast of opera, she, with the stars already there, ensured them! Her first re-appearance was in La Favorita, (May 21,) with MARIO, GRAZIANI, &c. Her reception, says the Leader, was gratifying, but not enthusiastic; but in the last Act she took the house by storm, and "made us all forgive the disappointment of hearing her again." This was followed by the Trovatore (fourth time), and then Grisi again in Norma, with TAMBERLIK for Pollio. Then came Don Giovanni, only, strangely enough, without Grisi's incomparable Donna Anna, which was the more remarkable, considering how superlative was all the rest of the cast. The following extracts should make our musical Bostonians' mouths water. The Times says the present generation has recognized but one worthy impersonator of Don Giovanni, and that is TAMBURINI, who, after a three years' absence from London, appeared again in this part.

When we state, that the voice which won for its possessor the reputation of the first of barytone singers is, in a great measure, extinguished, and that what remains of it is not so wholly at command as of old, we shall have traversed per saltum the most unwelcome point in our task as honest critics. But, "faute de voix" (as our allies express it), Tamburini can boast all the qualities of a great artist. He sings with taste, expression, and correctness; acts with judgment, vivacity, elegance, and truth to nature; and (the most essential point just now), in spite of years, he looks more like the Don Giovanni of romance, and passes better for the Don Giovanni of Mozart, than any one at present on the boards.

MARIO was the Don Ottavio, a part which for some years has been exclusively the property of TAMBERLIK. The Times says:

It is impossible to imagine anything more perfect in grace and sentiment, or more faultless in execution than Signor Mario's delivery of the divine air by means of which Mozart has raised Don Ottavio from a quasi-nonnentity to a very important and interesting personage. He sang it last night better, if possible, than on former occasions, and was encored with genuine enthusiasm.

Owing to the illness of Mlle. NEY, the part of Donna Anna was taken by Mme. EUDERSDORFF, who is not very warmly praised. The veteran LABLACHE was Leporello. And then Bosio as Zerlina! Well may the Standard ask: "Can any one conceive a more winning and artless exponent of Batti, batti, and Vedrai carino—two of the most enchanting songs ever given to the mortal world—than this lady; and can any one imagine a more legitimate reason for a pair of encores?" Let the Times finish the account:

Bosio, last night, not only sang the airs of Zerlina with a perfection that must have satisfied the most scrupulous admirer of the music, but acted the part in a very natural and charming manner. This innovation was most grateful, since it gave additional reasons for conscientiously praising one of the most accomplished singers that ever appeared at the Italian Opera. Batti, batti, and Vedrai carino were both encored; and so well were they sung, and so thoroughly understood, by Bosio, that we should not have objected to hear them a third time. Such exquisite and flowing melodies from the lips of so finished a songstress cannot fail to enchant, even where the music alone is taken into consideration; but last night Bosio invested them with a twofold charm. She was a real "flesh and blood" Zerlina—not a puppet with a syren's voice, but a loving wife, doing her utmost to console a jealous husband under his temporary afflictions, knowing the remedy to be in herself, and, by the prettiest possible play, making the audience quite as much convinced of it as Masetto. We stated some time since that Bosio could act, if she pleased; and we are now more than ever convinced that she possesses something else than a lovely voice, a fluent execution, and an engaging personal appearance. A more capital Masetto than Signor POLONINI was never seen. His acting while Bosio sang Batti, batti, was perfect, and his gradual restoration from offended dignity to complacent good humor was worthy of any praise. So good was Signor Polonini throughout that we wish he had sung, and hope he will sing on another occasion, the very quaint and appropriate air which Mozart has allotted to Masetto, but which only the German Masettos have not abandoned. Another excellent performance was that of Elvira by Mlle. MARAI. Last, not least, the Commendatore of Signor TAGLIAPICO was, as it has been often proclaimed, one of the most artistic and effective performances on the operatic stage. In the supper scene—where the music rises to a degree of solemnity which has left Mozart unapproached by dramatic composers—the singing of this gentleman was beyond criticism.

PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY.—The following was the programme of the sixth concert:

PART I.
Sinfonia in G minor (MS. composed for the Philharmonic Society). Potter.
Aria, "Questi avventurieri," Herr Fornes (Il Baraglio) Mozart.
Concerto, viola, M. Sainton. Beethoven.
Siciliana, Mlle. Bohkols Falconi. Pergolesi.
Overture, "Leonora" Beethoven.

PART II.
Sinfonia in A minor, No. 8. Mendelssohn.
Recit. "Crudele!" Aria, "Non mi dir," Mme. Bohkols Falconi; (Don Giovanni). Mozart.
Recit. "I rage!" Song, "O ruddier than the cherry" Herr Fornes, (Acta and Galatea). Handel.
Overture, "Berg-elst" Spohr.
Conductor—Herr Richard Wagner.

The Symphony of Mr. Potter is praised as a truly classical work, and showing genius. M. Sainton's playing of the Beethoven concerto is pronounced masterly, and the vocal music excellent. Of Wagner's conducting, this time, the News of May 29 (and the admissions of the Times are almost as strong as its exceptions) says:

Mendelssohn's "Scottish Symphony" was played with powerful effect, though the times of some portions of it were not altogether the same as those given by Mendelssohn himself. Probably M. Wagner never heard him conduct the symphony. An author's own reading, of course, must be the best; though we confess that M. Wagner's ideas, when they were different, did not always displease us. The immense impetuosity which he threw into the allegro guerriero gave additional grandeur and majesty to the resumption of the first subject which forms the finale. In the overture to Leonora, likewise, the time was occasionally pressed and relaxed in a manner to which we have not been accustomed; but our impression was that these licenses, as they are deemed, heightened the fire and vigor of this incomparable overture.

NEW PHILHARMONIC.—The fourth concert was in aid of the funds of an asylum, and was crowded. The following was the programme:

PART I.
Choruses from "The Ruins of Athens" Beethoven.
Overture, "Melusina" Mendelssohn.
Air, "Jemondia," Signor Belletti Spohr.
Rondo in B minor, (pianoforte, M. Alex'r. Billet) Mendelssohn.
Scene, "Oberon," Mme. Novello. Weber.
Symphony, (No. 4). Beethoven.

PART II.
Overture, "Der Freischütz" Weber.
Finale, "Loreley" (Solo, Mme. Novello). Mendelssohn.
Scene, "L'Elisir," Signor Belletti. Donizetti.
Part Song (Chorus). Mendelssohn.
Wedding March. Mendelssohn.
Conductor—Dr. Wyke.

MUSICAL UNION (ELLA'S).—The following programme was performed at the third "sitting," May 15.

Quartet, No. 2, in G. Beethoven.
Trio, E minor, Op. 119, Piano, &c. Spohr.
Quintet, in A. Op. 18. Mendelssohn.
Solo, Contra-Basso. Bottesini.
Accompanist—Signor Bellini.

Solos, Pianoforte. Chopin, &c.
Executants:—1st violin, Herr Molique; 2nd violin, Mr. H. Cooper; viola, Mr. Hill; 2nd viola, Herr Goffrie; violoncello, Signor Patti; contra-basso, Signor Bottesini; pianoforte, M. C. Hallé.

Paris.

MAY 10.—(Correspondence of the N. Y. Musical Review).—You have learned from the journals of the postponement of the opening of the Universal Exposition, from the first to the fifteenth of May, and it was thought that the performance of the Te Deum by BERLIOZ would also be deferred. We were deceived, as the new work of this composer was given in the Church St. Eustache, on Tuesday, April 30, as previously announced. This Te Deum, in retaining its appointed day, apparently changed its signification, and seemed to have been performed in honor of the signal failure of the attempt upon the life of the Emperor. Unfortunately, we were not able to be present at this festival, given by one hundred and fifty instrumentalists and three different choirs, composed of one thousand and fifty singers, eight hundred and fifty of whom were children. We have obtained the opinions of different connoisseurs of the most opposite schools, and in drawing the balance-sheet of their contradictory opinions, we are forced to conclude that this Te Deum is a remarkable work.

This Te Deum, it is said, is only a part of a larger composition, detached by Berlioz for the occasion. The composition was primarily designed as the crowning-piece and final apotheosis of a grand epic, at once religious and martial. For this reason, it was generally thought that the performance was somewhat out of place in a church. The ideas of worldly pomp and glory, the accents of grief and the cries of distress, which are introduced into this Te Deum, recall too vividly, we are assured, its earthly origin. Contrary to what had been announced, the organ was too much overwhelmed, in its dialogues with the orchestra, by the explosions, à la Meyerbeer, of the brass instruments, cymbals and drums, and other improvements of Mr. Sax, that enterprising monopolizer of infernal noises.

The work commenced with a species of choral, first given out by the organ; the same phrase, returning at intervals during the course of the composition, serves also as a conclusion worked up into a triumphal march. A most pompous fugue, formed upon this choral, which is Number 1, attracted much attention. A Miserere, introduced episodically, which forms a dialogue between the sopranos of one choir and the tenors of the other, was much criticized by some, and as highly extolled by others. A tenor rôle, accompanied by part of the orchestra, achieved much success; it was received very favorably. A novel and curious effect was produced by the voices of the soprano giving forth from time to time the verse, fiat super nos misericordia tua, Domine, accompanied by brass instruments. But the greatest sensation was produced by the finale, although some found in this a want of clearness. All the forces, vocal and instrumental, united with the thundering tones of the organ, arose to the most powerful climax of effect, such as might be expected from a master in composition like Berlioz. A part of the audience arose during the performance of this ensemble by an involuntary movement. Immediately after the Te Deum was performed an instrumental march, designed to be played while the flags of the different nations were presented at the altar, to be blessed by the clergy. As we have before said, the theme of the exordium re-appeared for the last time, thus uniting the march to the hymn of thanks.

The execution was not the most satisfactory, in spite of the electric metronome, which was to unite all the masses of performers.

ERRATA.—In the translation entitled "The Consecration of the Infant," in our last number, (June 9th.) readers will please note the following unpardonable errata:

8d stanza, 8d line, for brings read hugs.
7th stanza, 4th line, last word but one, for monarch's read mortal's.
Top of page 76, for be rebuilt read he rebuilt.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, JUNE 16, 1855.

The Lagrange Troupe.

The first concert of Mme. ANNA DE LAGRANGE and the fine artists who have been singing in opera with her in New York, did not attract so large an audience to the Music Hall on Monday evening, as so rare a combination would certainly have commanded at any other season, even at the dollar price. But a more delighted audience we have rarely seen at any vocal concert since the famous LIND days. If the programme consisted mainly of somewhat over-familiar pieces, yet they were good pieces, at least for the first exhibition of the best powers of the several singers, and the singing itself was all, without exception, admirable.

Madame LAGRANGE is certainly a most wonderful vocalist, and every hearing of her confirms the impression that she made upon us in New York, and even more than confirms the prevailing tone of European report for several years concerning her. To say that her singing shows an almost incredible perfection of mechanical execution, is not to say all. There is also something besides this; something of nature, that was worth such cultivation and adornment, something decidedly individual, fascinating and fresh, as nothing could be after so much study, unless there were the living spring of talent first of all and through all. We feel this in the voice itself, we feel it in the whole style of her singing. Her voice, to be sure, is what no one would call sympathetic; it has not "the tear" in it, nor has it the grand volume for impassioned declamation. But it is more than a merely sweet and flexible organ; if it resemble an instrument, it is not the flute, for it has a certain rich and reedy quality, an expressive coloring varying throughout its compass like a clarinet, or even like the most expressive of instruments, the violin; and with a brilliancy like that, though at the expense of now and then a harsh, hard, loud note in the upper regions; and even then there is no lack of substance in the tones. The compass too is quite remarkable; from the low A at least, which, if a little husky, is a rich, ringing sound, with none of that dry, "mannish" quality, to the E and F in alt, which she reaches with perfect ease and makes as bright and strong as points of light. Not passionate or earnest, her song is nevertheless genuine; she loves it; there is a naïve charm about it, with all its studied art; she plays with melody as a fountain sparkles in the sun; and not without the softening atmospheric changes, the shadings and colorings from full light to sunset glow and twilight; for her gradations of force, her alternations from full voice to sotto voce are most beautiful. Whatever does itself so perfectly, creates a legitimate place for itself in the world of Art. It was this same genuineness and free, hearty play in the execution of the same kind of vocal feats, which made them so acceptable in JENNY LIND; but this was only one phase of her universal talent; nor is the Lagrange voice to be named with hers.

In the first piece sung by Mme. Lagrange you have a fair specimen of all her vocal and artistic peculiarities, although you do not weary of hearing her in continually new pieces, any more than you weary of the fountain's play. It was a Hungarian melody, by ERKEL, a wild, pensive, rhapsodical andante, of charming poetic expression, followed by variations in which she displayed all her marvellous runs, leaps, trills, and rapid arpeggios in a staccato of the most marvellous lightness, neatness and precision. It was followed by rapturous applause, and she was recalled after this as well as every other piece she sang. In the Carlo Magno finale to Ernani (the quartet without chorus) her voice told finely in the soaring unisons with the tenor. In the duet: Dunque io son, from "the Barber," she added the graceful vivacity and archness of the best Rosina we remember to all that exquisite vocal embroidery for which Rossini's music here gives so much scope. But her grand triumph of vocal instrumentation was in the Mazurka by SCHULHOFF, Souvenir de Varsovie, a piece written for the piano, but whose intricate mazes her voice thrilled with the precision and certainty of the most cunning fingers.

Yet startling and delicious as was the sensation produced by Mme. Lagrange's singing, it was something more like enthusiasm, which followed with a perfect storm of bravos the two solo efforts of the new tenor, Sig. MIRATE. He is a man apparently of about forty, large and noble in figure, with a massive forehead, a look of intellectuality, refinement and good nature, and a dignified and graceful bearing. His voice corresponds with his person, one of the muscular, robust, manly tenors; rich, warm, sympathetic in quality, slightly husky (it seemed that first night) in its ordinary range and when exerted with his ordinary power, but with a glorious, clear ring, and power of endurance in the high tones. His style is simple, large and dignified, and he is master of the pure, sustained cantabile. He sang the Cujus animam with more power and effect than we have ever heard, his voice in the strong high notes ringing triumphantly above the then as always stunning noise of the brass instruments.—But it was in the romanza: Deserto in terra, from Donizetti's Don Sebastian, that he fairly electrified the house, really causing such an outburst of enthusiasm as we scarcely remember in that Music Hall. The voice, which before had seemed very slightly inclined to flat, was now inspired and true in every tone; the melody was delivered simply and with feeling, the power and richness of the voice kept growing on you, till it reached a climax before the last cadence, where he prolonged a ringing high B flat, renewing the tone by several successive impulses, as one tries an echo among the mountains, and not from exhaustion of the first impulse, but as if from pure delight in drawing again and again from an exhaustless reservoir. The applause that followed this, after the repeat also, was almost frantic, and perhaps out of just proportion to the other good things of the evening. But nothing operates upon the mass of an audience like a great tenor voice; one, which after so many that are either dry or feeble, lacks neither sentiment nor power, and boldly plants the strong shaft quivering in the highest mark. It is undoubtedly the finest tenor we have heard, excepting MARIO; in power much greater than Mario, but less in exquisite beauty of tone, and in perfection of art; though many are ready even now to crown Mirate king of tenors. He reminds one of BET-

TINI, more than any other tenor we have had, only that he seems to possess Bettini's best power always. He is perhaps more nearly what we have imagined BENEDETTI might have been, but we must hear him in opera to be convinced that he is Benedetti's equal in respect to fire and lyric genius.

Sig. MORELLI is perhaps thus far the best of all our baritones. His voice has not the weight or warmth of BADIALI's; it seems not to be his temperament; nor has he the exaggerations of Badiali. Yet he is quite as masterly a singer, perfectly artistic in style, executing everything with truth, facility and taste; a faultless judgment pervades his rendering, and his voice is clear, elastic, evenly developed, and singularly musical and ringing in the upper tones. In his cool, refined, gentlemanly style of singing, he reminds us of BELLETTI, while he has a better voice. He has a comic vein, too, and sang most admirably the Largo al factotum; also in the duet above referred to with Mme. Lagrange; in the duet, I Muletieri, with Sig. Mirate; and nobly sustained the central part in the Carlo Magno quartet.

Sig. ROVERE, of ALBONI memory, is one of the best buffo singers we have ever had, and recited the baron's dream: I miei rampogli, from "Cinderella," in the most approved style.

The orchestra, under Sig. ARDITI, numbering about thirty instruments, mostly from New York, is an excellent one, except, the usual fault of a preponderance of brass, which sometimes rendered voices pure and powerful as these inaudible. But the overture to Masaniello, and the Prophète march were finely played. Herr SCHREIBER's Concerto for the trumpet à piston was in execution quite as wonderful as any of Herr KOENIG's feats, and quite as expressive, and the composition itself as an orchestral piece had meat in it.

Second Concert, (Wednesday evening.) The audience was much larger, and even more enthusiastic than before. The programme was a richer one, although we would gladly have spared the noisy overture to Zampa; but that to Der Freyschütz was finely played and worth the playing; it took its good share of the plaudits of the evening. Sig. MORELLI led off after Zampa. This time he abstained entirely from the comic, and confined himself to serious and pathetic melody. His solos were the air: Ah, per sempre, from I Puritani, and the romanza: Ah, non aveva, from Maria di Rudenz, two of the very best songs of BELLINI and DONIZETTI respectively, in which both simple dramatic melody and luxury of ornament taxed the singer's powers and found them adequate at all points and ample. We have listened to no baritone with more unalloyed pleasure. Sig. ROVERE's buffo talent found play in the two duets from L'Elisir d'Amore; the first with Sig. MIRATE, the second with Mme. LAGRANGE, and much to the amusement of refined ears.

Sig. MIRATE's voice and manner grew upon us. The voice seemed to us more uniformly pure and true. It adapted itself happily to the light, conversational style of the duet with Rovere, although that style is not his forte. He showed his taste in the selection of the almost always omitted tenor aria: Dalla sua pace, from "Don Giovanni." (It has been sung, however, in our chamber concerts by Mr. ARTHUR-SON.) This air has not the bravura of Don Ottavio's other song: Il mio tesoro, but is quite its equal in beauty of melody, in depth and tenderness of feeling; its sustained cantabile, its wonderful modulations, and its chaste simplicity, refusing to wear any of the hacknied modern Italian cadenzas and effects, make it a difficult test of the best, though not the most showy and effective qualities of a singer. It will not "bring the house down"; but when well sung and accompanied (and the orchestra has very much to do with it) it sinks deeply into the souls of those who truly love good music. Sig. Mirate sang it like an artist, with simplicity and truth, and with such warm reproduction of all the intrinsic beauty and melody as none but Mario might surpass. The romanza from Don Sebastian was repeated, twice, with the same electrifying effect as on Monday, and Mirate reigns the king of hearts at present. He has one danger, that of letting the storms of ecstatic bravos which leap out at the signal of his first ringing, loud high note, tempt him into forcing said notes, in the unconscious joy of riding such a storm.

Mme. LAGRANGE, this time, did not exhibit her voice in instrumental pieces, but kept exclusively within the sphere of vocal music proper. First she sang the well-known Qui la voce; and even after LIND, SONTAG, BOSIO, GRISI, we found no lack of feeling and expression, as of course there was none of artistic finish, in her singing of the slow, cantabile movement; in the rapturous allegro: Vien diletto, &c., her voice could riot in the most bird-like luxury of ornament, achieving unheard of marvels of execution with most perfect ease, and all with so much unity and taste, that one enjoyed it like a simple gush of nature. There was character enough in this, besides the dazzling execution, to make it easy enough to credit what the New York critics say of her dramatic talent.

The duet: La ci darem, with Morelli, was charmingly sung and a repetition insisted upon. Here she was singly true to the requirements of the music, losing herself, like a true artist, in the expression of its feeling. In the subtle delicacies of the duet from L'Elisir, and in the brilliant bravura of Una voce poco fa, she was again in her own peculiar vein, the truest exponent we have perhaps ever had of the beauties of those ornate styles of melodic composition. The finale from "Lucia": Chi mi frena, closed the entertainment, and never have we heard it so superbly sung as by these four artists. Mirate's rich and manly tenor soared majestically through the harmony, and the soprano partook fully of the same largeness of style, crowning the whole on the final chord by running up an octave and swelling out the high D with wonderful effect.

Mme. Lagrange gains upon her audience with every effort,—if effort it can be called, which seems so easy. Art, carried to such height, becomes a second nature. It is plain that it is no mere mechanical matter. There must be a certain something like genius at the bottom of it—genius for a speciality, not genius in its universal sense—to explain such freshness in the exercise of processes so long and laboriously studied. An infallible instinct of good taste reigns in all she does, from what is simplest to what is most extraordinary, so that she may never mistake the right expression of whatsoever music she may undertake, and never undertake what is not meant for her. At all events it is an interesting, a genuine individuality, this singing of Mme. Lagrange; and we shall rejoice to hear again that wild Hungarian melody, and that vocalized Mazurka. Her lady-like dignity and grace of person, the beauty that is and is not, coming and going with her rare mobility of features,—and yet beautiful in the total expression as if every feature had been spiritually moulded to the good will to please,—go far to complete the charm.

Very general is the regret that we may not hear this troupe in opera. Is not the appreciation of their efforts here sufficient to procure us sooner or later that great pleasure?

Boston Theatre.—Italian Opera.

The two closing performances last week formed rather an anti-climax to the opera excitement. Rigoletto, on Friday, was voted the most insignificant of all the operas. [Even VERDI's admirers did not seem to warm to it. The charms of novelty, of Mme. MARETZKE's singing in the part of Gilda, and of a few effective pieces of for the most part light music, were about all that saved it. The thing dramatically is too monstrous to be endurable, except as your attention is caught away from the drama by the sparkling detail of the music, or by nice points for voice or orchestra. It certainly is not a great opera; it does not seem, until the last act, where the horrors are unveiled, to aspire to anything intensely lyrical. It is rather a light play of fancy; and therein we like it better than such overstrained efforts at the tragical and thrilling as Il Trovatore. There the composer tried harder; here he has been happier. We are still convinced that there is more agreeable music, more that is new and fresh in Rigoletto. Sig. VERDI has a very clever talent for pretty masquerade and dance music, as we knew by the last act of Ernani; and here the music played by a band upon the stage in the opening Don Juan-like scene, the minuet, the whispered Zitti zitti chorus of the conspirators who abduct Rigoletto's daughter, the Duke's free and easy waltz air: La donna è mobile, &c. &c., are really among the pleasant things of the kind. There is now and then a touch of geniality as in "the Barber."

There are some touching songs, too, and some dashing ones that are quite clever. In the scenes between Gilda and her lover, and Gilda and her father, there is some expressive melody. The quartet in the last scene is finer than anything in Trovatore, or perhaps any work of Verdi's; and to deepen the horrors of that scene there are some orchestral effects of a very simple and scarcely musical kind employed, which show invention.

As to the singers, there was little to praise, with the exception of the part of Gilda. VESTVALI appeared wholly out of place in such a part as Madalena; Sig. BOLCIONI's tenor was hard and hoarse, and he had nothing of the gay air of the sporting Duke. Sig. AMODIO, as Rigoletto, the court jester, Gilda's father and avenger, had the most of a character to sustain; but his memory often failed him in his music, and his "make up" was too ridiculous.—The piece was curtailed of some of its good things, and some absurd things, such as the revival and singing of the murdered Gilda in the sack.

We were too hasty in congratulating our readers last Saturday upon the prospect of hearing Masaniello in its entirety. We should have known the worth of theatre announcements better. Of the five acts only the three first were given, and those greatly abridged. Yet what we heard and saw—all save the painfully ungraceful Fenella—was appetizing to a degree that made our disappointment keen. If there is no great music in AUBER's opera, there is much that is fresh and vivid, both in melody and harmony. The plot, the characters, the scenes and groupings are all interesting. It was perfectly refreshing after VERDI's operas. The well-known choruses, of the fishermen, of the marketers, the wedding chorus in the first scene, the prayer (a rich, unique piece of unaccompanied vocal harmony), &c., were very effectively sung. Mme. MARETZKE looked and sang finely in what little of her music was retained. The Duke's part (Herr QUINX) was reduced to almost nothing. Sig. BRIGNOLI made an interesting Masaniello. He had not fire enough for the full effect of the Barcarolle, but was warmed into life in the patriotic duet by BADIALI, whose impersonation of the rough, honest fisherman, Pietro, was as picturesquely Neapolitan, as it was new for him.

When the curtain rose after the prayer and battle chorus, "a change had come o'er the spirit of the dream" and of the music. It was Donizetti, and Edgardo dying once more, who has died so often, even in brass bands and hand organs, that it would be really a relief to have him make an end of it. But it was the debut of our young friend, HARRISON MILLARD; and in that we were all interested. We are fully of the general opinion that it was a very successful debut. There was no great evidence of dramatic talent, yet all was appropriate enough, as it was modest. His voice, if not so strong as we have heard, was throughout very clear and pure and sweet, and his rendering of the music such as would do credit to a better tenor than that opera troupe possesses. But Mr. Millard, we are sure, does wisely to employ his gift in concert and in parlor singing, where his voice and style and good musicianship are always most acceptable.

Musical Correspondence.

From TAUNTON, Mass.

JUNE 13.—The "Creation" was brought out here by the "Beethoven Society," Monday evening last, under the direction of the accomplished artist, THOMAS RYAN. The Society had eight or ten weeks' drill on the oratorio, and the ladies practiced in general vocalization under the direction of this gentleman during this time; so that every thing on the evening in question went swimmingly. The Society consists of about fifty voices, and an orchestra of twenty,—complete, excepting oboes and bassoons. I doubt if any town out of Boston can boast of so complete an organization of the kind as Taunton. The society has given a series of concerts for several seasons past, at which many full oratorios have been performed,—thus have they endeavored to instil a love for music of a high order among their town's people. This and all similar societies will consult their best interests by engaging such a person as Mr. Ryan to drill and bring out works of as high an order as the "Creation," because more deference is paid by the members to all remarks and suggestions from such a leader, than would be paid to one of their own members.

I hope, Mr. Editor, to be able to chronicle similar undertakings next season.

I must not omit stating that this, as well as previous concerts, was very fully attended.

SPECTATOR.

From NEW YORK.

JUNE 12.—Since my last the LAGRANGE troupe have given the 'Barber,' 'Puritani' (twice), and 'Norma.' Mme. LAGRANGE's Elvira pleased me exceedingly, as indeed it did the rest of the audience. I liked her better than GRISI. Her singing is perfect, and her acting, especially in the third scene of the second act, and in the Vien diletto was superb. The other artists, though far inferior, on the whole did well. On Friday night we had 'Norma,' and a crowded house. I saw but a part of it and therefore can say nothing as to the 'new reading' which Mme.

Lagrange is said to have given. Signorina COSTINI made a very pleasing Adalgisa.

And now, although Mme. Lagrange is a perfect singer and actress, I feel no great admiration for her. She has nothing which makes one sympathize, nothing to carry away one's feelings. And therefore I was glad to have the regular company back last night, even though they gave Il Trovatore. The house was crowded, which shows that the New York public prefer a good stock company to a star and a few accompanying starlets. To-morrow we have 'Tell,' and on Saturday Linda, with your Boston prima donna, Miss HENSLEY, whom we are all very anxious to hear.

The present troupe will break up before long, (they say), BADIALI and STEFFANONE going to Europe. The Lagrange troupe will soon return to the Academy, and probably be strengthened from the present company.

Next week we are to have German opera at Wallack's. Manager, ALBERT MARETZKE; conductor, ROBERT STORFEL. Fidelio is among the promised operas. The week following, the grand German musical jubilee of the different societies through the United States will open with a grand concert on Monday, at the Metropolitan. At the close of July we are to have JULLIEN, with a new orchestra. It is rumored that he is also to be engaged in Italian opera. And lastly, that Dr. JOY (of the great English firm), is making arrangements for English opera, the company to include Mr. and Mrs. SIMS REEVES, Mr. and Mrs. WEISS, etc.

And so closeth this chapter of musical gossip.

NEW COURSE OF HARMONY, BY L. H. SOUTHWARD.

The Publishers call the attention of the musical profession to this work, as one eminently calculated to lighten the labors of the teacher, and rapidly advance the pupil. It is emphatically a PRACTICAL work, serving both as a Manual of instruction on the one hand, and a Text-book on the other; and it is believed that the peculiar arrangement of the work, together with the very large number of exercises and examples, presents great advantages, to both scholar and teacher, over any similar work of the kind. Teachers highly commend the work. Mr. WILLIAM MASON says it is a work unsurpassed in the language. Mr. GEORGE J. WEISS says that it is a work perspicuous in diction, methodical in arrangement, and sufficiently copious to embrace all the essentials of the general doctrine of accord. It can be ordered through any respectable Music-seller, and will be sent through the mail on the receipt of the price, ($1.75,) postage prepaid.

From the New York Daily Tribune.

There is no better musical critic in the country than John S. Dwight, of Boston, and few men are able to express what they have to say about music in a manner at once so poetic and precise. His articles are sure to please the learned in music, and to delight its lovers. We commend his journal unreservedly to our musical friends as a work which will be an able running commentary upon musical events, extracting from each its significance, varying its critical notices of music and musicians, both new and old, with biographical and entertaining details; and always true to what is most interesting and commanding in this noblest of the Arts.

From the Boston Evening Transcript.

Wherever there is a piano-forte, this Journal ought to be lying on it.

From the Boston Atlas.

We need just such a paper. One which is subservient to no particular clique of book-makers, or society agents, or managerial interests. One which tells truly what is good and what is bad, in the honest convictions of the writer. Mr. Dwight unites more qualifications to hold the judge's chair than any other writer with whose powers we are acquainted. His genial warmth of feeling is united to an acute perception of the beauties of executional Art; while a long and earnest study of the great composers of the world has rendered him familiar with, and an appreciator of, their noble works.

Beethoven's Symphonies.

BY "A FRIEND OF ART."

From the German.

In the Fifth Symphony, in C minor (67th work), BEETHOVEN strikes quite other, higher chords. This symphony has always been regarded with peculiar fondness and even as the ne plus ultra of symphonic art by those Beethovenists, to whom the last symphony of the master has remained more or less a riddle, and who have recognized in Beethoven chiefly the sorrow-smitten, struggling genius, attaining to joy and cheerfulness only through grief, while they have not enough appreciated the pure serenity and joyfulness with which he is filled in the seventh and eighth symphonies. In fact this work exerts an infinitely magical influence over those, who have just for the first time reached the outer threshold of the Beethoven sanctuary. This magical effect is owing partly to the pregnant and pronounced tone-pictures, and partly to the sharply separated contrasts in which the work moves. If you take the first movement of this symphony and compare it with the same in the Eroica, you perceive at once the epigrammatic shortness (so to say) of the former, the simplicity of its thoughts, as opposed to the broad, extended treatment and the involved periodic structure of the latter. The contrasts of light and shadow in the fifth are much bolder than in the third. Moreover about no work of Beethoven has there been so much poetizing, as about this. Think only of Hoffmann's Phantasie-stücke.

But let us approach this tone-creation more nearly. As the ideal subject of the work we may designate the struggle of the human soul to escape the narrowing limits of pain and sorrow and attain to inward joy and cheerfulness. This struggle is announced to us in the first movement. How significant already the first tones, of which Beethoven thoughtfully has said "So knocks Fate at the door!" It goes on developing in true dramatic course, in painful conflict, the soul is filled with deepest woe, is in a state of veritable wretchedness, dismay and anguish get possession of the feelings; now the soul seems to succumb to these nocturnal demons, to sink exhausted in the battle; and now it gathers itself up again, giving utterance in violent spasms to its pain, and approaching nearer and nearer to the goal of absolute despair. But through this night there sounds from time to time a soothing, mildly reconciling voice—the second leading theme—as if to intimate that even this night is not wholly inconsolable. Still pain and sorrow constantly regain the upper hand, until toward the close they fill the agitated soul exclusively and with an increased power. In painful conflict the movement began, in painful conflict it concludes.

Then resound in the second movement the sweet tones of consoling hope, and quicken the soul that has been steeped in woe. What repose, what soul-kindling consecration reside in this first theme! What a healing, strengthening spell it works in the shattered soul, which presently, in the second theme rises to inspired courage, to joyful presentiment of success. These moods of all-consoling hope and of inspired and joyous courage fill alternately this wonderful piece of music; these compose its ideal subject-matter. Words are too precise and limited to afford any further indication of the soul's mysteries, which are here unveiled to us; one shrinks from trying to give intelligible expression to this magic, for "feeling is all." Let me simply allude to the transporting and celestial passage where the key of A flat minor enters; to the swelling gush of sweetest feelings near the close, to the impetuous fervor of the 22d and 23d bars before the end.

In the Third Movement, the Scherzo, the soul seems beclouded anew; but these are not those demons of the first movement, that are busy here; they are rather shadowy cloud shapes, which get possession once more of the soul already filled with hope and courage. The soul is once more spell-bound in a state of inward misery and discontent, from which it seeks in an infinitely humorous way to free itself. And the attempt succeeds. Toward the conclusion the composer struggles in a most magnificent musical climax out of the gloomy C minor into the full light of C major, and in a splendid triumphal march announces the achieved bliss of a cheerful, glad existence. Indeed in this concluding movement a whole world-sea of tones spreads out, the waves of the most blissful joy are heaving an sinking, an inexhaustible ocean of delight. But the characteristic of this joy world is, that it is not one immediately found and given us, not one created out of our subjective will or humor; but it is a joy wrestled for and won through the deepest conflict of the soul, a joy born in sorrow a moral fruit of suffering. But so hot was the preceding battle with sorrow, so deep the trace it has left in the soul, that even in the jubile of joy there mingles yet again an echo of the misery,—sounds from the third movement in 3-measure—but only to betray its utter impotence for instantly the joyous jubilation is begun anew and with the entrance of that theme in the forty third bar before the beginning of the Presto,—theme that breathes the most cheerful consciousness of victory,—the soul seems to swim in indisturbable fulness of enjoyment and revels near the close in ever swelling floods of dithyrambi inspiration.

This is the ideal substance of this mighty tone poem, so far as weak works have power to express it, so far as it is possible to utter the unutterable. After Beethoven in the Fifth Symphony had lifted himself by hard conflict out of the depths of sorrow into a cheerful region, into the realm of bliss and rapture, he lingered some time in this paradise, and in this state of mind composed the sixth, seventh and eighth symphonies: these ideal pictures of purest serenity and joy until in the ninth symphony he succeeded in reaching a yet higher paradise, not to be won however but by conflict and by suffering as before.

In the Sixth Symphony, (F major, 68th work) Beethoven fills the sphere of absolute music with a new element. It is the life of Nature which environs Man, that forms the ideal unit and ground work of this tone-creation; hence its name, "Pastoral Symphony." But it is no soulless copy of the phenomena of Nature, no unpoetic material tone-painting, that Beethoven gives; it is a real poetic representation of the idea of Nature in the first place; and then the feelings and emotions, which possess man when he contemplates and loses himself in this world but above all the representation of Nature as reflected in human feeling, of Nature, so to say transfigured in the human image; that is to say not literal, naked Nature, but Nature reborn in the human spirit. Instead, therefore, of a mass of separate natural phenomena, we have an intellectually condensed picture of the most general life of Nature; and only in the second and third movements of the work are some single definite phenomena of Nature introduced; but here too Beethoven does not lose himself in sensuous materialism, he only gives the spiritual quintessence.

Thus in the First Movement, as he says himself in the superscription, he represents the awakening of cheerful emotions on arriving in the country. He does not describe to us the fields and meadows, the ploughers and the reapers; he only depicts the mood of feeling with which the citizen comes longingly and joyfully home to rural life. HAYDN, as FRANZ BRENDL says, is very beautiful, the child of Nature himself, who has grown up in intimate relationship with Nature, a part of her; but Beethoven is the man of the city, who consciously resigns himself to Nature's life. It is the mood, so strikingly indicated in GOETHE'S "Faust":

Forth from the arch'd and gloomy gate
The multitude, in bright array,
Stream forth, and seek the sun's warm ray!
Their risen Lord they celebrate,
For they themselves have also risen to-day!
From the mean tenement, the sordid room,
From roofs' and gables' overhanging gloom,
From the close pressure of the narrow street,
They've issued now from darkness into light.

This ground tone of feeling the composer pursues into the finest nuances and portrays it in the richest and most various play of colors; if in the outset the soul seems mainly moved by silent joyfulness, yet presently it begins to breathe with perfect freedom, to exult aloud, and revel soon in the most glad and merry waves, till at the end of the movement it returns again to tranquil, musing, pensive cheerfulness, for now the clear and quiet brook is rippling sweetly near.

The Second Movement Beethoven has characterized as the scene by the brook. This is decidedly a definite natural image, and accordingly the music assumes a more determinate and individual coloring. We perceive the wavy motion of the brook, we listen to the sweet voices of the birds in the woods; nay, finally the sound of the water is entirely silenced, and we only hear the song of lark, cuckoo and nightingale. This is "tone-painting." Certainly, but so far from being a soulless, material copy, it is the most soul-ful, most naïve, ideal expression of a particular phenomenon of natural life. It is a fact not without significance, that these living, natural voices first appear distinctly only at the close of the piece; so far from being a product of the mere arbitrary will and fancy of the poet, these "tricks," as some are pleased to call them, appear rather as the necessary last result of the ideal development of this movement; they extricate themselves from the more or less diluted tone-pictures—we do not use the epithet in a disparaging sense—which lead ideal expression to the life of the brook and forest, detach themselves therefrom, and represent this side of Nature's life in the most sensuous accuracy and directness, revealing the steadfast striving of Beethoven after the utmost possible definiteness of expression.

In the Third Movement Beethoven describes the merry meeting of the country people in the most original manner and in the most speaking outlines, so that here all poetic commentary were superfluous. But soon this joyous festival is interrupted by an approaching thunderstorm, and now the masses of tone as they whirl onward and spread out upon the grandest scale announce the spectacle of the unchained energies of Nature, the rolling thunder, the howling storm and the flashing lightning. But presently the angry chaos is quieted, the sky is cleared, the setting sun shines forth, the herdsmen's horns resound, and in every creature are excited "glad and grateful feelings after the storm." To these emotions Beethoven gives expression in the last Movement. As in the first movement, these feelings are at first gently stirred; but soon again the heaving waves of heart-felt joy expand in the most inexhaustible fullness, and with the most various individuality, until at the end all is blended in the feeling of sincerest gratitude to the Creator, and the work concludes in a devout and holy mood. So Beethoven reproduced Nature and her thousand living voices in the poetry of tones.

Malibran and Mendelssohn.

From Novello's Musical Times.

DEAR MR. EDITOR:—As one of the fashionable novels of the day draws public interest towards the subject of a distinguished musical celebrity, his extraordinary genius, his charm of person and manner, his marvel of pianoforte playing, I have thought the following anecdote might not be unacceptable just now, as showing how little the absolute realities in delight of Art-life are transcended by even the most florid imaginings of Art-romance.

It was once my fortune to be present on an occasion, which "Charles Auchester's" highest flight of rapturously described scene could not surpass in profound gratification, although very quietly enjoyed.

At an English professor's house in London, a few friends were once assembled, after the soberer mode of a past day—when an evening's artistic and social pleasure was more the object than stylish party-giving, and when sterling music proved the staple of the entertainment, rather than supplementary footmen, plate and glass for the nonce, with unwonted exotics and ices. The guests were told that Maria Malibran De Beriot and her husband had promised to come; and that Felix Mendelssohn Bartholdy was also expected.

In the meantime, those already arrived—most of whom were musicians, and either played or sang—joined their host in performing some of their favorite pieces, vocal and instrumental, as the fancy of the moment prompted. During an interval, when conversation had succeeded to a trio of Beethoven's, one of the host's children (just such an infant fanatic as the boy "Auchester" defines himself) being on the eager ear-watch, heard the sound of an arrival, and crept to the stair-head, in hope of catching the first glimpse of the coming glory. Peeping through the banisters the child beheld a lady who had just thrown off a hood, leaning upon the arm of a gentleman, who turned, as he prepared to ascend, saying to those who waited to know at what hour the carriage should come:—"Half-past ten." "Ten, Charles! Oh, pray tell them ten! These musical evenings,—these parties, are so —."

The arch movement of the flexible eye-brow, the petulant curve of the mobile lip, the slight though significant emphasis on the word "parties," and above all the tedium expressed in the cadence of her voice as she paused, sufficiently supplied the unuttered epithet.

She came on, with her radiant face, full in the light of the staircase lamp, and of the opened drawing-room door; and then, as she entered, a burst of greeting welcomed her, and she was in an instant surrounded by admiring acquaintance, who led her into the farther drawing-room, where the music was going on.

With her own grace of courtesy, she offered to sing, knowing her host's delicacy would not allow him to propose it; and when she asked him to choose her song, he mentioned the one she had the day before given at the Philharmonic concert—Mozart's "Non piu di fiori."

She had scarcely begun that delicious strain of ineffable regret, when a young man of slender figure, but of irresistibly striking presence, came gently in, and placing his finger on his lip, dropped into the nearest chair, merely exchanging a silent shake of the hand with the mistress of the house.

Entranced and spell-bound while the aria continued,—at its close, all the company in the room where she was, drew round the singer, with animated looks and words of thanks.

Still, the last-entered guest kept his seat quietly, just within the folding doorway which divided the two drawing-rooms, signing to the lady of the house to say nothing of his arrival to the host. To the latter, Malibran had just turned with her beaming look, and said:—"My dear Mr. —, I want to sing one of your compositions. Are there none here?" One was found—a "Sancta Maria"—which she hastily looked over, and then sang. With such intuition of what the right expression should be—with such devotional fervor, with such anticipative truth of conception in her rendering each passage, as only genius itself can inspire, did she execute this motet, which she had assuredly never seen before that night. The composer's delighted praises, her auditors' irrepressible plaudits, excited her; and she sat down to the instrument herself. First she touched all hearts with the tender sweetness of a little French air, with words as appealing as its melody; and then she suddenly struck into a lively mariner ballad, with a burden all jocund and free.

In the midst of the tumult of laudation that followed, De Beriot stepped to her side in his calm way, and whispered something in her ear.

She started up. "Mendelssohn here!" she exclaimed, with a whole flood of sunshine smiles pouring over her countenance, making it one glow of bright color—I never saw a face speak its gladness in such candor of vivid suffusion as her's did, upon any sudden emotion—and then she ran into the next room, to meet him. In another moment, he was the centre of a welcoming crowd. He rose to salute his friends, and join his thanks with theirs for what she had just heard. "Ah! you were pleased?" she said, with her touch of foreign accent, and cordial voice. "Now, my dear Mr. Mendelssohn, I never do nothing for nothing; and therefore you must come and play for me." She seized his arm, in her sportive eager way, and drew him over to the instrument.

Then came the wonder. He ran his fingers over the keys, and launched into one of his masterly improvisations. First he introduced the divine beauty of Mozart's impassioned aria.—Then, with solemn measure, stole in the holy purity of the "Sancta Maria;" then came the phrase full of loving earnestness, and voluptuous ardor: "Ahl rien n'est doux comme la voix qui dit je t'aime;" then burst in, with frolic gaiety, the sailor's ringing cry; and lastly, triumph of triumphs—he worked the four subjects together.

The torrent of eulogy that succeeded, warmed every one into a state of excitement that nothing could satisfy but more and more music. Piece followed piece, one still bringing on another. De Beriot played a fantasia with his own incomparable skill; a rare combination of fire, and of exquisite softness; of impulse, vigor, and admirable firmness, and a richness yet delicacy of tone, which to my taste, has never been equalled. Mendelssohn gave us some fugues of Bach; and Malibran sang again and again.

At length she caught her husband's eye, with something of a lurking meaning in its expression, which occasioned her to exclaim, with her sprightly tone, "Ah! It is late?" De Beriot composedly took out his watch, and held it before her.—"Past midnight: Then two hours the carriage has —." The playful smile which sat so well upon that mouth, concluded the sentence. On taking leave, as she grasped both her host's hands in hers, after her own frank winning fashion, she said:—"Thank you for a pleasant time, dear Mr. —. This is what I call a musical evening!"

It was a musical evening which will never be forgotten, while life and memory lasts, by Bellini Classic.

As we advance in time, and as we become familiar with the followers of Bellini, it really seems that this composer, whose works, during his life, were considered a very marked degradation of the musical genius of his nation, has now risen to such a pitch as to appear almost classic. In fact, the epoch of ROSSINI and BELLINI, compared with the following one of DONIZETTI and VERDI, can actually bear the same classification which, some forty years ago, people gave to the old Italian school, comparing it with the improprieties of the farceur, Rossini. After such an experience, we should really not wonder if coming times should place even Verdi amongst the classics, and Bellini's style as a rigorous one, unfit for all imitation. In the beautiful field of music and harmony, the last fifteen years have made so many so-called impossibilities very possible, so many plants which were thought entirely unsuitable to the ground have grown and ripened into the most astonishing fruits, that we should not feel at all surprised, another fifteen years hence, to see this very field cultivated by some extraordinary hitherto-unknown means, and producing, with an enormous success (of course, not a miserable succes d'estime.) musical effects which ordinary beings now consider as just the reverse of music.

Bellini classic! Why not? If simplicity—purity of subject, of conception, and of sentiment are prominent features in a work of classicity, Bellini's music must doubtless appear exceedingly classic to a man who is compelled to witness the efforts of a modern Italian opera troupe. Take all his subjects, even Norma included, how simple are they, how far from all that, which is called in a modern sense romantic! Bellini has, in all his operas, very little to rely upon but himself, almost always a calm action, very few opportunities of displaying brilliant sceneries, no decorative points, very few exciting scenes, which have to do the whole work of impression, while the composer adds only a sort of musical drapery; he has nothing but his melodies, the purity of his sentiments, and a sort of musical naïveté, which beautifully reflect his own nature. It is said that Bellini, before he wrote down the music, repeated the words to himself, until they received a musical accent and phrasing, a very reasonable proceeding, and not often used by modern opera-composers. It is most probably on account of this that, whenever the character of the words and the situation in the opera sympathize with his own predilection and nature, he becomes really dramatic, at least as much as an Italian with so little musical knowledge as he had can be; while, if this is not the case, his music appears sometimes unbearable. To illustrate the latter remark, we cite only his Liberty-duo in the second act of I Puritani, which is as trivial and meaningless as possible. Poor Bellini! what did he care for liberty and independence? His very nature could only develop itself by uniting with other natures, by living in the light of love, friendship, and, perhaps, such feelings as are expressed in Casta Diva; and whenever he has to refer to these, he shows truth, ideas—in short, all the resources of his nature. The finale of the first act of I Puritani is a striking proof of this. Here, the sentiment of loyalty on the part of Arthur, the love, in its joy and despair, of Elvira, the jealousy of Richard, are all rendered full of life and dramatic truth; and as Bellini, at the time he composed this, his last opera, had made a decided progress in his art, we can not wonder that this finale is the best and most artistic thing he has written. We presume it was on account of this finale that a distinguished musician said the other day: "Whenever I listen to I Puritani, I forgive Bellini for having written Norma!"—Mus. Review.

Debut of Miss Hensler.

(From the New York Times of June 18.)

There was a good attendance at the Academy of Music on Saturday night in spite of the rain—than which nothing is more discouraging to an opera goer. Miss HENSLER may feel complimented that she attracted so large an audience with the elements and an off-night against her.

The opera selected for the occasion was DONIZETTI's "Linda di Chamounix." * * *

On the appearance of the debutante the house applauded with encouraging gallantry. Without any perceptible nervousness, Miss HENSLER commenced the opening scena, and at once enlisted the sympathies of the audience. O Luce di quest'anima followed, and was given with fluency and grace, but not otherwise remarkably. The duet with Carlos, A consolarmi, was artistically rendered so far as Miss Hensler was concerned, but the clumsy staccato of Signor BRIGNOLI did not contribute to its effect. Throughout the first act, Miss Hensler preserved the favorable impression she had created, and was called before the curtain and pelted with bouquets in the most approved manner. In the second and third acts, she felt more at home. There was a perceptible improvement, not only in the quantity of her voice, but in her management of it. The duet with the Marquis, and the final portions of the opera were in all respects, the best efforts of the evening.

The quality of Miss Hensler's voice is sympathetic and sweet. It does not command admiration but beseeches it, and is precisely the voice to strengthen with practice and study. If a conscientious regard be paid to the latter, there can be but little doubt that Miss Hensler will eventually take a high rank among eminent sopranos. Her method is the pure Italian, and so far as it goes, admirable. We should do an injustice to Miss Hensler and to ourselves, were we to imagine for a moment that her studies are ended. In the delivery of her voice and in fluent phrasing she has much to learn. On the other hand, she has no mannerism which it would be desirable to forget. What she does now is but a promise of what she will be able to do hereafter. At present, a quiet neatness of style, correct intonation, and a charmingly sweet voice are the characteristics of her singing. The compass of her voice we should take to be about two octaves and a note or two over, of good soprano quality. The lower notes are deficient in roundness and sonority; the upper ones clear and delicious. The register is smooth and well connected throughout. In personal appearance Miss Hensler is young and interesting. Her deportment on the stage might be materially improved without losing any of its attractive modesty. In a dramatic point of view Miss Hensler has everything to learn. To sum up, Miss Hensler has a delightful voice and some skill, but she needs more practice before she can do full justice either to the former or the latter. Her début was triumphantly successful—sufficiently so, we hope, to secure her an engagement for next season. Three or four months' hard work before a critical audience would do her immense service.

The criticisms in the other New York papers are quite in harmony with the above. We will only add a portion of the remarks of W. H. Fry in the Tribune:

"The puritanic antecedents of Boston are in striking contrast with the facts it has lately shown in the musical line. Several native-born Boston amateurs of music are now in Italy studying; Mrs. Biscaccianti too is known to operatic fame; Mr. Charles C. Perkins, besides, lately produced a Cantata or Oratorio; another, we hear, is engaged on an opera—and Miss Hensler, if considered also of that latitude, is yet a fresh evidence of the changes which have taken place there in the arts.

Miss Hensler has a sweet, frank, ingenuous, expressive face, a dark, sympathetic eye, and considering her opportunities, exhibited talent in dramatic action. Her figure is of moderate height, her age about nineteen—so she has ample time for culture and improvement. Her voice is a high soprano—capable of rendering such parts as that of Linda in which she appeared. Positively soprano voices have seldom or ever very great body, but their compensations lie in delicacy and flexibility. Hence Miss Hensler's voice, though not massive, is pure and agile, and commanding high notes readily, is easily heard throughout the theatre. It is proper to add that she was warmly applauded by a numerous auditory, and called for eagerly at the close of the performance."

Max Maretzek.

The popular Conductor, "hero of nineteen opera campaigns," &c. &c., took his benefit at the New York Academy of Music, Monday night. The Times improved the occasion to give the following sketch of his career.

The vicissitudes of Mr. MARETZEK's career afford a striking illustration of the mutability of human riches, and the utter vanity of all earthly glory. Seven years ago he landed in America with nothing but talent and a wooden bâton. To-day he has nothing but talent and a wooden bâton. In the interval he has made and lost several fortunes. We find him conducting the opera for Mr. FRY in 1848; commencing for himself in 1849; progressing rapidly to fortune in 1850; tumbling down suddenly in 1851; and from that time to the present making and losing money with strange rapidity and nonchalance. For seven years he has been the hard working propagandist of the Italian Opera. He has done all the work; received all the kicks; made all the enemies; and conferred all the benefits of the lyric muse. In return for this, he is Musical Director of the Academy and has a benefit to-night. Rather hard in a wordly, but highly beautiful in a moral point of view.

It may not be inappropriate on this occasion, and certainly will not be uninteresting, to refer to some of the New York campaigns of Mr. Maretzek. It will be seen that the artistes engaged by him were not of third or fourth rate class; and that really to Mr. Maretzek New York is indebted for much of its best musical education.

In the autumn of 1849, Maretzek gave a series of fifty performances at Astor-place, with TRUFFI, BERTUCCA, FORTI, BENEDETTI, BENEVENTANO, and NOVELLI. It was carried through successfully. In 1850 he gave another series of fifty performances, with PARODI, as well as the other artistes. In the Spring of 1851, he commenced a season of sixty nights at Castle Garden, with BOSIO, TRUFFI, SALVI, BETTINI, BADIALI, MARINI, BENEVENTANO, and COLETTI. This great company performed at fifty cents admission only. The season and its promises were carried out fully, but in doing so Maretzek lost $20,000. The next year he tried another campaign in Astor place, with STEFFENONE, BOSIO, BETTINI, and most of the others. This was recuperative—so much so that a fresh season was commenced early in the Spring. But in the meantime an opposition sprang up at a rival house. The result was that both Companies were utterly ruined, after a brilliant but erratic career. Maretzek, with the remains of his Company and an orchestra consisting of three performers (including musical director,) left for Mexico. After an absence of eight months, he returned and commenced another season at Castle Garden, (1853,) with SONTAG, STEFFENONE, SALVI, POZZOLINI, BADIALI, BENEVENTANO, MARINI and ROSSI. This season was successfully carried out, and another undertaken at NIBLO's, with STEFFENONE, SALVI and others. It was to have been fifty nights long, but terminated on the forty-ninth in consequence of a difficulty with SALVI. Our readers will remember the interesting and exceedingly abusive correspondence which took place at the time. Last year Max Maretzek went to Europe and returned with BERALDI, GRAZIANI, GOMEZ and others. These artistes performed thirty-six nights at Castle Garden. The season was unsuccessful, and terminated in vexatious losses to every one. Since this, the Academy has possessed Mr. Maretzek. In the course of these campaigns sixteen new operas have been introduced to the public, in addition to those of the customary repertoires and a number of revivals. Something worth remembering, surely.

THE BRONZE STATUE OF BEETHOVEN.—The Advertiser publishes a couple of letters from Munich, on occasion of the exhibition of Crawford's noble statue there at the festival commemorative of Beethoven's death. The first of these, describing the festival, we have already given substantially. The other, addressed to Mr. PERKINS, is from the distinguished composer and Royal Music Director of the King of Bavaria, Herr FRANZ LACHNER (not SWEHNER, as the Advertiser has it), and is as follows:

MUNICH, March 31, 1855.

The common feeling and reverence for Art and the masters of Art which exists on both sides of the ocean, among the cultivated nations of the New and the Old World, is a tie which unites them although separated from each other by space, in customs and social forms. That reverence for Beethoven, greatest of all the composers of our country, which has so long lived in all the music-loving hearts of his native Europe, is now participated in by a great and noble people beyond the ocean. The Beethoven will soon stand in Boston, as a visible and speaking proof of the noble community of thought existing between the two continents. Munich, highly esteemed as the starting point of modern Art, has given being to this monument, so grandly modeled by one of the most gifted artists of America. The musical community of our city took occasion of the completion of this monument, to give a musical fête in memory of the great master on the anniversary of his death. (He died, as all the world knows, on the 26th of March, 1827.) Confident of your cordial sympathy, they placed it in the Concert Hall. The king, the members of the Royal family, and a select and numerous audience assembled on this glorious occasion. Constant applause during the whole evening showed the deep sympathy of the inhabitants of Munich in this celebration, the memory of which will long live in a thousand hearts. You will see by the enclosed programme what works were selected for performance at this admirable concert. The prologue which accompanies it will express to you the sentiments of the listeners. And now receive from me the well-deserved thanks of all German artists and Art lovers, which you and Crawford have so well won by the creation and erection of this noble monument. May this bronze image of the great composer take with it across the ocean as a great blessing, the power to preserve and spread among you the love of classical music, so that the art of music, in its deepest and truest meaning, may give the holy consecration of a true feeling for Art to the rapidly developing people of America.

Musical Correspondence.

From NEW YORK.

JUNE 20.—All the newspapers will tell you that our fair young prima donna, Miss HENSLEY, has had a brilliant success at the Academy of Music.

And you will not be sorry, perhaps, to have the assurance of a private citizen of the parquette that in this particular instance the newspapers have told the truth.

Miss Hensley's success was an honest, handsome and satisfactory success—a success highly gratifying to all her friends, and full of encouragement for herself. The traditional New York dislike of things and people Bostonian, seems to have been suspended in her favor, and I have rarely witnessed a more demonstrative and hearty audience. They rained roses, and thundered applause. And (which was more satisfactory) they looked admiringly and listened approvingly. The house was perhaps not quite full, but like Charles Lamb in the omnibus, each individual seemed to be "full" of good will and satisfaction.

The choice of the opera was very judicious, the music of Linda giving good scope to the peculiar charms, the freshness, delicacy and sweetness of the debutante's voice, while it offers but few of those temptations to florid and ambitious display, from which a young singer is apt to take harm. In such a case as that of Miss Hensley, a debut is to be judged with reference to the future; it is the blossom and not the fruit that we go to see, and those who took an interest in the fair lady's fate hoped to find in the performances of Saturday night assurance of long seasons of delight to come. This assurance they found. The very faults of Miss Hensley's inexperience were recommendations, and I am sure that no competent person could have listened to her Linda, without being convinced that she lacks no quality essential to the rank she aspires to hold on the lyric stage.

You will hear her in concert, and will be delighted with her voice and method. But as I know you agree with me that the legitimate triumphs of vocal music belong to the Opera and the Oratorio, you will reserve your best satisfaction in the return of an accomplished countrywoman, till you can see her fairly installed in the constellation of that "Opera of the Future," which is destined, I hope, to shed its benignant influences upon us for season after season yet to come.

I heard Miss Hensley again last night, at MARETZEK's benefit, when she was good enough to lend her sweet aid to the ovation of the unlucky, cross-grained and energetic ex-impresario. I say nothing of last evening, for I listened not critically, but comfortably, to Miss H., after being exhausted and obfuscated with a pot-pourri consisting of Masaniello, 3 acts.

Le Prophète, 1 scene.

Don Bucephalo, 1 scene.

I always enjoy Masaniello, and BRIGNOLI sang well. But the audience was as confusing as the performance. One's sentiments were painfully wrought upon by the way in which the people cheered the smoke-pipe and hot lava of old Vesuvius, whistled for the curtain to rise, shrieked cat-calls at the supernumeraries, and did so many other things unsuitable to an operatic house, that I dare say peanuts were eaten in the galleries. No man knows better than yourself the importance of "atmosphere," and you will easily understand my unwillingness to venture any observations on such an evening.

I may mention as a crowning indication of the odd nature of the assemblage, that Maretzek, the beneficiary, was not called out at all.

The people had sense enough, however, to honor the Signorina Elise, and she looked, sang, and acted much better than such a house deserved.

I think that I shall try to drag myself to Niblo's to hear BALFE's "Daughter of St. Mark," or rather to see the same, and if you wish, will "drop you a line" apropos thereof.

Faithfully yours, X

JUNE 21.—On Wednesday last the Academy troupe produced "Tell," and never did they play it better. The orchestra gave us the overture in a perfectly exquisite manner, and all the singers, solo and chorus, afterwards did their best. I have got to like the overture and two first acts so well, from frequent hearing, that to part for them for some time, at least, makes me quite sad.

On Friday evening the house was about as full as it could be, and then there were several hundreds of the genus homo crowded in besides. The occasion was the benefit of the New York favorite, VESTALI. Of the third act of Rigoletto the least said the better. The next piece on the programme (in order to continue the horrors) was the third act of "Romeo and Juliet," composed for Mme. MALIBRAN by VACCAY. It seems Mme. M. was not contented with BELLINI's last act, and therefore procured this. Vestali did well in the poor music, but STEFFANONE was rather too large and old for Juliet. To show you with what poetical genius the argument in the programme was written, I enclose it:

ACT III.

Romeo enters, with chorus, and desires the tomb of Juliet to be opened. He expresses his anguish, "Dearest of my heart, look down upon the grief of thy fond and faithful love." Romeo takes poison, when Juliet suddenly recovers. "What! know you not my death was feigned," She cries. Romeo dies lamenting.

Is not this beautiful? Note the wonderful climax at which the unknown poet arrives in those grand words, "She cries!" 'Tis strange, but Steffanone did not cry.

The performances closed with the second and fourth acts of Trovatore, or rather they closed with a speech from Miss Vestali, as our New York papers insist upon entitling her.

On Saturday evening Miss HENSLEY made her debut in Linda. On account of a heavy rain the house was not crowded, but the attendance was very fair nevertheless. Miss H. was at first a little timid, but soon took courage and pleased exceedingly.—She is very young yet, and when her acting has become more perfect by practice, and her voice more full and developed, she will be a very valuable acquisition to the lyric stage. And even as it is she is a very pleasant singer, and in a girlish part like that of Linda does very well indeed. She was enthusiastically received, and at the close of the first act obtained a perfect shower of bouquets. She has made a very good impression upon us New Yorkers, and we look forward to her future career with much pleasure. Rocco made a capital Marquis, BRIGNOLI a fine De Sirval, BADIALI an excellent Antonio (he could not have been better either in the making up, acting or singing), and Vestali a very charming Pierotto.

On Monday evening the benefit of "our MAX" came off. First we had the three acts of Masaniello, which you had in Boston two weeks before. The notice of that performance in your last will do for this. I enjoyed it very much, all but the dancing. Then followed a scene from the Prophète, introducing the beggar song, by Mme. D'ORMY. It was well given. Sig. Rocco then gave us most capitally a most capital buffo scene, from the opera of Don Bucephalo, composed by himself, representing a young composer at the rehearsal of his opera. I have seldom laughed more heartily in the same space of time.—The performances closed with the second act of Linda. Miss HENSLEY did even better than on Saturday.

This was the last night of the performances of the regular troupe, and at the close, those initiated adjourned to the operatic "bier-kneipe" in 3d Avenue, where pretty soon about the whole Teutonic portion of the troupe and their friends (including many Yankees) were assembled. Even the policeman, detailed at the Academy, came. I heard a gentleman ask him if he understood German: "No sir," he answered, "but I understand what lager-bier means."

From this "house of the muses" we proceeded to the residence of Mr. PHALEN in 14th street, to whom the orchestra brought a fine serenade. The same was then done to Miss HENSLEY, at the Everett House, Mr. COIT, (the other manager,) in 8th street, STEFFANONE, in Houston street, and MAX, in 4th street. And then, it being half past two o'clock, I left them about to proceed again to the "house of the muses," and I think it likely that they didn't "go home till morning."

And now I must briefly express my thanks to the whole troupe, from Messrs. Phalen and Coit down to the lowest call-boy, inclusive, for the pleasure they have given me this winter, and, to be less selfish, for what they have done for the establishment of opera in this city, and for doing away with the "star" system. I only hope that our next season may be as good as this. The task of manager is a hard one, much labor and often much loss. But if Messrs. P. & C. will undertake the Academy again next winter, they will have some experience, and be able to get along with less trouble than this year. Let them keep "Max," and get rid of "naughty Harry," and they will do well.

To-morrow evening the Lagrange troupe open at the Academy, with Norma. I understand that we are to have Don Giovanni before long, with LAGRANGE as Zerlina. Who are to sing the other two female parts is unknown. Rumors are yet rife of an addition to the present troupe of some from the late "regular" one, and the production of the Prophète.

At Niblo's, BALFE's opera of The Daughter of St. Mark, was produced on Monday, with, as all the papers concur in saying, a most miserable lack of the requisite splendor. And I can believe it, for in the poverty of its decorations, etc., Niblo's is only excelled by Burton's.

Last night was a rainy one, and consequently but a poor audience assembled to hear the "Daughter of the Regiment," at Wallack's. The orchestra was a very good one, and D'ORMY made a capital Marie. Next week Fidelio is to be produced, with D'Ormy in the title rôle. The orchestral part of the performance will no doubt be good; of the rest I am not quite so sure. R.

Musical Chat-Chat.

"Come," said a respectable old Boston merchant to a young amateur pianist, who was visiting his family one evening, "Come, can't you play us a bit of a fu-gue for my little daughter to dance by?" Not so impossible, after all; for only a few nights after laughing at the story, we happened in at about the middle of one of the ballets of the Ravel Family, when verily as one of the principal danseuses began to cut her pigeon wings, the orchestra began scratching through an antique sounding fugue. Why not, since nearly all the modern forms of melody were originally associated with certain dances?

Among other things to be sung at the great festival of the German Männerchöre next week in New York, is the scene from the second act of "William Tell," that of the gathering and oath of the three cantons. It is said that about a thousand male voices will take part in it, the nucleus of whom have been sometime rehearsing it under the direction of CARL BERGMANN.... The original GERMANIA MUSICAL SOCIETY, with the exception of two or three members, will meet, in July, at Newport for the summer season. We hear they propose giving a series of concerts in the autumn.

It is well said by the London Times, and might be said as truly in New York or Boston as in London: "If half the care lavished on Il Trovatore were bestowed on Don Giovanni, at least a dozen overflowing audiences might be counted on in the progress of the season. Will directors never be persuaded that in a musical theatre the first essential is the general completeness of the musical performances? Why not, for once, in the absence of attractive novelties, make a desperate effort, and present Don Giovanni as Mozart wrote it, with every scenic and histrionic accessory to render it perfect? No opera offers greater scope for the actor, the scene-painter, the decorator, and the singer—to say nothing of the beauty and variety of the music, which, up to the present time, remains unequalled."

PROFS. THUNDER, ROHR and CROUCH 'respectfully place before the musical community of Philadelphia and neighborhood, the result of a careful investigation by them for establishing a series of Sacred and Secular Concerts for the approaching season.' The number of concerts to be twelve, on alternate Tuesdays. Among the compositions to be brought out are Mendelssohn's "St. Paul;" Mozart's "Requiem;" Mehul's "Joseph" (as an oratorio); Romberg's Cantata: "Song of the Bell;" "The Morning," by Ries; Locke's "Macbeth" music; and a series of ancient Madrigals of the 15th and 16th centuries. The professors pledge their professional standing, &c., for "fidelity of authorship" as well as artistic rendering.... The "Salem Choral Society" recently gave a very pleasant musical soirée to a large number of invited friends; the first part of the programme consisting of vocal solos, quartets, quintets, &c., and the second of choruses, with orchestral accompaniments. The society is composed of some eighty of the young singers of Salem, besides an orchestra of eighteen performers, all under the able directorship of Mr. MANUEL FENOLLOSA. It has been in operation only about three months, having been organized by the originators and leaders of the old "Salem Academy of Music," after that was revolutionized by Know Nothing influences. The Choral Society have been practising Mozart's 12th Mass.

Mrs. JAMESON, in her Common-Place Book says: "Talking once with Adelaide Kemble, after she had been singing in the Figaro, she compared the music to the bosom of a full-blown rose in its voluptuous, intoxicating richness. I said that some of Mozart's melodies seemed to me not so much composed, but found—found on some sunshiny day in Arcadia, among nymphs and flowers. "Yes," she replied, with ready and felicitous expression, "not inventions, but existences.".... The same genial authoress relates that, old George the Third, in his blindness and madness, once insisted on making the selection of pieces for the concert of ancient music, (May, 1811)—it was soon after the death of Princess Amelia. "The programme included some of the finest passages in Handel's 'Sampson,' descriptive of blindness; the 'Lamentations of Jephtha' for his daughter; Purcel's 'Mad Tom,' and closed with 'God save the King,' to make sure the application of all that went before."

Paris papers report the marriage of Mlle. WILHELMINA CLAUDE, the celebrated pianist, to M. FREDERIC SZARVADY, formerly secretary to the Hungarian embassy at Paris, and feuilletonist of the Gazette de Cologne.... M. DELPHAT, the oldest instrumental musician, as M. DARIUS was the oldest singer, in France, lately died at Lyons, at the age of ninety-nine years and three hundred days. He was projector of the first "monster concert" in France, which took place in 1791, as part of the funeral honors paid to the officers who were killed at Nancy. Then, under the direction of M. Delphat, the overture to Demophon, by Vogel, was executed by 1,200 wind instruments, accompanied by twelve tam-tams. A flute of honor was decreed to him by the city of Nancy, which, on his death-bed the old man begged to have placed in his coffin.

The Vienna correspondent of the Signale (Leipzig) thus reports a couple of criminal cases that have come before the tribunal of good taste there: "The first offender is of the female sex; name Traviata; father, Verdi; mother Neo-Italia; occupation nameless, see Dame aux Camelias; crime: exciting of public discontent through tediousness. The second offender is called Marco Visconti; father, Petrella; mother, Neo-Italia; occupation: murder and assassination; crime: qualified theft in the third degree and concealment of a mess of borrowed trifles; and on the second count, excitement of discontent through tediousness." Verdi, he says, is a Titan to Petrella!

At the Rhine Musical Festival at Düsseldorf, on the 27th, 28th and 29th of May, Mme. JENNY LIND GOLDSCHMIDT was to sing some Mazurkas of CHOPIN(!) besides arias from the Zauberflöte, and Beatrice di Tenda. FERDINAND HILLER was to conduct. It is also stated that Mme. Goldschmidt will sing three nights in Paris after the festival.

LIAZT has lately attended a performance of an Ave Maria of his own composition in the Catholic church at Leipsig.... THALBERG's opera, "Christina of Sweden," was to be brought out at Vienna on the 26th of May.

HALEVY's new opera, Juguarita, has met with great success at the Théâtre Lyrique in Paris; the favorite singer, Mme. CABEL, surpassed herself in it.

A German paper relates the following of ROSSINI's journey to Paris. He arrived at Aix from Nizza without stopping at Marseilles; his numerous admirers in that city had prepared him an ovation, which he was obliged to decline, his disease, as it is well known, consisting in the most extreme nervous irritability. Arrived at Aix, and weary of the long journey, he resolved to take the rail-road to Paris. He was taken in his carriage to the village of Rognac, through which the rail-road passes from Marseilles to Paris. No sooner had he reached Rognac than the train approached; he saw far off the smoke of the locomotive, and heard the rumbling and screaming of the steam whistle. He grew deadly pale, a violent tremor seized his whole body, he was in a state of the greatest excitement, and under this feverish influence he ordered the postillion to drive back to Aix. There he changed horses, and resolved to go to Paris in his carriage by short stages. The few persons who had the fortune to see the famous maestro, give sad descriptions of his shattered and melancholy appearance.... We read also of a still more curious instance of his nervous terror in Paris. Being invited to go to the Grand Opera, the scene of his triumphs, he refused from pure dread of meeting his own statue, which stands in the vestibule!

Mme. STEFFANONE (or Steffenone, as it has lately become the fashion to spell it,) sailed this week in the Africa, for Europe, intending to lead henceforth a private life in Italy.

Crawford's Statue of Beethoven.

Decidedly the great event in this our corner of the world of Art just now, (at a time, too, when we are otherwise quite rich in artistic novelties), is the arrival of this glorious statue of the great composer, who more than any other has stirred the deepest chords of musical feeling in the hearts of this community. It stands there in the Sculpture gallery of the Athenæum, where it daily draws delighted crowds of reverent admirers. We may truly say that we have never seen any work of Art call forth so much emotion among the bystanders. Eyes grow moist, strangers cannot seem content to be strangers in its presence, and people go from it excited as they go from listening to the Fifth Symphony, the "Leonora" overture, or the Eroica. For ourself, speaking as one whose life has been pretty thoroughly steeped for some years in the music of the master, we want words to express the satisfaction that we feel in CRAWFORD's work. It is the BEETHOVEN of the Symphonies and the Sonatas, whether it follow the best actual portrait or not; it is modelled after the living, personal form and features that glow through all his music (which is his truest life), if it be not a literal likeness of the man as at any given age he walked the street. But it conforms to both; it is at once ideally and literally, physically true, so far as men have now the means of judging. Germany has sanctioned it with joy and pride; and verily the sculptor may feel happy in a rare success, in that, while winning American gratitude by his Washington, he has also touched the Germans in the person of their great man.

The statue is colossal, seven feet in height. The material, the Munich bronze, is beautiful, much lighter than the common bronze, of a rich yellow, almost golden color; and it is well relieved, on a green pedestal, against a background of green, as it was at the Munich festival.

The whole figure is in the highest degree majestic and imposing; it lifts the thoughts upward; it stands aloof from all the trivial fancies, affectations, fashions of the hour, a thousand times more real than them all. There is the stamp of the absolute upon it, allying it with all things great and enduring, and it is worthy to keep company in that room with the "Day and Night", the colossal head of Juno, and the Apollo Belvidere. The composer stands with head erect, earnest, straight-forward look, the body quiet, the face indicative of intense mental action, the hands dropped loosely crossed before him, the left hand grasps the score of the just completed "Choral Symphony," and over it the right hand holds a pen. His dress is plain and historical, the open neck, the coat buttoned, the substantial German boots, &c., all in keeping, and the whole figure enveloped in a large cloak, thrown over the right shoulder, whose folds the sculptor has disposed with admirable grace and largeness of effect, enhanced by the fine hue and texture of the bronze. Upon the music sheets which he holds are inscribed the first notes of the choral strain he introduces in the symphony, with the words from SCHILLER'S Hymn to Joy:

"Joy, bright spark of Deity, daughter of Elysium," &c., &c. And what seems a happy point in the selection, whether the artist so designed it or not, the strain is not here quoted as it is first introduced in the symphony in its most simple form, which is in a sort of reciting four-four rhythm, but as it is reproduced afterwards in a more excited lyrical moment of the composition, where it is caught up as it were and moves on tip-toe in the six-eight rhythm. For it was the happy and the bold design of the artist to represent Beethoven in the fulness of his genius, at the most triumphant height and climax of his artistic striving, when he realized the ideal to which his great faculties and passions had been so devoutly and severely consecrated, and, seizing upon its text in Schiller's ode, he sang of Joy and the embrace of myriads.

It is this that justifies the whole treatment of the subject and explains whatever has been questioned. The face to many appears young, at least for that period of his life. But it is the character, the genius, the ever-living portion of him that is there. It is the ideal Beethoven, made to appear, as all men do who are inspired, of no age. Some say, he does not look savage enough; there is not the absent, wild, dishevelled look, which we see in most of the portraits; the deep lines of suffering and disease, the prematurely aged look, are softened down, and there is more of the air of health and strength than we have been wont to see portrayed. So there is and so there should be; for the portraits naturally have exaggerated his peculiarities, or daguerreotyped and fixed the casual look of single moments. Beethoven was the great sufferer, the rapt and inward seer, the proud, uncompromising foe of life's frivolities and shams; he was deaf and he was harsh at times. But the artist's triumph was his no less than the struggle; his music is all full of both, and every work a victory; love and sweetness were the basis of his nature, and gushed out in spontaneous melodies sweeter than any other man has written, if we except MOZART; and it was fit that he should wear the everlasting young Apollo look of genius. All this the statue has, while in the face and head you recognize all that is vital, all that ever seemed quite real, in all the other busts and portraits. There are the compressed lips, and the deep lines about the mouth; there are the swelling veins about the temples; there is the searching, inward gazing eye, the beetling mass of forehead, delicately intellectual at the same time, with the well pronounced ridge on the corners, which the phrenologists call Tune, and above and behind all the grand cloud of hair, altogether making one of the noblest and most effective subjects for a sculptor. It is one thing to catch him in Punch's or Kladeradatsch's diorama some day, as he saunters in the street, and another thing to see him in the full glorifying sunlight of his own great music.

So has the artist modelled him, and so may we hope literally to see him, when the statue shall be erected in the fitting place for which the liberal first suggester and present owner destines it, in our noble Boston Music Hall. This will be done with all due ceremony in the autumn, marking an era with the opening of our next musical season. The thoughts above expressed, if a correct key to the artist's design, ought, as it seems to us, to settle the yet mooted question as to the precise locality for the statue in the hall. It ought to stand upon the stage, in the middle of the arch that now screens the temporary organ, facing the audience, reared upon a pedestal above and behind all the musicians, so that we shall see it through the grand music to which we shall sit there listening. When a permanent organ, worthy of the place, shall be set up, the statue in the same position may be easily built into its front.

Meanwhile it is a proud day for music-loving Boston to become the possessor and abiding place of such a work of Art; and our thanks are due to Mr. Perkins, to the Sculptor, to the directors of the Royal Bronze Foundry in Munich, which is really an artistic institution, to the founders of the Music Hall, to those who first taught Boston to love Beethoven, and to all who have helped to prepare this triumph. That we do not over-estimate its artistic importance is proved by the elevated enthusiasm shown by German artists and Art-lovers in Munich, upon formally taking leave of it, and affectionately consigning it to their younger brothers in Beethoven of the New World. This is the Beethoven whom Germany accepts and feels; and those into whose soul Beethoven's music has most deeply, truly penetrated, are those who will most deeply feel the truthfulness of Crawford's statue.

A friend has placed in our hands a translation of the programme, and the prologue that was recited at the Munich festival, and with these we may fitly conclude this perhaps too long article. It will be observed that the translation is strictly literal, making no attempt to reproduce either rhyme or rhythm; but the nobility and appositeness of the thoughts, in themselves, make them interesting, even without the music of the verse.

PROLOGUE.

[Written by F. DINGELSTADT. — Spoken by Mlle. DANROUX.]

To, by a death and resurrection Feast
Assembled here, in Art's adorned abode,
GERMANIA greets, of a rare day the witnesses,
Day which beheld her Greatest die and rise again.

Often with heavy heart on the sea-shore I sat
Like a new Niobe, weeping my lost children,
As sons and daughters wandered gladly towards the West,
Like birds that migrate, unrestrainable, exulting to depart.

Thus from the Mother heart her health and blood, like veins,
The German streams, with stolen flow, unceasing drew.
See how the banner, rich in German stars,
Beyond the Atlantic, where the sun sinks, floats.

Sadly I saw them disappear; but one—that one—
Ocean-spanning Colossus, gladly I see go forth
In triumph, bridge-like 'twixt Germany and America thrown.
Give, O Sea! your gentlest dolphin, Arion-like to bear him!

Once more, wonderingly, before he goes, behold him;
Yes, such he was, strong, firm and iron, every tone a man,
On the arched brow the stamp of a strong nature is imprinted;
That brow cloud-freighted, that eye of lightning flash!

Those lips spoke seldom, but their sound was song;
Those ears, all deaf to earth, heard but the music of the spheres;

That heart, like granite rock, enclosed a stream
Of ever-flowing freshness, deep-rushing, dark and dreamy.

Great image of the greatest master, with reverence we inaugurate thee;

Stand as he did, beyond the reach of space or time,
Amid the New World's oaks, and giant streams, thy equals, Pillars of God's great Temple, take thy place!

There, where one nation formed of nations, makes of a continent its State,
Where land unmeasured still grows green and waters gleam;
Where with united heart, strongly into boundless space
A young manhood rises, Phoenix-like, from the ashes of the old:—

There, in the dawn of new arts, the birth of new tongues,
Amid the chaos of new spirits, significant, to stand;
To us a mark of the attained goal, to them who follow after
A beacon, surely guiding, thro' the storm and night and wind.

When a beam of that young sun shines upon thee,
Then Memnon-like sound forth, as in this hall to-day,
Blaze out, thou spark of Deity, bright light, shine forth;
Sound loud the triumph of devoted love, Fidelio!

[The trumpet passage from the second act of "Fidelio" was here introduced.]

Hark! a mightier echo wakes from North and South,
Than your volcano thunders, your Niagara's fall;
And, as when Orpheus played, the beasts attend,
As before Amphion, stones do dance, at such a song.

And do not home-bells ring, and Christmas sounds return,
To million German hearts far scattered o'er the land!
See how they meet, how speechless stand,
Turn'd towards the West each eye, and none without a tear.

Yes, it is he, our Artist-king, who cradled by the Rhine, Died in Vienna find, a life-span since, his cold and darksome grave.

Go, and declare, thou iron shade, tell it beyond the sea,
Truly he is arisen, and among us lifelike stands.

To brothers and to strangers tell, upon that distant shore,
By that same German land, as bond and herald thou art sent,
That Germany which, with priestly fire, and warriors' blood,
And peasants' toil has christened every land.

Though in the council-hall of nations, by the stern decree of Fate,

Torn and dismembered, silent, Germany must stand,
Say, that one thing sustains her, that her Art and Science give

Hope, trust and unity amid her woes.

These, mid the storms of every time and age,
Span with their rainbow arch both sea and lands;
In Cultivation's dawn, on tracks of bloody War,
They come with Culture's light, with palm of Peace.

Rejoice that in our royal house, in the Bavarian land,
A haven they have found, from wear, and storm and time;
'Tis this the Statue tells us, and with grateful hearts,
That Munich gave it us, let all who see, declare.

CONCERTS.

THE LAGRANGE TROUPE left our public with an appetite. The third and last concert in the Music Hall, on Friday evening of last week, showed no abatement of enthusiasm. It was so essentially like the first two, that it offers little to remark upon.—Mme. LAGRANGE was hardly in as clear voice as usual, and labored a little in the beginning of the air from "Lucia": Spargi d'amaro pianto; still she sang it with exquisite grace, and her voice sufficed in the main for rich, large expression, as well as for those fine, delicately gleaming passages in the highest notes in which she never fails of purity. The brilliant waltz, of her own, afforded a new chance for her wonderful display of instrumental vocalization; and we were glad again to hear that wild and pensive Hungarian melody, in which her voice perfectly takes the peculiar and very various color of its sentiment. To us it seems the most individual and charming flower of all her melodies. We were never much interested in mere vocal instrumentation; but in Mme. LAGRANGE it seems a thing of nature and of character, and not mere studied artifice.

In the humorous duet from L'Elisir, and in the trio from Lucrezia and the quartet from Lucia, her voice told admirably, and she was ably seconded by other artists. Sig. MORELLI sang Vi ravviso with his usual quiet and manly artistic grace and completeness. MIRATE sang a romanza by Mercadante, another from Verdi's Louisa Miller, in the same large, robust voice and style, which takes young Boston and young Italy right off its feet, and when recalled again indulged them in the height of ecstasies by repeating his crack piece, the air from Don Sebastian. He surely has a noble voice and sings with energy and great abandon; but is not, as an artist, as a medium of pure musical expression, to be named with MARIO, in spite of our inflammable young friends. It is a very common thing for loud tones in a tenor, especially when accompanied with good looks, to be mistaken for feeling; and the danger of Mirate seems to lie in pure physical overdoing of the thing.

The orchestra, under ARDITI, played a rather learned and classically constructed overture by BORTESINI, and the Freyshütz overture again, remarkably well.

Miss ELISE HENSLE, on her return from Italy, greets her musical friends with the announcement of a concert in the Music Hall next Tuesday evening. She will of course meet with the warmest welcome, and we anticipate a lively pleasure in realizing with our own ears, the good reports of her success in Milan and at her recent debut in New York. We only regret that we also may not hear her in an opera. We give to-day two letters from our correspondents, as well as extracts from the New York papers, showing the good impression made by her debut. From private sources, on which we fully rely, we learn that the papers rather under than overstate her success. Especially are we told that she shows far more dramatic talent than the Times gives her credit for.

MME. LAGRANGE in "NORMA."—A single operatic performance was vouchsafed by these admirable singers on Monday night. The Boston Theatre was quite well filled, although it would be impossible to find two pieces more hacknied than Norma and the last scene of Lucia.

Yet after VERDI, the first strains of even Norma were somewhat refreshing, and not until it came to the long, tedious "middle passage," the Adalgisa sugary duet business, did our patience give out. It was worth while to go, simply to hear Mme. LAGRANGE in Casta Diva. Never before, with the single exception of Mme. GOLDSCHMIDT, have we heard it sung nearly so well. The lofty, remote, spiritual character, which the priestess wore in her impersonation, was quite striking. Her holding out of that exquisitely pure, silvery highest note at the end of the recitative upon the altar, was marvellous. In the slow movement of Casta Diva, which she sang mostly in a subdued, supplicatory, and religious tone, there was rare perfection of phrasing, and a really spiritual fineness of expression: and the rapturous quick movement following was given with a dazzling brilliancy of execution which no one before has equalled. Dramatically, altogether her Norma was a very high performance; but when it came to the denunciation of Pollio, we were fully confirmed in our old feeling that it was best to let Norma end with GRISI. What Grisi did not do—sing the only great music in the opera—Lagrange did, and wonderfully well.

Pollio is an ungracious part, and MIRATE's large voice, so far as we heard, did not redeem its dullness. MORELLI was a fine Oroveso; and Mme. SIEDENBURG a sweet but feeble Adalgisa.—We did not witness Mirate's death-scene of Edgardo, for which he of course reserved his best strength, but learn that it fulfilled every expectation.

Music Abroad.

Germany.

LEIPZIG.—Our Gewandhaus concerts are over; the quartet soirées are at an end; and the Stadt Theatre is to be closed on the 1st of June for three months. The closing of the theatre is a fact hitherto unprecedented, and creates no little sensation. Not only the artists, whose salary will be suspended, but the public are evidently discontented. Of late we have had no lack of operas, and even Tannhäuser has been given twice, to the no small satisfaction of the Wagnerians. But the performance was not very successful, partly owing to the Tannhäuser (Herr Eppe) and the Elizabeth (Mlle. Uhrlaub)—both from Hamburg, and both very bad—and partly from want of rehearsals.

Herr Mitterwürtzer, from Dresden, has been performing here with success, and was greatly admired as Hans Heiling, in Marchner's opera of that name. Mlle. Tiejens, from Vienna, has appeared in Oberon, Die Hugenotten, and other operas. She is a great favorite. Herr Beck, from Vienna, has also been very successful in Kreutzer's opera, Das Nachtlager in Granada, which has drawn crowded houses. He is the best barytone in Germany. The new opera, Der Erbe von Hohenegh, music by Hauser, was produced on the 18th inst. to a full house in aid of the "Theatre Pensions-Fonds." The libretto, by Herr Emile Devrient, contains nothing interesting.

On Thursday, the 17th inst., Liszt came here and conducted his new mass, at the Catholic Church, for four men's voices, with organ accompaniment. I am happy to be able to inform you that Robert Schumann is in a fair way of recovery from his long and severe illness. The last accounts we heard of him were that he has again begun to read and write, and play the piano. He is very fond of playing duets with friends. His memory does not seem impaired by sickness, and strong hopes are now entertained of his speedy restoration to health.—Corr. London Mus. World.

COLOGNE.—The Männergesangsverein gave their last concert of the season on the 15th April. The whole of the first part was occupied by Rinaldo, a cantata for solo, quartet, chorus, and orchestra, composed by Herr Max Bruch, a pupil of Ferdinand Hiller, and who for the last three years has held the Mozart Scholarship in Frankfurt. This was performed for the first time; and in the absence of an orchestra, the accompaniment, arranged for two pianofortes was played by the composer and Herr Breunung. Rinaldo is a composition of considerable freshness. It would be well if the society would study a few more such compositions, instead of overwhelming us with Sündchen and Volkslieder. The second part was made up entirely of such inspirations, excepting a violin solo, by Herr M. Pixis (Variations of Vieuxtemps) and Mendelssohn's Liebe und Wein, compared to which all the others were as "water to wine." The thirty seceders, with the addition of some others, have formed a new Society (Sängerbund), under the direction of Herr Küpper.

At the last soirée for chamber-music, besides Mendelssohn's quintet in B flat, and Beethoven's quartet in E flat, Op. 74, a trio for violin, pianoforte, and violoncello, by W. Niels Gade, Op. 29, was introduced. It is entitled Novelletten, and consists of five distinct pieces, good enough to atone for the affectation of the title. Hiller played a sonata of his own—a masterly composition. Carl Reinthaler's oratorio, Jephthah und seine Tochter (MS.), was performed for the first time complete in Elberfeld, under the direction of the composer, on the 6th April. Herr Reinthaler is the son of a Protestant clergyman, and was himself intended for the ministry, but Heaven seems to have willed that he shall edify the people by his music rather than by his preaching. The oratorio contains many beauties, the choruses especially: the whole is cleverly instrumented. The composer conducted with energy, and at the conclusion, amid the plaudits of the audience, the blowing of trumpets and the beating of drums, was crowned by "fair hands."—Corr. Lon. Mus. World.

NEW COURSE OF HARMONY, BY L. H. SOUTHARD.

The Publishers call the attention of the musical profession to this work, as one eminently calculated to lighten the labors of the teacher, and rapidly advance the pupil. It is emphatically a PRACTICAL work, serving both as a Manual of instruction on the one hand, and a Text-book on the other; and it is believed that the peculiar arrangement of the work, together with the very large number of exercises and examples, presents great advantages, to both scholar and teacher, over any similar work of the kind. Teachers highly commend the work. Mr. WILLIAM MASON says it is a work unsurpassed in the language. Mr. GEORGE J. WESS says that it is a work perspicuous in diction, methodical in arrangement, and sufficiently copious to embrace all the essentials of the general doctrine of accord. It can be ordered through any respectable Music-seller, and will be sent through the mail on the receipt of the price, ($1.75), postage prepaid.

Beethoven's Symphonies.

BY "A FRIEND OF ART."

From the German.

[Concluded from last week.]

The Seventh and Eighth Symphonies (in A major, and in F major, ninety-second and ninety-third works) give expression in tones alike to one idea, the idea of the fullest sensuous and spiritual enjoyment of existence; they are different variations of this one theme. In both symphonies alike the expression of this idea rises toward the close to the highest possible vivacity, to the greatest sensuous excitement, to the boldest extravagance, to the maddest jubilee. The tone images in both works attain to the highest sensuous reality, and these creations say what they will in tones in the most distinct and penetrating manner; with them therefore a poetic commentary were especially superfluous. Here BEETHOVEN reaches the highest individuality and definiteness in his tone-forms, and from this point of view THEODORE UELIG is right, when he sees in these works the centre of gravity of the Beethoven instrumental music. As it regards the A major symphony in the first place, we might prefix to it as a motto the words of Luther:

Who loves not woman, wine and song,
Remains a fool his whole life long.

The First Movement begins in sustained tones; the soul is filled first with a silent, suppressed joy, but soon it begins to tremble with gladness, it can no longer conceal that with which it is so full; and now it openly announces its secret with ever increasing fullness of expression to the end of the movement. How dramatically that so-called organ point a little before the close portrays the deeply suppressed feeling of joy pressing toward tumultuous outbreak, just as it rids itself of narrowing limits and pours along in roaring streams! In the Second Movement the soul, after this full outpouring, is again moved by tranquil joyfulness; but this joyful mood wears in the first theme in A minor a, so to say, sweet-sour character; it seems as if a slight sadness trembled through it, but only to sweeten the sweet charm of joy still more, as the wound made by Cupid's arrow is a sweet one, and the rose is not without thorns. But this gentle sorrow expressed in an ever more enchanting tone-coloring, is presently sweetened by the lovely theme in A major which is joined to it. At the close of the movement it comes forward again and keeps the upper hand, but sad as its presence seems, for the very reason that it pours itself so fully out,—I might almost say weeps itself out,—its power is broken, so that it softly dies out at the close. But how unsatisfactorily words describe this infinite magic of tones!

In the Third Movement again the liveliest cheerfulness rises (in the magical middle subject in D major) in the plenitude of bliss, floating as it were upon the waves of ecstasy, to the expression of a certain solemnity, thence to resign itself anew to the most unrestrained career.

But in the Fourth Movement the joyful soul celebrates its Bacchus feast; here the emotion rises to the most unlimited jubilation, here all the nerves are strained up to the highest pitch, a "jubilant kiss seals the embrace." It is this work, kept throughout in dance rhythm, which RICHARD WAGNER strikingly calls "the very apotheosis of the dance, of the movement of love ideally embodied in tones."

In the same feeling and spirit is the Eighth Symphony composed. There breathes in it the same cheerfulness, raised to a pitch bordering on excess. But it gives in smaller form rather a miniature of serene soul's life; it is more a naïve, child-like joy, too, which pervades the whole; a Haydn-like spirit breathes in this work. This and the small form, in which the symphony moves, have misled many into supposing it an earlier production of Beethoven; but there cannot be a greater error. Any one who has become deeply acquainted with Beethoven, and who compares the first quite Haydn-like symphony of Beethoven with this, his eighth, cannot help feeling the infinite difference between them. Outwardly, indeed, the eighth symphony is not more comprehensive than the first; but to apply a mere space measure to the highest spiritual products, is to be guilty of the grossest error and betrays the most trivial and unartistic standpoint. But the inward relationship of these two works is at the same time an outward one. The form of the first symphony is the Haydn form; that of the eighth symphony is the genuine Beethoven, such as the master created in the Eroica. And then the striking originality of the tone-pictures in this eighth symphony, this bold, self-conscious humoristic life, this bubbling overflow of animal spirits,—what a contrast to the above described contents of the first symphony! That is the pure Haydn spirit, married with the manly spirit of Beethoven, a mediated product, an intellectual re-birth. But the eighth symphony is in truth a product of the ripe, developed Beethoven. A naïve, humoristic joy pervades, as we have said, the whole and unfolds itself in the finest nuances and shadings. If in the first movement this character is depicted more in general, the two middle movements give us two particular sides of it; but in the last movement comes the highest climax, giving scope to the maddest humor, to the most jovial mood, such as was never before produced in tones.

Beethoven must have been in the most joyful state, inwardly reconciled with himself, when he conceived these two creations. But, as has already been remarked, this paradise did not suffice for him; he soon aspired after a higher, and he created the Ninth Symphony.

About no work of Beethoven, perhaps about no work of Art, have views and opinions been so different, as about the ninth symphony; indeed no creation of Art has had to battle so hard ere it gained admittance, as this grandest work of absolute music. Twenty years ago the work was considered deranged, a mere aberration of Beethoven; ten years ago it was only half deranged, while in recent times the understanding of the same has broken a continually deeper path for itself, and the work with the cultivated musical public has acquired a certain popularity. What formerly seemed a confused conglomeration of musical eccentricities, is now recognized as a necessary expression of a sublime idea of feeling. The union of words with tones, which formerly in such a work of pure instrumental music passed for an arbitrary whim, a something abnormal, an extravaganza, is now recognized as an artistic necessity. This change, this better understanding or feeling of its meaning, is due partly to repeated performances of this difficult work; partly to deeper penetration into the innermost nature of Art and of Beethoven in particular; partly in fine to excellent commentaries on the work, such especially as FRANZ BRENDL has given in his History of Music, and RICHARD WAGNER in his "Programme" to the Ninth Symphony. Henceforth is recognized, as the idea pervading the entire work, the victory-crowned striving of the soul after the highest JOY. To show how Beethoven lends expression to this sublime idea, and develops it organically, we will once more follow Richard Wagner.

In the First Movement we see, conceived in the sublimest sense, the conflict of the soul striving after joy against the pressure of that hostile power, which rears itself between us and earthly happiness; only in isolated gleams of light do we catch the sad sweet smile of bliss; the demon of joylessness encompasses us again and again, and it is in vain that we contend against him. We exclaim with Faust: Entbehren sollst du, sollst entbehren; Thou must renounce! (See Journal of Music, Vol. II, p. 137). In the Second Movement a wild delight seizes us, hurrying us on in the pursuit of a new, unknown bliss even to giddiness, to reeling ecstasy, until in the middle period a scene of earthly pleasure and of satisfied contentment opens; but to such narrowly limited cheerfulness we are little disposed, we plunge anew into that wild intoxication. In the Third Movement, on the contrary, the soul seems filled with sweet remembrance of a purest bliss enjoyed in early life. This is the first theme. This remembrance awakens in the second theme the tender longing of love. That hope-promising first theme answers again, then the second theme likewise returns, and now it seems to us, as if love and hope had inwardly joined hands as if to reconquer their soft sway over the tormented spirit. The bleeding heart seems healed and to be manning itself to courageous aspiration. But with the beginning of the Fourth Movement the soul falls back again into that joyless night, until the instruments give out a simple song theme, which swells up to a mighty climax, and finally a man's voice, after the instruments have been again hurled back into the conflict, sings:

"Ye friends, not these tones! But let us attune a sweeter and more joyful strain."

And now light shines amid the chaos. A chorus of human voices chants the lofty song of Joy: "Joy, bright spark of Deity," &c. Then in the high enthusiasm of joy bursts forth the utterance of universal love of Man: "Embrace, ye millions." This is the purest Joy, the highest. Now leaps from the breast anew the shout of Joy! Joy! Jubilant, in this fulness of emotion, we clasp the whole world to our breast!

Such is the idea of the Ninth Symphony. Considered from this side, as the representation of this idea, it is perhaps the sublimest work of Art of all times. On the other hand it makes an epoch in the history of Music, by the fact that in it the Word of the poet is married to pure instrumental Music. But this introduction of the word is not to be regarded as an exceptional extravaganza, as an arbitrary whim of Beethoven; for the word struggles out as a necessary result from pure tone, is the organic offspring of the tone. Beethoven, who in his symphonies shows a striving after more and more distinct individual expression, who in every one of these works presents an actual poetic subject-matter, and who therefore is before all the true tone-poet, arrives in the ninth symphony at a point, where mere tones no longer suffice for what he wants to say; hence he must call in the Word as a more definite expression of his thought.

Beethoven, the most absolute musician, arrives at the verge and limit of pure instrumental music; he removes the boundary. Hence with the Ninth Symphony, viewed in the light of principles, the last symphony was written, and at the same time the actual organic marriage of Music with the Art of Poetry prepared. And from this point of view must the progressive development of music since Beethoven be regarded.

Whitsuntide Music on the Rhine.

CHORLEY, of the London Athenæum, true to his old love of Germany and German music, has been over to the Düsseldorf Festival, and written to his paper the following vivid description and criticism thereof. We must allow for his strong English prejudices in what he says of SCHUMANN'S "Paradise and the Peri,"—a work by the way which MENDELSSOHN, the English music-lovers' oracle, was the first to introduce to the musical world in Germany. On the other hand Chorley seems to have "conquered his prejudices" with regard to JENNY LIND GOLDSCHMIDT, whom he formerly liked not too well; his very exalted estimation of her singing now, therefore, is a fact of some significance, and goes far to offset the thousand and one newspaper reports about the decline of the vocal powers of the world's truest and greatest Queen of Song.

The thirty-third annual music-meeting held during Whit-week at one or other of the towns on the Lower Rhine—one of the most important gatherings of its class in Germany—took place this year, as the readers of the Athenæum have been duly apprized, at Düsseldorf, under conditions of more than ordinary interest. It is universally owned to be the most brilliant Festival which has taken place since that great musical summer of 1846, which included the Musik-Fest at Aix-la-Chapelle,—the Jesuit Festival at Liège, for which Mendelssohn's "Lauda Sion" was written,—the assemblage of upwards of three thousand part-singers at Cologne,—and the production of "Elijah" at Birmingham. It seems only yesterday since we were partaking of these excitements and pleasures: yet what a whirlwind of change and destruction has passed over Art in Germany during that interval of thrice three years! This Düsseldorf Festival would have been well worth a visit, whether it be regarded as illustrating the amount of what has been lost, and what is retained, in the Lower Rhine-land; or considered merely as testing the present state of that strange thing, German opinion. Apart from all philosophies and comparisons, however, it has been a noticeable meeting.

Our English privilege of beginning every matter in debate with a prelude concerning the weather does not come in amiss this Whitsuntide—since the sudden outburst of summer in all its glory, after so long-drawn and dark a winter, has given the whole district the festive aspect of a garden freshly decked and garlanded for some joyous purpose. Never were seen herbage of such an intense and tender green—such floods of golden flowers on the fields—never such piles and coronals of blossoms on every fruit-tree (making a delicious harmony with the red-tiled roofs of the homesteads, and the quaint towers of the old churches)—as those we swept past while taking the line from Aix-la-Chapelle to Ober-Cassel. This holiday clothing, too, was at its brightest in and about Düsseldorf. Every one knows the charming gardens which belong to that town, and it was fortunate that the lilacs and the chestnut bloom should have "kept back" till Whitsuntide. The hall where the musical performances are held—one of those picturesque temporary wooden rooms, the secret of erecting and decorating which belongs to Germany—was pitched in a garden, and betwixt fit and fit of the long and laborious rehearsals, and part and part of the concerts, it was pretty to see the cheerful and cordial audience streaming out under the covering of those lovely fresh leaves; and pleasant to know that one could loiter without among objects so refreshing to weary spirits, yet still hardly lose a note of Madame Goldschmidt's singing voice, and hardly a piano of the most elaborate chorus. There is much, after all, in scenery,—as the respective impressions produced by sacred music, when it is heard in a cathedral and in a town hall, will prove to the least imaginative; and it must be allowed that a garden in the Lower Rhine-land (due festival weather granted) puts heart and mind into better tune for music than the streets of our provincial towns, streaming with their factory population.

The material for such a meeting—orchestra and chorus numbering eight hundred, and twenty-six executants—has been, on the whole, excellent. The voices, particularly the female ones, have been more tunable than those which are sometimes to be heard in Germany on like occasions. The stringed Quartet in the orchestra has been admirable, animated to no ordinary point by that king of orchestral violinists, Herr David. The wind instruments were less satisfactory. All were tested to the utmost in some of the works selected for performance. All stood the test capitally. The first evening's concert was made up of a Symphony by Herr Hiller, the conductor of the Festival, with the motto, "Es muss doch Frühling werden,"—on the whole, perhaps, the best work of its composer, and the best German Symphony of a later date than Mendelssohn's. The ideas in three of the movements are good and well contrasted, the structure is excellent (some lengthiness forgiven,) and there are many charming details, which fill up the outline without obtrusiveness. It was noticeable that the Andante, which is the most vague and tormented of the four movements, seemed to be most relished, especially among the young professors and practitioners who thronged to the rehearsal. After the Symphony, Haydn's "Creation" was performed excellently. Somehow they make more of this work in Germany, and less of Handel's Oratorios, than we do in England; and (sad to say,) in spite of the sarcastic pity of the "men of the future," old Haydn's picture music was rapturously received,—in part, because, after all, it is music, and not mystical noise,—in part, owing to the wondrous singing of Madame Goldschmidt. Wondrous this was, and of a perfection which I do not think she ever reached in England. If her voice suffered from her American tour, it has entirely recovered its brilliancy and lustre,—and the style seems to have gained (as must be the case with every true artist) in warmth and dignity. Praise, too, is well deserved by the tenor, Herr Schneider of Leipzig, who was mentioned in the Athenæum three years ago as a tenor of promise, and who possesses what so many German tenors want—charm and suavity of tone, without any bad habits of delivery. After the tasteless bawling one is used to hear, which "sets up" for heartiness and energy, unaffected refinement, in but a modest quantity, is a welcome rarity. Herr Schneider ought to make a good career, if he remains unvisited by the ambition which killed the frog in the fable, and which has destroyed so many a singer.

"So far, so good." The second concert, which contained the "peculiarity" of this Whitsuntide Festival, was full of matter for strange comparison—if not for sad thought. The programme consisted of Mendelssohn's "Meerestille" Overture, Dr. Schumann's Cantata, "Paradise and the Peri," and Beethoven's C minor Symphony. To those who think as we do in England, and who are not used first to set up idols and then to pull them down, the juxtaposition of the two first-named compositions suggested the abyss into which German taste has made haste to plunge since Mendelssohn's death, by accepting Dr. Schumann as his successor and (say the "men of the period") his superior. Never before did I feel so strongly how great was one composer—how very small the other; never did I seem so intimately to touch, taste and handle the bitter and faded fruits which spring from disorder sown by a rebellious spirit that asserts progress and destruction to be one. There were good reasons, it is true, why this Cantata should be elected. Dr. Schumann having been long a resident at Düsseldorf, there are reasons why his works should not be sought out with censure too well known to all kindly and considerate musicians here to call for recapitulation:—but if Art is to continue to exist, Truth in Art must be vindicated,—and the truth must be told, that to select such a work on the occasion of a great German festival is to own to Europe that Germany has no more great men, and that any one who pretends to their "purple and gold" will find subjects (whether sycophant or sincere, who shall determine?) willing to swear that he is greater than any Greatness who has preceded him!

Years ago a brief analysis of this Eastern Cantata was offered in your journal; when its monotony and triviality were pointed out, and the pompous nothingness which a man poor in ideas could assume, in the hopes of appearing deep, simple, and sentimental. On hearing the composition capably executed (and the principal part fought for by Madame Goldschmidt with a valiancy and power which did her honor)—the meagreness—the absence of true expression—the want of artistic simplicity in grasping the subject and distributing its component parts—made themselves more felt, even, than on perusal.—"It is much more amusing" (said one capable to judge) upon the pianoforte than here,"—and piteous was it to think of the time and the good-will which had been wasted in dragging through a work which did not really please (as was evident from the tepid applause bestowed on it), and which cannot last, unless ennui is to be mistaken for thought,—threadbare phrase for the utterance of emotion, and want of color for ideality in description. The final bravura of the Peri,—fierce and uncouth enough to padlock 'Heaven's gate' against such a shrieking and pedantic person forever and ever—the frivolous dance of the Bayaderes round about "Allah's throne," (like one of M. Adolphe Adam's two opera tunes worked canon-wise)—the dismal weariness of the scene of the Pestilence—and the irrational manner in which the singers have to pass from narration to personation, and vice versa,—sounded ten times more fierce, frivolous, dismal, and irrational, when they were heard, than when they were read. And yet the amateur,—who is rococo enough to demand only melody, only variety, only propriety, only interest,—is told by "young Germany" that this Cantata is a work written before its composer had wholly shaken off the trammels,—in fact, "quite old music," as compared with the music of the hour and the music of to-morrow.—There is no pleasure in saying these things—as there is no comfort in controversy or dignity in disagreement;—but even the stranger's smallest word may help,—if it only induces one student to pause and consider what made his forefathers great;—and Europe owes too much to the giants of Germany, to see one of music's provinces handed over to dwarfs and deformed rulers, without a pretty strong protocol-work of protest.

The Artist's Concert, held on the third evening, offered among its noticeable features, new to a Londoner, Herr Gade's Overture, 'Im Hochland,' and a clever but incoherent violin Concerto, by Herr Rietz, who like Dr. Schumann, belonged to Düsseldorf "once upon a time." This was admirably given by Herr David. Lastly, the ovations to Madame Goldschmidt (who has sung, I believe, gratuitously) were such as to claim mention in the record of the meeting. After her first aria, Deh, rienti, from 'Figaro,' a positive feu de joie of bouquets was discharged against her by the Ladies of the chorus, with the customary flourish of trumpets used in German orchestras for the greeting of favorite artists. After her second aria (a cavatina from Beatrice di Tenda, which, indeed, she executed magnificently), a young lady pressed forward from the ranks of the amateur choristers, and crowned her with a wreath; and while Madame Goldschmidt shrank away from this, the ceiling opened, and a rain of flowers fell around her. After her third aria came another shower of small ribbons, imprinted with the legend that Heaven had sent an angel to sing at the Thirty-third Lower-Rhine Festival. We must not measure our cousin-Germans' fancy for honoring the honorable by our own colder modes of procedure; but such ecstatic compliments could but be painfully oppressive, to their victim:—and so, indeed, she appeared to feel them. How could it be forgotten by some of those who saw the rapture and heard the riot,— that after having also seen Mendelssohn crowned at Brunswick, in years gone by,—and on another summer night the whole city of Cologne turned out to honor him with a torch-procession, and to present him with the freedom of the town—one has lived to hear him spoken of by many as a well-trained musician,—industrious enough, but without poetry or philosophy in his compositions. "These violent delights have violent ends"; and those who have seen the fickleness once, thenceforward mistrust the fervor. But the shower of roses and ribbons suggested something pleasanter than the thought of past triumphs followed by contempt. Was it not also an evidence that the lovely art of singing, as a branch of musical execution, and in some sort a partaker of the Creator's inspirations, can still hold its thousands thrall!

Such have been a few of the features of this animated and successful music-meeting on the Rhine. On the opportunities of meeting old friends and making new ones, and of hearing all that is to be—as well as much that should not be—in German music which the Congress had afforded, it is needless to dwell.—The next year's Whitsuntide music on the Rhine will be held, it is purposed, at Cologne.

Rossini in Paris.

A correspondent of the Moniteur writes:—"Rossini has arrived in Paris. This is the happiest and most important musical event of the week. To this excellent piece of news I can add another, which is still better and equally certain—there is every hope that the health of the sovereign maestro will be completely restored.

"Che sovra gli altri come aquila vola."

"All that science can do to preserve such a valued life for many long days will of course be done. His ordinary physician has already had several consultations with some of the most distinguished members of the faculty in Paris. If all who owe to the immortal author of 'William Tell,' 'Moses,' and the 'Barber,' hours of ineffable beatitude, of exquisite enjoyment, were to leave their names at Rossini's door, we should see an immense procession from sunrise to sunset for days without number. Many private friends of the master, however desirous they were to contemplate those fine and intelligent features which age and suffering have changed but very little, contented themselves with leaving their cards and good wishes at the threshold of his august abode, and abstained from feelings of delicacy from any attempt to disturb the privacy of the first days of his installation in Paris. Others, either less timid or more intimate, could not resist the desire to press to their hearts the old friend so long absent, and who had been represented by correspondence as much more seriously ill than he really was. Those who succeeded in penetrating the sanctuary were delighted when they saw the great man who had been reported to be so broken down. Although he has greatly suffered in various ways, they found his mind as sparkling, his temper as good, and his conversation as charming as ever. In answer to questions about his health, he complains of a little weakness and an absolute want of sleep. His malady seems to be purely nervous. But, notwithstanding his illness, he has resumed his favorite promenades upon the Boulevards, where he may be seen strolling as of old, with his hands in the pockets of his long frock coat, while he curiously observes the many transformations that have taken place during his absence. When any one talks to him of music and the recent success of his Mathilde de Shabran, he looks at his questioner with an air of astonishment so well assumed as to appear naïf; and, bowing his head replies with almost imperceptible irony, 'People are really too good to trouble themselves about my old things. All that music is rococo. It has quite gone by.' The other day some one was vaunting the wonders of magnetism, and proposed that he should consult a somnambulist. 'Ah,' said Rossini gaily, 'she would ask for a lock of my hair; I have but five hairs left, and each of them has a name. I am bald enough as it is.' He came to Paris by short journeys. Rossini likes to see the country he passes through; to breathe the air at leisure, to sleep at night, and, in short, to take the longest way about, like the good La Fontaine. As to those modern means of communication which shoot men and luggage, as from a cannon's mouth, a hundred leagues before a man has time to enquire the way, without having either that fear or dislike of it which has been pretended, he does not see why one who has no occasion to hurry should adopt this mode of travelling. He says capital things about the inconveniences as well as the advantages of progress. During this long journey, which took more time than Torquato Tasso and Benvenuto Cellini would have done to perform the same distance sword in hand, Madame Rossini watched over her partner with a pious and maternal solicitude. * * *

"It is said that the management of the opera will celebrate Rossini's return to Paris with all the éclat due from a principal theatre supported by a state subvention. There is a talk of bringing out Moïse on a grand scale; William Tell and Count Ory will also, we believe, be played. This homage to Rossini will be at once an honor to the Opera, a great joy for the friends of Art, and a solemn reparation for the inconceivable neglect of the great works of the master of masters, of which we were at one time guilty.

From the New York Tribune.

The Grand Pic-Nic of the German Musical Societies.

The fourth day of the great Festival began cloudy, but at nine o'clock, just at the time of the meeting of the great bulk of the singers at Washington Hall, the heavy clouds dispersed and a fine sunny day favored the grand excursion.—The Singing Societies, Turners, and military Companies formed in procession and marched through the Bowery, Chatham-street and Broadway to the foot of Canal-street. The procession was an imposing spectacle on account of its numbers, the brilliancy of the emblems and the entire arrangement of their proceedings. In front marched the Carabine Rangers, Capt. Bechtel, and the New York Riflemen, Company 1, Capt. Johnson; then came a body of Turners in rank and file, then the vocal Societies with their gay banners and standards; another body of Turners, the New York Hussars, Capt. Beiser, and the Washington Artillery, Capt. Schnorr, bringing up the rear, in this way taking the Singing Societies in their midst. The streets through which they passed were thronged by people, and thousands of men, women and children visited Elm Park during the day. There is no exaggeration in estimating the vast multitude at forty thousand, who, from 8 o'clock until evening flowed to the beautiful spot selected for the great Festival. The grove was thronged. The procession numbered about three thousand persons, and proceeded in several steamers to Stryker's Bay and thence to Elm Park.

In the Park the various scenes of this "Wald-fest" (Festival in the Woods) were piquant in the extreme. They were new and astonishing to many native Americans who were present, who never witnessed the assemblage of such an immense multitude of persons conducting themselves with the most perfect decorum. The occasion was full of sweet reminiscences of the happy days of the truly beloved Vaterland. Every society and company had their banners suspended in a certain place, and numerous friends gathered round them. There were forty or fifty of these headquarters. At each the parties enjoyed themselves in singing, in drinking, and in dancing to the music of five of the finest bands of music, and in filling the air with their hurrahs. Suddenly the scene changed, the rattling of drums called together the members of the Turnerbund, and they marched through the thronged multitude amid enthusiastic applause. They appeared in the full vigor of health, youth and beauty.—Crowds gathered here and there to listen to some orator who appealed to the old German love of liberty, and therefore to the love of their new Vaterland, the headquarters of the future liberation of the world. Then the mighty harmony of a great chorus swelled through the woods, and remind the listeners of the romantic banks of the Rhine and Neckar, with their old castles, their merry vineyards and rich cities. Then followed the drinking round (Bundtrinken) from enormous Birkenheimers or trinkborns, or giant silver cups, of which we saw one specimen holding about four bottles of wine, belonging to the Teutonia Gesangverein of New York, with the device:

Wer nicht liebt Wein, Wein und Gesang,
Der bleibt ein Narr sein Leben lang.
(Who does not love wine, wine and song, Will be a fool his life-time long.)

and embellished by the haut relief figures of love, liberty and song.

Here met old friends, brought together by this Festival from the most distant parts of their new Vaterland, and remembering old times both here and on the other side of the Atlantic, happy and sad days, revolution, barricades, prison and banishment. Then in another place the strong old German choral music or fugue could be heard, of which the old Lutheran warrior song of the thirty years' war: "Eine feste Burg ist unser Gott" (a fast stronghold in our Lord,) was the first and fundamental specimen. Those who have witnessed these Festivals in Germany must confess that this German national characteristic is gaining a hold upon the new world, and that German song will by and by be a characteristic not only of the German population but of the whole people of the United States.

It would be impossible to give a full and true picture of the whole affair with all its freedom connected with the utmost order and harmony. There was the vast crowded multitude and single couples and parties in the more remote places of this large Park. Here the loud echoing of a thousand voices, there the still happiness of family circles with wife and children and the stiller tones of tender lovers. And above all these manifold scenes were visible the mind shadows of gentle trees and the rosy clouds of the sinking day. Certainly the German people found here a home, an Heimath! This grand Festival was certainly the most brilliant of all Festivals of this kind held in this country.

At about 4 o'clock several speeches were made from the steps of the Villa of the Park, but the crowd prevented one understanding anything that was said. It was said that the Mayor made a speech and expressed himself much pleased with the order and good behavior of his German fellow-citizens, to whose services he had ordered a force of two hundred and fifty policemen as a guard against native and adopted rowdies and pickpockets.

At 5 o'clock, cannon-shots and the roll of the drums announced the hour of again forming in procession to proceed homeward. Soon they marched in the same order as they came, through the alleys of the Park down to Stryker's Bay, accompanied by the thousands of their friends. Several overloaded steamers were required to transfer them to the City.

The memory of this Festival will undoubtedly linger a long time in the minds of all who witnessed its proceedings, giving the love of the liberal arts a new vigor among the Germans.

Musical Correspondence.

From NEW YORK.

JUNE 26.—In regard to the quantity of music afforded us Gothamites at present there is surely no reason for complaint. The Academy opened its doors last week for a few more nights with Mme. LAGRANGE, Messrs. MORELLI and MIRATE. These artists have sung in Norma and I Puritani, and were to have given Don Giovanni last evening, had not the indisposition of Morelli and Mme. FERRARI, a debutante in America, compelled the postponement of MOZART to Wednesday evening. It is late in the season, and amid the musical surfeit of the hour they have failed to draw as numerous audiences as they deserved. I hope Don Giovanni will better reward their labors, and it is rumored that the management have not yet abandoned the idea of getting out Les Huguenots, that exhauster of MEYERBEER'S originality.

The German troupe,—mainly the same which you heard in Der Freyschütz at Niblo's some weeks since,—have taken possession of Wallack's cozy little theatre; but in spite of the zealous efforts and really good leading of their director, Mr. ROBERT STOEPEL (a brother-in-law of WILLIAM VINCENT WALLACE, and recently of the Princess' Theatre, London) Die Regimentstochter has twice attracted but a few listeners. To-night we were promised the Czar und Zimmermann, but for some unannounced reason a German vaudeville has been substituted. Rehearsals of Fidelio have commenced with Mlle. LEHMANN, Mme. D'ORMY having wisely concluded to confine herself to rôles depending less upon artistic singing. She is a very acceptable Marie, the vivandière, but Fidelio should have another representative.

But the musical event of the week is the gathering of the German Saengerbund, Maennerchor, Liedertafel, Saengerrunde, Orpheus, Liederkranz, etc., (there are as many names as societies for one and the same thing) to their general Saenger-Fest. On Saturday they poured in upon us, and visited our main streets with their torchlight procession. On Sunday they gathered at their head-quarters, the Washington Hotel, and there marshalled under the American stars and stripes and the German revolutionary tri-color, they rehearsed, exchanged greetings and consumed a sufficient number of barrels of Lager-bier, to reconcile the brewers to the Maine Law for one month at least. Yesterday, with flying banners and military, (for detailed accounts of which see the dailies) they took possession of the Metropolitan theatre, and the "Generalprobe" gave promise of an acceptable evening's entertainment. CARL BERGMANN had been selected as "Fest-Director," and this appointment will satisfy you that all that a conductor can do was done. For the last few weeks this most modest and able leader has been most indefatigable in his preparations, and numerous rehearsals of the large orchestra and the New York societies have not been without their effect. The Festival-Concert was on Monday evening.

Carl Bergmann is ambitious to bring before an American public, works to which they have not hitherto listened and which represent the modern phase of music abroad. WAGNER'S overture to Cola di Rienzi, and the Reception March from Lohengrin were therefore the instrumental pieces selected. The Rienzi overture is one of the musical reformer's earlier efforts, produced at a time when Meyerbeer was his attraction, and of course can be considered in no sense as "music of the future." My position unfortunately was directly in front of the brass instruments, consisting of four horns, four trumpets, four trombones and two ophicleides, supported by an immense drum; and these instruments in a Wagner overture are not left to rust, you well know. Of course I could not judge of the Rienzi or the Lohengrin; but I heard enough during the occasional suspensions of brass, to convince me that the Rienzi overture contains some choice bits of melody,—actually "absolute" melody.

The first vocal piece of the concert was a "Liederspiel," or species of vocal Cantata, by JULIUS OTTO, entitled Im Walde, consisting of soli and choruses. This was a very pretentious composition, written with orchestral introductions, interludes, and descriptive passages. Some pretty common-place bits, generally remembrances of others, were heard from time to time, the most effective of which was a serenade for tenor solo and chorus; but the whole composition was meaningless and foolish; the several numbers being connected together with orchestral passages, which reminded me strongly of the interludes of some of our country organists, having nothing more to do with the pieces themselves than the interludes referred to have. However, Im Walde pleased the audience much better than the Chorus of the Priests from Mozart's "Magic Flute," excellently given later in the evening. Among the other selections of the evening were Winterlied chorus, very trivially composed by V. E. BECKER, and lifelessly sung by the Baltimore societies; the "World's Prayer" chorals, by ZOELLNER, very effectively performed by the Philadelphia societies; KUECKEN'S "Warrior's Song before battle," the best singing of the evening; for Mr. Bergmann had carefully trained the New York Societies; FRISCHER'S Kriegerace chorus, which closed the programme, and which I did not hear; and the finale of the second act of William Tell. This was by far the most effective performance of the evening, notwithstanding the weakness of the accompanying terzett. The full bursts of the large chorus, now instantly mounting from pianissimo to fortissimo sforzando, were magnificent indeed. How little do our opera managers appreciate the effects that may be produced by a powerful and efficient chorus!

The next festival is appointed for Philadelphia, in 1857. To-day Elm Park (82d st.) is alive with the Turners' Pic-nic, which closes the social amusements of the week, and at which it is safe to predict, a considerable quantity of lager-bier will find a sympathetic receptacle. G.

From WASHINGTON, D. C.

JUNE 23.—You see by the enclosed circular that we have in embryo at Washington a Musical Journal to be called the National Monthly Musical Magazine. I have seen the proof of the first number. It will be chiefly a publication of lighter music—waltzes, opera airs, etc.—in a suitable size for binding. The reading matter will be secondary. It has as vignette a beautiful engraving of the National Monument that is to be, if the K. N.s who now have the matter in hand don't surround it with a platform and leave it so.

Last night we had the first really Classic concert which has occurred in the city since I have been here. It was given by Mlle. DE BOYE, a resident artist of admirable qualities, but never sufficiently known, she being a student of high Art, and Washington having but little weakness that way. But she was induced by those who knew her value to advertise a concert, whereat she was assisted by artists here and in Baltimore. It came off last night, and was so successful, that I trust it will be followed by a series of subscription concerts next fall, which would be something new for us!

In the C minor Trio of Beethoven, and the Concerto in G minor of Mendelssohn, Mlle. De Boye gave evidence of such a real entrance into the spirit of the masters as we are here strangers to. AHBEND'S 'cello is exquisite. He gave us finely for solos Schubert's Hommage à Beethoven, Finale of Lucia, and "Sounds of Home." I could but reflect when the first of these was announced as a "Theme from Beethoven," how remarkable a compliment it is to Schubert, that his hommage to Beethoven should have so inspired him, that this entirely original piece should have so widely passed for the composition of the great master, and been published as such in London and America. You may remember that when Schubert's earlier compositions were attracting notice, and especially his songs: Die Burgschaft, Die Junge Nonne, Ossian's Gesänge, Die Grenze der Menschheit, Beethoven was deeply interested in them, and exclaimed, "Wahrlich in dem Schubert wohnt ein göttlicher Funke," (Truly in this Schubert burns a god-like fire!)

I have said that this was the only really Classic concert we have had. I do not forget HELLER'S entertainment, (half music, half necromancy,) of which I wrote you. He did give us the Sonata

Pathétique, and some "Songs without Words."—But when I think of his concert I am reminded of the statements published with becoming gravity by the Hon. Robert Boyle, namely: that a drum made of wolf's skin would break another made of sheep's skin; and that a harp strung with fox-gut strings would make hens fly away. Heller has "second sight" enough to explain these to us, and also why an orange-tree blossoming and bearing fruit in two minutes puts to flight a flock of Lirder ohne Worte; and a "Magic drum," on which invisible spirits beat, will break the effect of the Pathétique on the drum of the ear.

After living here somewhat longer one gets to find a good deal of worthy music in Washington. There are a number of good artists. The defect is a lack of musical enthusiasm, and an ignorance of the great composers. There was last night an earnest attention to the entire concert, and an evident interest in the finest passages. I remember a verse of John Sterling's which commences

"Meliora latent" ever; &c.

C.

From CHICAGO, III.

JUNE 21.—We have actually had nothing in the way of Concerts, except one of STRAKOSCH's very pleasing and amusing Grand Musical Festivals, gotten up in the usual style, viz: Signora PARODI, prima donna assoluta, lately returned from her professional tour through Europe; Madame PATTI STRAKOSCH, and some tenor or baritone, engaged at twenty-five dollars a week, to give variety, and the necessary rest to the prime donne, besides sustaining the male parts in those sweet and entirely new duettos, with Maurice Strakosch as musical director and accompanist to the vocal performance. Strakosch is an excellent manager, and during his sojourn of seven years in America has sufficiently studied the taste of our Western population to know that his music will take, and that he gains more by pursuing his course than by trying to cultivate and elevate the standard of music; he gains more money, I mean, and I am very much mistaken if that is not his prime object. Oh, beautiful! how sweet! charming! are expressions I hear whispered around me; and signs of astonishment exhibited by open mouths, charming smiles, and sundry gesticulations, have sufficiently convinced me that it would be dangerous openly to express any dissatisfaction. Strakosch performs finely on the piano; his accompaniments are really a great support to the singing members,—and leaving his pecuniary aims out of the question, which form the main basis of his course, it is almost a pity that he should not try to please his audiences with Chopin, Mendelssohn, Schumann, Beethoven, and compositions of other authors, instead of his own calculated accompaniments of "Katy Darling," "Old Folks," "Yankee Doodle," and others, while I think him able to perform such compositions as would raise him in the opinion of all admirers of music.

But he did make money; both evenings the spacious hall was crowded at one dollar a head. He left here for some parts in Wisconsin, will visit St. Louis and return ultimately to New York.

It has often been remarked by artists that the Western country does not offer sufficient encouragement to visit it, while all depends on knowledge and management; and although many will rather abandon the idea of paying us a visit than descending to these sundry humbugs, I request their consideration and compassion, assuring them that with our fast notions of improvements we shall soon be able to distinguish good from middling,—and while at present, all belonging under the category of the latter are pretty sure of making money by the experiment, the first class will always meet with a hearty welcome from a goodly number.

The "Backus Minstrels" are backing us considerably, having taken possession of our only good music hall for a length of time, to keep away anything less mediocre.

Since BERGMANN has left us, there have been no public performances of our Philharmonic Society, and we must rely altogether on the kindness of those who favor us with a chance visit; and not until such an important event will I again task your patience.

Musical Chat-Chat.

CINDERELLA has stepped into real life, it seems. The Salut Publique, of Lyons, guarantees the truth of the following story:—"About two months ago, M. de Rhet—, a gentleman of large property in the neighborhood of this city, on leaving the theatre after a performance of the 'Etoile du Nord,' picked up a white satin shoe. On examining it, he found that it must have been made for a foot remarkably small and elegant. He asked the box-keepers if any one had announced the loss of a shoe, but was answered in the negative. He took it home with him. The more he saw it the more he admired it; and he jumped to the conclusion that the owner, having so small a foot, was, in all probability, extremely beautiful. He showed the shoe to all his friends and acquaintances, and caused them to make inquiries after the owner; but he could gain no clue to her. At last it struck him that, as the person who had lost it could not have walked home, he might gain some information from the cab-drivers. After eight days spent in inquiry he found a driver who remembered having driven a young woman who had lost her shoe in the Rue Thomassin. M. de Rhet— thereupon made inquiries at every house in that street; and he at length discovered a young work-woman who blushing confessed that the shoe was hers. As he anticipated, he found that she was remarkably beautiful, and on inquiry he learned that her character was very good. He fell in love with her, and in a few days they were married."

Look out for an improvement in church music—for we are told that, in view of the want of devotional feeling among church singers generally, the Bishop of Newfoundland has prepared a prayer for them, which is used in his cathedral, and in many of the churches of his diocese.

Our music-loving friends in Philadelphia are at length to be congratulated on the prospect of a fine large Opera House. The money is wholly or mostly subscribed, the directors have contracted for the building, and ground was actually broken last week at the corner of Broad and Locust streets for the foundation. There are at present nearly two hundred men at work upon the lot. It is said that the site is better and that the theatre will be larger even than the Academy of Music in New York. The Philadelphians, we believe, style theirs the American Academy of Music. Success to it! Democratic prices! down with the star system and with the spasmodic speculations! and instead thereof a permanent lyric institution, in which justice will be done to composers as well as prime donne assolutes, and great works presented with reasonable completeness and conscientiousness in all, even the most subordinate parts!

At the same time that the Londoners are hailing the advent of a new English opera (of which we copy a description elsewhere) Paris is rejoicing in two new operas from its favorites, AUBER and HALEVY. The latter has chosen a wild Indian subject—Jaguarita is its title—and it has met with great success at the Theatre Lyrique. Auber's was given at the Opera Comique, and the first performance was honored by the attendance of the veteran Rossini, as well as of the Emperor and Empress.....ALFRED JAEHL has lately given a concert at Strasburg, in company with the violinist, SIVORI.....CATHERINE HAYES, the Irish vocalist, gave a concert at Singapore, in the East Indies, in March last. In extent of territory her artistic career certainly beats all others, she having traversed Europe, America, (from ocean to ocean), Australia and India..... Our sweet singer, Mrs. WENTWORTH, has returned from a successful concert tour in the Eastern provinces.

Has any musician, or any other living lion been the subject of so many anecdotes, real or invented, as ROSSINI? One might fill a book with them.—His revisitation of Paris just now is the signal for a new shower of them. Terribly severe is his reported not concerning MEYERBEER. Being asked if he had heard the Prophete, he answered: "Yes, I heard it once in Florence; but the Italians are not fond of five-hour operas, so they abridged it a great deal, and very unfortunately they seemed to have left out all the good parts."

There is a rumor that one of our enterprising managers proposes to bring over here the famous composer and conductor, RICHARD WAGNER, who is now frightening the Englishmen.....For the French Opera at New Orleans M. ROUSSEAU DELAGRÈVE, of the Imperial Academy at Paris, has been engaged as first tenor; he is said to be superior to any tenor who has visited New Orleans before; he is still young, of a fine physique, and counts among the first singers in France. He has a comic talent also. For basse chantante their old favorite, M. GRANT, returns to them from France, in place of M. BECKER. M. DEBRINAT, light tenor, also returns, and M. MAZUR succeeds M. MONTCLAIR.....The German Männerchöre have societies in Texas, which met for a Festival at New-Braunfels on the last three days of May, at the same time that a similar festival was held in Cleveland, Ohio. Besides the Braunfels Union itself, which numbered thirty or forty singers, there were double or single quartets from Columbus, Indianola, San Antonio and Austin, and one rejoicing in the tender little title of the "Sisterdale-Comfort" union. Some of them travelled one hundred and fifty miles to attend.

Master LUCA, a young colored pianist, has been creating some sensation by concerts in New York. Some of the papers, with the usual ready catering to popular credulity, call him at once another De Meyer, Thalberg, Jaell, &c. We should think so, by the title of one of his pieces: "LISZT's Concerto by HERZ"(1) which, according to one of said newspaper criticisms, turned out to be upon themes by BERLIOZ(2) But we have heard Master Luca, and think him possessed of rather extraordinary talent, and execution more brilliant and forcible than tasteful. What he most seemed to need, (this was a year or two since,) was a study of genuine compositions, instead of such made-up trumpery as the above title indicates.

NEW THEORY OF NEGRO MINSTRELST.—The Philadelphia Bulletin commences an article upon "The force of Caricature" with the following:

Whoever has taken the trouble to think about our "Ethiopian Melodies," must have been struck with the fact, that, aside from the affectation of dialect, there is nothing Ethiopian about them. The airs are known to be the production of a pure Caucasian head; but we refer more particularly to the text. What is there peculiarly African in the images called to the mind by the great majority of these songs?

It is evident that these "Negro Melodies" are white melodies, strictly national songs of our country and people, and fully entitled to the designation of American pastorals, if any thing were to be gained by using such pedantic expressions. They deal in the daily life of a thriving people, just beginning to feel sufficiently at ease in and satisfied with its social arrangements and relations to entertain a nascent desire to make them the subject of artistic treatment, and yet too little emerged from the hard labor which was required to establish such a state of comfort and well being, to enter upon this artistic occupation with great force or fervor, or to be quite convinced that the desire is entirely legitimate and proper and not in the least ridiculous.

Why, then, does this phase of art appear in the dross of such coarse and extravagant caricature? Why do we choose to see ourselves mirrored in the forms and faces of the blacks instead of incarnating our own feelings and wishes in the forms of bright ideals? For the very reason that we are not quite sure that we have a right to make poetry about ourselves. Poetry, as handed down to us, erects its superstructure on the basis of their social conditions; and the poets of these melodies doubt their own title to admission into the sacred order. To avoid, therefore, the appearance of entertaining an unwarrantable aspiration, they endeavor to keep open the possibility of a retreat by resorting to the excuse that they were "only in fun," that they never seriously thought of such a thing as writing poetry. "Anybody but a green-horn can see that I never intended to write poetry in earnest; I wouldn't have written about darkies if I had."

BOSTON, JUNE 30, 1855.

Miss Elise Hensler's Concert.

The first Concert since her return from Italy, of this young lady, whose residence in New England and especially in Boston from a very early age (although she was born in Switzerland) naturally enlisted the warm sympathies of this community in her artistic studies and career, took place on Tuesday evening in the Music Hall. It was a Complimentary Concert, and the occasion was as interesting as we all knew it would be. Considering the lateness of the season, and the attraction which the country has in these sweet nights of June, when to most hacknied concert-goers the songs of birds are the most refreshing of all music, the audience was remarkably large, and composed of the most intelligent, the most agreeable, the kindest company that could well be collected. All wished the singer to succeed, and although there were a plenty whose judgment could not be blinded by their best wishes, all found their wishes realized.

The season prevented the arrangement of a concert on so large a scale, as we could have desired, seeing that the arrival of Miss HENSLEER was just too late to give us a chance of hearing her in opera. There was no orchestra, but just a simple, quiet concert, with variety enough to make it somewhat piquant, with excellent piano-forte accompaniments by Sig. BENDELARI, excellent vocal aid by Mr. MILLARD, and some of the best pieces of the Germania Serenade Band, played in their superior style, which was as good as music by nine brass instruments could be; for really they play admirably, and in such pieces as Rossini's overture to L'Italiana in Algieri, the Scena from Freyshütz, &c., astonished us by their cleverness.

The fair débutante appeared not a little timid and anxious in her first appearance, as was natural. Her look and manner were as simple, unaffected, full of maiden delicacy, and earnest, as before she left us. She was enthusiastically welcomed and riveted a sympathetic attention to her every tone and motion. The embarrassment scarcely left her during the whole of the first piece;—it was the Come per me sereno from "La Sonnambula." Her singing therefore was a little colder than we might expect afterwards; and her voice in parts slightly tremulous. But such a pure, evenly developed, sympathetic, sweet, refined soprano it was a deep pleasure to hear. It is by means a great voice, but singularly fine and beautiful; not of the LOUISA PYNE sort of sweetness and fineness, but with a richer individual color to it; and faultlessly true in every note. She executed both the plain cantabile and luxurious embellishments with true mastery of method and with such artistic style, as would have done credit to some of the most finished Italian prime donne. She sustains, swells and diminishes a high, silvery note with perfect purity; her trill is very fine; and there is no single trace of any kind of bad mannerism anywhere perceptible. The only deduction, not ascribable to the timidity of the moment, was on the score of power—power we mean for the grander kind of efforts, on the lyric stage, in oratorio, &c.,—and yet there was power enough to fill with perfect ease that vast hall, with each note in her compass, and to penetrate and fill every listener. The duet from I Masnadieri was charmingly sung by Miss HENSLEER and Mr. MILLARD; their voices were sympathetic to each other, and it was a joint success of a truly artistic order.

In the Second Part Miss Hensler seemed first fully at home and at ease with her audience, and sang as among her friends. The Cavatina from "Linda": O luce di quest' anima, was perhaps her best piece. She sang it with so much finished grace, and flexibility, and delicacy, such truth of sentiment, that one could not wonder at the expression attributed to BORDOGNI, her teacher in Paris, who patted the young girl on the shoulder and said: la petite Sontag! By the way, Linda di Chamounix, (apart from its fitness to her voice and kind of talent), was not a bad opera for the début of a young girl born in Switzerland. Her last piece, one of the prettiest of Verdi's airs, Caro nome, from "Rigoletto", which some of our friends will remember was first introduced to us by ALFRED JAEEL in one of his piano fantasies or transcriptions, was very tastefully, feelingly and effectively delivered.

Miss Hensler's voice has certainly gained very much in power and body in the two years of her absence. She is yet young,—only nineteen,—and with the excellent method which now guides, as well as the earnest feeling which inspires her practice, there is every reason to hope it will gain still more. Yet it is plain that in her whole nature, organization and temperament, she is not destined for the grander sphere of Art. She may never be what is distinctively called a great artist; but she may be, she already is, an artist, and of a fine and pleasing quality. Nor is it likely that she has yet developed all she is. If voice, musical temperament, mind, the first fruits of study, womanly modesty and self-respect, artist-like earnestness, if these are trust-worthy signs, there is an enviable future before her in the path which she has chosen. Something we might say about the kind of music in which she seems so far entirely to have exercised her talent; it is exclusively of the Italian operatic school. So fine an instrument, tempered by the true Italian method, seem almost to owe itself to the production of sometimes other and more satisfying strains than these. But this is too great a subject upon which to enter here.

Of the six vocal pieces set down in that programme all were Italian, and four by Verdi. Mr.

MILLARD, besides the duet, sang two solos, both by Verdi, and sang them finely, especially the Serenade from Il Trovatore, in which he gave us some as sweet and noble tenor tones as one could wish to hear. But in the highest tones, both here and in the Air from I due Foscari, the voice seemed forced; clear and round and strong as the note was, it had a certain hard and bawling quality that disturbed the fine impression of a timbre for the most part singularly musical. We doubt if much singing of Verdi can be nourishing to the voice, or wholesome in respect of style and feeling. Especially in the concert room do some of those dashing cabalettas seem unnatural, there being nothing to justify the excitement indicated in the music, unless it be the excitement of accomplishing a feat.

Our Military Bands.

MR. EDITOR:—We noticed, a few days since, a piece in your paper relative to the music given by the various military bands of this city. The recent visit of the New York City Guard to this place has once again brought this subject to public notice, by the fact that their band, though numbering no more than our Brigade Band on that occasion, performed in such superior style, as to give rise to comparisons not altogether favorable to our musicians. We cordially agree with your writer in thinking that it is a great mistake to abolish reed instruments from our street music, and to supply their places with harsh instruments of brass. We can well remember when our bands could number many good performers on the Bugle, French Horn, and other instruments, so conducive to softness and harmony in music. The Cornet, and the various kinds of the French Sax-Horns and Tubas, have usurped the place of these old, familiar instruments, for the reason that the cornets, &c., are much more simple in their construction, and consequently do not require such good performers.

Still, this New York band had no reed instruments, and yet how superior their music was to ours! We noticed this particularly on the last day of their sojourn among us, when they passed up State Street; the music of Shelton's Band was deep, full and smooth; that of our musicians noisy, discordant and shrill. Can there be no reform in this respect? If money be a consideration, the various military corps of this city would willingly pay an additional price for the sake of better music. Cannot your able Journal take up this cause in earnest?

1ST DIVISION.

We sympathize with the writer or writers (for their name is "Legion") of the above in their complaint.—We have already more than once taken the matter up in earnest in these columns. It is too true that Boston has lost any prestige she may once have had on the score of her military bands. It is easier to point out the causes of the decline, than it is to make it better. These causes are two-fold.

First economical. The bands are too small. The problem seems to be to make the loudest noise at the least cost. Brass instruments serve this purpose well. Instead therefore of well-appointed bands of thirty to sixty properly blended instruments of various character and coloring of tone, we have little screaming, howling, brassy squads of twelve or sixteen instruments.—Query: Might it not be better economy, so far as music is concerned, to resort to the ex pluribus unum principle, and blend several of the little squads into one goodly and effective company?

The second cause is fashion, the false musical fashion of the times. We mean the factitious consequence suddenly assumed by the multifarious inventions of brass instruments of the cornet and Sax tuba family, with valves and pistons. These are easy to play upon; their sounds are taking to the uncultivated ear, which loves something mongrel, monstrous and exceptional sooner than something genuine. It is not merely that these instruments are harsh. The harshness of the trumpet, and the trombone, in their places, is something characteristic, stirring, genuine. But these cornet and Saxhorns are of no character at all; they are trumpets without their manliness, while they imitate clarinets without their fineness, in seeking to make the sound go far. Then again in the modern brass or cornet band, all the instruments are of one family; all are shades of one and the same color; there is no contrast, there is no character; and the effect is monotonous; no class of musical sounds pall so soon upon the refined ear, as these emasculated brass sounds.

There is the whole story. An old-fashioned band, composed of reeds and genuine brass instruments, not omitting the neglected old Kent Bugle—a large band, too, it should be—would do more to educate the popular sense of music, than all the coiled and twisted tubes of brass of all the music shops in all the land, blown in all corners by each little local band. We have sometimes indulged the hope that a civic band, for civic, literary and artistic festivals and processions, for summer evening music on the common, &c. &c. might be organized upon this plan by our municipal authorities, if not by private enterprise, and be a model in its way. We confess to feeling an inherent difficulty in the military connection. Things musical and things military do not point exactly the same way; in truth their tendency is opposite (compare Sebastopol with Handel's "Messiah"). The very existence of a military is the overlapping of a barbarous period upon the present, (we say nothing of the necessity,) and inconsistent with a civilized and Christian age. If Music is to occupy the world, War must go out of it.

Music Abroad.

London.

HAYMARKET THEATRE.—(From The Times, June 4.) On Saturday night a new opera, in two acts, entitled Berta, or the Gnome of Hartzberg, was produced with great success, the music by Mr. HENRY SMART, the libretto by Mr. FITZBALL. The former Baron of Hartzberg, a profligate gentleman, has privately married one of his serfs. The offspring of this marriage is a son, who, fancying himself illegitimate, assumes the profession of arms and quits his "native hills," to risk the perils of a soldier's life. The mother has taken a solemn oath never to reveal the secret of her marriage; but on his deathbed the haughty Baron repents, and confesses the truth in a letter to his son, furnished with which Valour (Mr. Weiss) returns to claim the rank and possessions of his father. The other link in the story turns upon the loves of Michael, a forest ranger (Mr. SIMS REEVES), and Berta (Mrs. SIMS REEVES), a young village girl, who, though a bit of a coquette, reciprocates in her heart the attachment of Michael. The harmony that exists between them is deranged by a vision of Berta, who dreams she is carried away by the Gnome of Hartzberg. A popular interpretation of this dream conveys that the dreamer is to marry a nobleman; and Berta, being ambitious as well as a flirt, declares she will not wed Michael until he becomes nothing less than Baron of Hartzberg. At this juncture, Valour, who in early life (ingenious Mr. Fitzball!) has been saved from drowning by Michael, opportunely arrives, and, without being recognized, overhears a conversation which informs him of the unhappy condition of his ancient friend and benefactor. He resolves to aid him. The abode of the Gnome is supposed to be a gloomy spot in the recesses of the mountains, which the inhabitants regard with terror. To this place many disconsolate maidens had been lured away and devoured by the wicked demon who infested the neighborhood, like one of the fierce dragons in the Seven Champions of Christendom, with no St. George sufficiently gallant to pursue and conquer him. The second soliloquy of Valour, however, gives a clue to the mystery. The Gnome was no other than Baron Hartzberg himself, a sort of Bohemian Don Juan, who, turning the prevailing superstition to advantage, was enabled to carry on his depredations with impunity. The plan resolved upon by his successor is to test the real feelings of Berta, and if she proves worthy, unite her to Michael. After making the unconscious ranger believe himself, and pass for, the real Baron, he causes him to be arrested, on suspicion of theft, and imprisoned as an impostor. Assuming then his proper titles, Valour offers his hand to Berta; but, finding the young girl's affection has only been strengthened by the misfortunes of her lover, he contrives, through means not worth describing, a general rendezvous at the abode of the imaginary Gnome, which, as in the times of the late Baron's entertainment, is suddenly transformed into a magnificent banquet-hall, with every preparation for the wedding feast, and there, amid general rejoicing, the nuptials of Berta and Michael are proclaimed. The subordinate personages—Koff (Mr. MANVERS), who has another love affair with Nannetta (Miss HARRIET GORDON); the Burgomaster (Mr. FARQUHARSON), and Isaac, a pedlar (Mr. W. FARREN)—with the exception of the last, whose purse Michael is charged with stealing, have nothing to do with the main plot, and merely serve to season the action with a spice of that peculiar low-comedy "business," which, when Mr. Fitzball was less chary of operatic libretti than at present, used to afford a pungent relish to the more strictly musical part of the entertainment.

It was not easy to do anything with such a jumble of unedifying absurdities; but Mr. Henry Smart has managed to make it the framework for some of the most beautiful and masterly writing that has been contributed to the stage by any English composer. From the overture to the end the evidence of consummate musicianship, united to rich invention, clever construction, and a continuous flow of melody, is present. All this could not be concealed by the scanty proportions of the orchestra and the utter inefficiency of the chorus, although the orchestral accompaniments are elaborate and varied with great felicity, while the choruses, besides being numerous, are of the highest importance to the general effect.

The performance, allowing for the inevitable deficiencies to which we have alluded, offered much to be praised without qualification. Mr. Smart himself presided in the orchestra, and was received with the loudest applause. The house was crowded with amateurs and musicians, who had long been aware of his abilities as a composer, though they had enjoyed no previous chance of testing them in a public theatre. Every one seemed in the humor to be pleased; and the opera went off with the greatest écclat from first to last.

PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY.—On Monday, the 11th inst., the seventh concert took place, when the music was "by command." Her Majesty honoring it by her presence. Madame Clara Novello and Signor Belletti were the vocalists on the occasion, and the former sang a scena and an aria eminently calculated for displaying her varied powers of voice and expression. Weber's grand dramatic song, "Ocean thou mighty monster," and Cherubini's divine strain, "Ave Maria" (with clarinet obligato), were each in their several styles, perfection. The symphonies were Mozart's "Jupiter," and Beethoven's No. 8. The overtures, Macfarren's "Chevy Chase," Wagner's "Tannhäuser," and Cherubini's "Anacreon."

Germany.

BERLIN.—Last week was presented, in the Singacademie, the Tud Abel's, an oratorio by the late Herr Rungenhagen, formerly director of the institution. The performance was under the direction of Herr Grell. Herren Oertling, Rehbaum, Wendt, and Birnback have brought their quartet soirées to a close in Sommer's Rooms. In the space of about a year, they have given fifty-seven quartets, ten by Haydn, nine by Mozart, six by Beethoven, and the rest by Mendelssohn, Ries, Taubert, Spohr, Stahlnkecht, Fecca, Schumann, Rubinstein, Wendt, and Just. Herr Dorn has gone to Königsberg, where his opera, Die Niebelungen, is to be produced, with Mlle. Johanna Wagner in the principal character.

MUNICH.—Mlle. Marie Cravelli is permanently engaged at the Theatre Royal. On the 24th inst., Lortzing's Udine was produced for the first time, without creating any sensation. Wagner's Tannhäuser, and Lachner's Medea are about to be produced.

BRUNSWICK.—Mlle. Johanna Wagner has appeared in I Montecchi e Cappelletti, Lucrezia Borgia, Die Niebelungen and Les Huguenots, with great success.

Italy.

On the 13th of May, the theatres of Naples again reopened their doors to the public. At the Fondo we had Verdi's Violetta, alias La Traviata, previously played at San Carlo during the winter season, and with about the same success. The parts were filled by Mme. Beltramelli, Signori Monjini and Olivori. The orchestra was good. It is somewhat extraordinary that the Teatro Nuovo should be opened with the same opera. The singers here were Mme. Cappelli, Signori Villani and Rosini. The composer, Mercadante, has arrived at Bari, to superintend the rehearsal of his opera, Già Orsini di Corsica, and Il Giuramento and La Vestale. At Milan, La Scala is now open, but to a "beggarly account of empty boxes." No new opera is announced, at least for the present; and I Lombardi drags its slow length along, night after night. Our accounts date up to the 12th instant; the Profeta, of Meyerbeer, was in rehearsal, and much is expected—not from the singers, who, as we have already said, are below mediocrity—but from the spectacle which is announced as magnificent. This opera has already been two months in rehearsal—for Italy, an unheard-of circumstance. At the Carcano, Il Trovatore has drawn good houses. The Italians frequent this Theatre, which may account for the success of Verdi's new opera, while not one native sets foot in La Scala. Il Templario has met with considerable favor at this house.—At Trieste the composer F. C. Lickl has produced a new work, entitled Il Trionfo del Cristianismo, which at once arrested public attention. Three pieces were encored, and the composer was several times recalled during the performance. Signor Lickl was presented by the orchestra with a silver baton, after the performance.—There must indeed be a sad scarcity of musical talent at Naples when the three principal theatres are producing at the same time and on the same nights Sig. Verdi's Violetta—at the San Carlo, the Fondo, and the Nuovo. Report speaks favorably of a new tenor, Signor Monjini, who is described as being possessed of a fine voice, although he is reproached with the defect, common to all the débütantes of the present time in Italy, viz: bad execution and deficiency in stage practice. We find mention made, in the Giornale di Roma, of a new Miserere composed by the Abbé Mustapha. It is for five voices, with a chorus; the whole body of the pontifical singers took part in the chorus, so that the execution was as near perfection as possible. The composer has aimed at the highest order of church music, and he seems to have succeeded in exciting the enthusiasm of all present.

NEW COURSE OF HARMONY, BY L. H. SOUTHARD.

The Publishers call the attention of the musical profession to this work, as one eminently calculated to lighten the labors of the teacher, and rapidly advance the pupil. It is emphatically a PRACTICAL work, serving both as a Manual of instruction on the one hand, and a Text-book on the other; and it is believed that the peculiar arrangement of the work, together with the very large number of exercises and examples, presents great advantages, to both scholar and teacher, over any similar work of the kind. Teachers highly commend the work. Mr. WILLIAM MASON says it is a work unsurpassed in the language. Mr. GEORGE J. WEBB says that it is a work perspicuous in diction, methodical in arrangement, and sufficiently copious to embrace all the essentials of the general doctrine of accord. It can be ordered through any respectable Music-seller, and will be sent through the mail on the receipt of the price, ($1.75,) postage prepaid.

CHARLES SUMNER, and others of our most eminent writers. A series of papers by RUSKIN, and essays left by the eminent sculptor, HORATIO GREENOUGH, add to the interest of The Crayon.

We have already strongly recommended THE CRAYON, and every succeeding number proves it to be more and more worthy of all we have said in its praise. No journal, devoted to Art, has ever been so ably conducted, in this country; and if it meets with the support it so richly deserves, we have no doubt that it will exert a most wholesome influence upon the taste of the country.

Reminiscences of a Summer Tour. VI.

STUTTGART TO EILGEN—ORGAN OF CARL WEIGL AND
THE PARISH CHURCH—TÜBINGEN—SCENERY IN SOUTH GERMANY—ORGAN MANUFACTORY OF THE
MESSRS. WALKER AT LUDWIGSBURG.

One day I went with CARL WEIGL to Eilgen, a village about ten miles to the South from Stuttgart, where he had recently set up an organ of his own manufacture. It was placed in the loft of a little dilapidated church, such as are so often to be met with in the smaller towns of South Germany. The church, in its situation and peculiar architecture, was exceedingly picturesque. Moss had grown thick and gray on its roof,—not a few stones had fallen from the top of its square tower,—and the ivy, clambering everywhere, strove in vain to conceal the gaping cracks in the wall. The door stood invitingly open, and the sun of a warm summer afternoon lay upon the floor. Within all was silent and desolate. Its rude benches and bare walls contrasted dismally with the showy organ case in the loft. We had captured a vagabond boy in the street, and impressed him into the service of bellows-blowing. Weigl took his seat at the keyboard, and for an hour showed off the qualities of his instrument, while I lolled back in the corner of a high-walled cage of a pew, and gave myself up to the influences of the music and the place.—The organ is too large and pretentious for its position. It did not strike me as a first class instrument, though its maker claims for it such rank. It has twenty-six registers. Its fancy and imitative stops are most excellent. The clarinet and flute, in particular, might readily deceive an unpractised ear. The intonation of all its reed-pipes is faultless. The full organ has, however, a harshness and ferocity not usual with the German instruments. It was by no means comparable to the rich and mellow-toned productions of the Ludwigsburg manufactory. But the organist did his best in the exhibition of it, and showed he possessed, in no small degree, the requisites of a thorough musician. Meanwhile, as he played, groups of ragged children gathered wondering-ly about the door. Presently a message was received from the minister, who lived close by, to the effect that the noise disturbed him in his meditations. And so the performance came to an end. Bidding adieu to Carl Weigl, with many thanks for his civil attention, I proceeded on with my companions to Tübingen.

Württemberg is a region of hill and valleys. It is the most populous of the German States. So, also, it retains more of the quaint and curious customs of the old time. The postillion, in yellow bob-tailed jacket, on his approach to a village, winds you a tune on his mellow horn. The peasants whom you meet are decked in gay costumes. Women are delving by the road side, and cows yoked together are plowing in the fields. You are greeted by no rudeness or incivility from high or low. The influx of travellers has not here, as elsewhere, corrupted the simplicity and natural good breeding of the people.

We journeyed leisurely along this beautiful route, passing through the dingy little town of Waldenbach, where Dannecker, the sculptor, was born, and came in the edge of the evening, to the ancient town of Tübingen, the seat of the University of the kingdom of Württemberg. Here Melancthon once taught. There are nine hundred students now in the colleges. I went at evening up to the castle of Hohen-Tübingen, once the stronghold of the Pfalzgraves, now conceded by the government to the use of the University. It contains the rare and valuable University Library of 140,000 volumes. I was met at the entrance by the librarian, a venerable, mild-spoken man, who addressed me in Latin. It was a novel experience to be conducted past moats and draw-bridge, through vaulted passages and under a gateway, having a façade of a triumphal arch, to the peaceful abodes of literature and learning. The town is rarely visited, being out of the track of tourists; yet the region around abounds in scenery of surpassing beauty. The view from the hill, just outside the town, is equalled only by that from the summit of the Königstuhl, near Heidelberg, which is so famous. Being exhausted and ill, I passed the greater part of a day stretched out in the refreshing shade of the vines which embower the hill-side. Through the loopholes of my sylvan retreat I gazed without molestation upon the rare beauty of the landscape. It is a scene to warm the heart of a poet. Below lies Tübingen with the castle above it; and beyond, the castle of Hohenzoller rises against the sky. The Steinbach, a silent stream, is creeping through the valley at the right; to the left glides the silver Neckar. The Ammer, too, twin river of the Neckar, flows southward toward the sea in a valley of its own. Vineyards clothe the hill-sides, and fields of waving grain the plains. The chimes of innumerable bells came up from the villages on all sides, making the air tremulous with sound.

From this point I retraced my steps to Stuttgart, and thence proceeded to Ludwigsburg to visit the famous organ establishment of E. F. WALKER, which Herr Kocher had kindly afforded me facilities for doing.

This establishment is, at present, the most popular perhaps of any in Germany. It resembles, in many points, the famous Chickering manufactory for pianofortes here. The whole business of organ-building has been reduced to a system, and the best system. Every part of the complicated structure is supervised in its mechanism by the Messrs. Walker themselves. First, they are careful to secure the proper elementary materials. None but the best of its kind is accepted. The pipe-metal is obtained from England in its crude state. It is then rolled by massive machinery into plates, preparatory to being fashioned into pipes. By this means a uniform and even sheet of metal is obtained, on the perfection of which process, in great degree, the excellence of the pipe and its resulting tone depends. These were shown me in their various stages of fabrication. In a separate apartment was carefully stowed away an assortment of metallic pipes, some sixteen, others thirty-two feet in length, glowing in their recent state like burnished silver. The stock intended for the wooden pipes is selected with equal care and discrimination. It is first stacked in a proper position out of doors, and suffered to remain for several years. Then it is again passed under examination, and the unfit portions being rejected, the remainder is housed, in a light, dry and airy place, for several years more, till it becomes most thoroughly seasoned. No less care is bestowed on the selection and preparation of the materials which are to compose the case, the wind-chest, the feet of the registers, and all that goes to make up the skeleton of the instrument; for soundness in these points is essential to the perfect result. In these particulars, and in the careful manner in which all the details of the mechanism are carried out, Herr Walker is a conscientious artist. He means his work shall last, and grow only better by time.

At the period I was present, he had in hand a colossal instrument destined for the Ulm Cathedral. It was near its completion, and indeed some portions had already been conveyed to Ulm. A fragment of it was still set up in the manufactory, constituting in itself a huge organ, from which I was treated with a taste of its quality. By the contract this instrument was to have been delivered over to the Cathedral in 1851. But a variety of circumstances had delayed its completion. Herr Walker claims for it equality in excellence, at least, with any other on the Continent. By the schedule given below, it will be seen it exceeds in dimensions even the Freyburg giant. It has 104 registers [59 in metal and 45 in wood], 4 manuals, and 2 Pedals, arranged as follows:

This organ, it will be seen, has several 32 feet pipes in metal and in wood. It stands 96 feet high in its case! The work upon it alone is estimated to cost 40,000 guilders. Connected with its action is a contrivance similar to the pneumatic touch, so called, attached to the recent English organs, without which the labor of playing so enormous an instrument would be indeed Herculean. A colossal instrument from this establishment was also completed for St. Petersburg in 1841. In this organ (I learn from the recent work of J. J. Seidel*) was introduced the novelty of a Bifara Register of purest metal, with ten ranks in the third manual, "of a peculiar soft violin-like intonation," exceedingly beautiful; as also a remarkably fine Dulciana in the second manual (or choir organ), and in the Swell an eight feet Physharmonica (with vibrating tongues), provided with a crescendo and decrescendo. There is also, even in the manual, a Trombone register eight feet. Herr Walker frequently alluded to the St. Petersburg instrument as one of his most satisfactory efforts; though it is by no means equal in size to that in Ulm. Drawings and minute specifications of both these organs were furnished me by the maker. These I committed, with many injunctions of watchfulness, to the custody of my good-for-nothing courier, who took occasion to forget them at the first stopping-place on our journey afterwards.

Auber's New Opera.

[Paris Correspondence of London Musical World.]

What an extraordinary man is DANIEL AUBER! Here he is fast approaching the term of three score years and ten allotted to man, and he produces a new opera as fresh, gay, lively, and brilliant as though he were in the boyhood of existence, instead of enjoying a green old age. As song flows from Béranger in his age, so issues melody from the greatest of French composers.

But to my task, which is to give your readers some account of the new opera, the conjoint production of SCRIBE and AUBER—a pair intended by nature for each other—which was produced, for the third time, on Saturday last, at the Opéra-Comique, in presence of a most brilliant audience, including the Emperor and Empress, and a host of notabilities. The scene is laid in England, and both author and composer seem to have continually had before them the happy alliance which now knits the two countries together with bonds stronger than steel. Everything, therefore, is painted couleur de rose, and the fair character of your countrymen and countrywomen has seldom been displayed in pleasanter colors. The middle of the last century furnishes the time in which the action is laid. The heroine is "Jenny Bell" (Mlle. CAROLINE DUPREZ), a young orphan, who, early in life, was kindly placed in a boarding-school for education by the Duke of Greenwich (M. FAURE). Her benefactor is called from England to fulfil a diplomatic mission of importance, and while he is busily engaged in discussing protocols and "stumping" the Gortschakoffs and Titoffs of his day with somewhat more adroitness than our diplomatists can now pretend to, Jenny Bell is forgotten and left in poverty and solitude. She adopts the lyric stage as her profession, studies hard, and becomes as celebrated as a future JENNY of the century succeeding. Her name resounds throughout Europe; managers dispute the possession of a prize so great, and kings disdain not to treat for her engagement, as one great power dealing with another.

In the midst of this homage Jenny's benefactor suddenly returns from abroad, presents himself before his protégée, and supplicates her to return him his son, Lord Mortimer (M. DELAUNAT-RICQUIER). Jenny, whose virtue is equal to her reputation, declares that she has never seen Lord Mortimer, and cannot restore an affection which she has never possessed. It seems however, that Lord Mortimer has, like the Lord of Burleigh, assumed a disguise wherein to go a wooing, and, under the guise of a poor composer, sought the advice and protection of the fair Jenny, the all-powerful artiste. No sooner is she acquainted with the fact, than, full of gratitude for the favor she has received at the hands of the father, she determines to cure the son of what that father thinks ill-placed affection, and accordingly treats the disguised composer with harshness and scorn. She sneers at his genius, mocks his talents, laughs at his manners and appearance; nay more, she calumniate herself and vilifies her own character to the man who adores her, and whom she secretly loves. So much devotion deserves a recompense. Touched by the despair of Mortimer, who threatens to blow out his brains, or swallow, like Villikins, a cup of "cold poison," and full of esteem for the conduct of Jenny Bell, the Duke of Greenwich renounces the plan of a great matrimonial alliance which he had arranged for his son, and allows him to marry the artiste. All the world is happy, and Jenny for ever quits that stage on which she had made so great and so well-deserved a reputation.

Such is a sketch of the plot which M. Scribe has prepared with his usual happiness and dexterity. Among the many satellites who circle round the musical planet, he has given us a character painted with unusual skill, one M. Jones (M. SAINTE-FOY), a rich goldsmith, who is so thoroughly convinced of the power of the metal wherein he deals, that he imagines no artiste can resist his golden gifts, his sparkling diamonds, or his glittering rubies. In speaking of the music, I can but repeat that M. Auber's new opera is as pert, as gay, as charming, and as "young," as those "Crown Diamonds" which many a year ago won the admiration of all Europe. Melody and song are abundant as ever, and the instrumentation is what it ever has been, elegant, graceful, light, and pleasing. Mlle. Caroline Duprez sings a charming ballad in the first act, with accompaniments for flute and clarinet. M. Sainte-Foy has a comic air, full of character and humor, in which he depicts his riches, and the power they confer, and then follows a duet between him and M. Coudere, who represents a young lord, a friend of Mortimer's, ruined by early extravagance, but gay, light-hearted, and devoted to his friend. Then comes a duet between M. Faure and Mlle. Caroline Duprez, which concludes with a mazurka movement, so fascinating and airy, that it took the house completely by storm. The first act concludes with a cavatina for M. Ricquier, a trio for him, M. Coudere, and Mlle. Boulart, and a chorus, accompanied pianissimo by the orchestra on which the voices of Mlles. Duprez and Boulart are—so to speak—embroidered.

M. Coudere opens the second act with a romance equally simple and sweet, "Cette vermeille rose," and then we come to the most effective scene in the opera. It is that in which Jenny Bell corrects the music of the poor and youthful composer, delighted at the expressions of his love, which she partakes, but will not avow. None but an Auber, with his inborn delicacy and appreciation of the natural, could do justice to this scene, where the truest and most ardent affection is met by apparent mocking, and affected incredulity. An air, sang by M. Faure, is followed by an amusing quintette, descriptive of the voluminous and gallant correspondence every day addressed to Jenny Bell by her innumerable admirers; a charming aria, very well sung by Mlle. Caroline Duprez, and a finale, full of life and movement, constitute the principal pieces of the second act.

The third act is English to the back-bone, and sufficiently national even for Lord Moon and his aldermanic coadjutors, who have not arrived in Paris. Both "God save the Queen" and "Rule Britannia" have been worked up into it, and great applause followed a cavatina sung by M. Ricquier, accompanied by a chorus singing your national anthem à demi-voix, in the wings. A charming duet between M. Faure and Mlle. Caroline Duprez leads up to the finale, and the curtain fell amidst loud and long-continued applause.

THE LONDON TIMES ON "TANNHAUSER." The overture to Tannhäuser—repeated for the advantage of his Royal Highness Prince Albert (instead of the march, which had been announced, from the same opera)—does not improve on closer acquaintance. So much incessant noise, so uninterrupted and singular an exhibition of pure cacophony, was never heard before. And all this is intended to describe the delights and fascinations which lured the unwary to the secret abode of the Goddess of Beauty, in the Thuringian mountains—according to a popular German legend of the Middle Ages. In his music to the First Walpurgis Night, Mendelssohn gets up a magnificent clamor to describe the diabolical machinations by which the Druids frighten away the Roman soldiers from their place of worship on the 1st of May. But the clamor of Mendelssohn's Druids is nothing to the obstreperous demonstrations of Herr Wagner's Venus. What would Rossini—who, in writing from Paris to Bologna a description, piece by piece, of Bellini's Puritani, on arriving at "Suoni la tromba," says "I need tell you nothing of the duet; you must have heard it"—what would Rossini have written to his Bolognese friend about this overture? Words would have failed him, and the pen have dropped from his hand. Such a wonderful performance, however, as that of the Philharmonic band last night would; had it been possible, have made even Tannhäuser acceptable; but it was not possible, and we sincerely hope that no execution, however superb, will ever make such senseless discord pass, in England, for a manifestation of Art and genius.

THE BOSTON THEATRE.—The experiment of building a theatre in Boston larger than the Academy of Music at Paris, at an expense of two hundred and fifty thousand dollars, for a city whose population scarcely reaches one hundred and sixty thousand souls, was a hazardous, but experience has shown that it was not a mistaken enterprise. Its first season has just closed; a season of theatrical depression as great as the country has ever experienced, causing all the theatres south and west of this to close a month before the usual time; yet the Boston Theatre, with a nightly expense nearly double that of any other theatre in the country, has been open through its entire season of forty weeks with receipts as large at the closing as at the opening weeks, though at the latter period it was maintaining three large troupes, viz: a dramatic company, an Italian opera, and the Ravels, numbering in all two hundred and seventy-eight persons, at an expense of $7,400 per week.

The dramatic season of forty weeks was opened on Monday, the 11th of September, with the comedy of the "Rivals" and the "Loan of a Lover," and closed on Friday, June 15, with the "Serious Family," "Paul Pry," and "Bombastes Furioso," for the benefit of Mr. and Mrs. Wood. During the season performances have been given on 233 nights—of which the dramatic numbered 166 nights: English Opera, 34 nights; Italian Opera, (16 Grisi and Mario, and 12 New York Company,) 28 nights; Ravels, 5 nights. During this period upwards of 248,000 persons paid for admission, and the receipts amounted to $177,682. The regular company, comprising actors, musicians, carpenters, &c., all told, number one hundred and five persons.

In thus passing in review the events that have marked the progress of this most memorable year in American theatricals, it will be seen that notwithstanding the hard times, and the theatrical depression, the manager has kept his pledge to the public, by furnishing, during the entire season, every variety of agreeable entertainments; and if, in addition, we state that the Boston Theatre has paid all its expenses, and has besides a handsome surplus, it will be conceded, as we have already stated, that the experiment of building this theatre has been a successful one.

We have been informed that Mr. Barry leaves in the steamer of the 4th of July, and will visit Paris and London to secure novelties for the coming season. We owe too many of our best pleasures during the past season to his skill and liberality as a manager, not to feel more than an ordinary interest in his success in this enterprise. And so every one must feel who remembers how degenerate our stage had become till Mr. Barry regenerated it.—Transcript, June 26.

Mlle. Jenny Ney.—The following sketch of this young artist, whose performance in Il Trovatore, at Covent Garden, has been so highly praised, is from the Illustrated News:

"Mademoiselle Jenny Ney was born in Presburg (Hungary). Her mother, an excellent artist, educated her and her elder sister with great care for the stage, where Mlle. Ney made her debut as a mere child. Her sister, meanwhile, having enjoyed great reputation as a singer, she endeavored to emulate her; and after laborious studies under the sole care of her mother, entered into a favorable engagement with the Imperial Opera at Vienna in 1851, where she remained for three years, becoming every day a more decided favorite of the public. Perhaps she would never have thought of leaving the Austrian capitol, but in 1853 her mother, with whom she had lived till then, died. She felt lonely and miserable amongst all that reminded her of her loss, and resolved to leave Vienna, the scene of her first and greatest sorrow.

Her fame having spread throughout Germany, there was no lack of engagements. She decided upon Dresden, where an engagement was offered to her for seven years on terms so flattering and lucrative as hitherto hardly any German prima donna could boast of in her native country. From Dresden she made her first excursions to Hamburg, Frankfurt, Cologne, Brunswick, Berlin, &c. In all these towns she was greeted as the first living singer of the German stage; and on her last return to Dresden, shortly before Mr. Gye engaged her for the present London season, she was honored with the title of Kammer-Sängerin (chamber singer) of the court of Saxony.

The severe and dangerous illness with which Mlle. Ney was seized after her brilliant appearance in the Trovatore, at the Royal Italian Opera, interrupted for a time the successful performances of that opera; but they have now been resumed with more éclat than ever. She has been requested to prolong her engagement, now near its close, to the end of the season; but this she is prevented from doing by her duties at Dresden.

ROSSINI IN PARIS.—The anecdotes still multiply. Fact or fiction, they seem characteristic. At all events they make pleasant summer reading, so we shall not hesitate to copy further.—The Daily Advertiser translates the following part of a letter in the Courier des Etats Unis.

He is, as is well known, far advanced in life, and has been living for several years past in retirement at Florence, where he devoted himself to silence and repose. The old composer has turned his eyes frequently to France, where he was affectionately remembered. He had been invited from all quarters, from Naples, Venice, Lucca. They said to him—"Go to Sorrento, the land of perfumes, your mind needs a new horizon."

One fine morning Rossini got up in good humor and cried "Let us go to Paris, I want to see my old friends; if I must die, let it be so, God keep us." And so the old man started. It took him forty days to go from Florence to Paris, shut up in his carriage. The mere idea of steamboats and railroads made him fall into a swoon.

Within the last twelve years, all the roads which were formerly mail routes, are furrowed with railroads. No more inns, no more relays, no more post-horses in readiness on the way. Rossini trusted to luck. He sometimes waited for two days in a little town, to procure two quadrupeds and a postillion. When he reached Aix, it was impossible to go further; there was a total absence of stables and horses. His friends wished to carry him to a station and show him that he was needlessly alarmed at these winged carriages which flew across space with the swiftness of an arrow. He saw the smoke issuing from the engine and he fainted. This is the story. Finally, after many difficulties he succeeded in starting again in the carriage. It did not take him less than eleven days to come from Lyons to Paris. He is here at last.

To receive him, orchestras should have been placed all along his route, to play to him his chefs d'œuvre; but these ovations might have wounded his susceptibility, and for this reason doubtless no manifestations were made.

We have seen him again with his radiant smile, his eye full of frankness and vivacity, a brilliant converser, benevolent, friendly, and as formerly, his mind is always turned towards the gayest things of life. He suffers from an obstinate disease of the nerves, which prevents his sleeping. We are certain that he would promise, to any one who would relieve him from this suffering a pendant to "William Tell." But if science remains powerless, friendship is on the watch, and who knows if friendship may not conquer Hippocrates.

"Finally," he said to us the other morning while we were walking along the Boulevard, "here I am in the full light of Paris. What do you think, I feel that this motion of the carriages, this continual admiration, and the sight of so many faces relieves me and makes me breathe more at ease. One thing only disturbs me, it is the displacing of the streets, all the houses are changed—I do not recognize any of them." Verdi, his friend, came to embrace him, and the two masters who reign over Italy, poured out their hearts and their secret thoughts to each other. After Verdi came Auber, who is sincerely beloved by Rossini—"Will you believe," said he, "they have been tormenting me for the last fifteen years to write comic operas—have you not got Auber? No one can do it better than he?" He esteems also very highly Prince Poniatowski. He was one of the first who came to do him homage. "This is a privileged family," said he to M. Auber in presence of the prince: "if he and his brothers had not been great lords, they would have had a glorious name in music."

It has often been repeated that Rossini lacked the fibre of sensibility; this is another of the calumnies circulated about him. For more than thirty years, as is well known, our friend Mery has idolized the author of the Barber and Semiramide, he has written pages on these masterpieces such as he alone can write. But will it be believed, that whenever an occasion presented itself for seeing Rossini and talking with him, he has kept away out of a respectful timidity, which amounts to veneration. Rossini expressed a desire, on arriving, to make the acquaintance of our poetical friend. "Let us go and see the master," said Mery to me the other day, "but I confess I tremble at the thought of it; I cannot imagine I am going to see a human being." Before entering, Mery, who had not spoken a word for a quarter of an hour, grew pale and trembled. He stopped at the foot of the staircase, and could not go any farther. It was only by pushing, almost lifting him, so to speak, that I succeeded in getting him into the presence of the master. At sight of Rossini, an immense sigh stifled the voice of Mery, his eyes overflowed with tears, he began to weep like a child, and sunk fainting upon a sofa. Rossini, who till then had with pain restrained his emotions, was suddenly seized with a sort of nervous attack, and began on his side to give vent, in a gush of tears, to his inexpressible happiness. Madame Rossini, who was in an adjoining room, arrived at this moment, and seeing this affecting scene, could not retain her tears. It was a most moving spectacle. Mery still remained, he could not find a word to utter. Rossini soon recovered his usual gaiety, and in vain entered into his witty style of conversation. Mery could not recover his self-possession. Only on quitting the master he succeeded in saying, "I have had during my life, two admirations, Virgil and yourself—I have learned by heart the verses of Virgil, and I sing within myself your music, better than Rubini, Sontag, and Malibran." And in this way we parted.

All through the day and evening the house of Rossini is emptied and filled with visitors. The master receives every one with extreme affability, and his wife is near him like a sort of guardian angel, penetrated with the grandeur and dignity of her mission. Madame Rossini is one of those devoted hearts, one of those distinguished minds which suffices to the wants of this splendid genius, whom every one is now surrounding with respect and admiration.

The question is often asked, what will Rossini do? The more he is seen the more he talks, so much the more is every one convinced that he is not lost for music. His ideas have never been more luminous, his head more solid, his heart more warm; wait awhile and he may yet surprise us all.

Rather queer, if not fabulous, some of that! Especially those sentimental outpourings with "his friend Verdi, and his friend Auber;" though the latter sounds more probable. The Advertiser appends the following reasonable comment:

Rossini was born in 1790, and consequently is now sixty-six years old. The statement of the Paris letter-writer that he is in full possession of his faculties seems somewhat doubtful, after the account he gives of the manner in which the old composer made his journey. He certainly does not seem to be very strong in the matter of travelling, or to have very great command over his feelings on occasions which do not seem, after all, to have been very exciting.

New Views of Opera.

I.

The working of modern opera, in relation to publicity, has long been a subject of the deepest and most violent repugnance to honor-loving artists; they accused, however, only the corruption of taste and the frivolity of those artists who took advantage of it, without ever suspecting that this corruption was perfectly natural, and, therefore, the frivolity in question a completely necessary consequence. If criticism were what it supposes itself to be, it would long since have solved the riddle of error, and fundamentally have justified the repugnance of the honest artist. Instead of this, however, criticism itself merely experienced the instinct of this repugnance, but groped about after the solution of the riddle, with the same bewilderment as that with which the artist himself moved, within the error, in search of outlets.

I have, lying before me, the work of an excellent and experienced critic; a long article entitled "Die moderne Oper," in Brockhaus's Gegenwart. The author collects all the remarkable apparitions of modern opera, and teaches us, from them, most plainly the whole history of the error and its revelations; he almost points out this error with his finger; nearly reveals it to our eyes, and then feels so incapable of pronouncing with decision his reason, that he is compelled to prefer, when arrived at the point of the necessary decision, to lose himself in the most erroneous representations of the apparition itself, for the purpose of again tarnishing, to a certain degree, the mirror which, up to that time, was continuing to shine more and more clearly for us. He knows that opera has no historical (it should be, natural) origin, and that it did not spring from the people but from artistic caprice; he guesses the injurious character of this caprice quite correctly, when he points out, as a sad misapprehension on the part of most of the living German and French operatic composers: "that they exert themselves in the path of musical characteristic to produce effects which we can only attain by the sagacious words of dramatic poetry;" he comes to the well-grounded doubt, whether opera, in itself, is not a completely contradictory and unnatural form of Art; he represents—though, in this instance, almost unconsciously—this unnaturalness as carried in Meyerbeer's works to the most unbecoming pitch; and then, instead of pronouncing roundly, and curtly, the necessary conclusion which is almost already known to every one, suddenly endeavors to assure criticism eternal life, by expressing his regret that Mendelssohn's early death prevented—that is to say, postponed—the solution of the riddle! What does the critic express by this regret? At any rate, only the assumption that Mendelssohn, with his refined intelligence and extraordinary musical capabilities, must either have been able to write an opera in which the proven contradictions of this form of Art were brilliantly overcome and reconciled, or, from the fact, in spite of the aforesaid intelligence and capabilities, of his not being able to effect the task, that he would finally and satisfactorily have borne witness to these contradictions, and thus exhibited the form in question as unnatural and void? The critic believed, therefore, that he could only make such a proof dependent upon the will of an especially-gifted—musical—individuality? Was Mozart an inferior musician? Is it possible to find anything more perfect than every piece in his Don Juan? But what could Mendelssohn, under the most favorable circumstances, have done more than produce, piece for piece, compositions equal, on the score of perfection, to those of Mozart? Or does the critic want something else—does he want more than Mozart gave us? In truth, he does; he wants the great, uniform structure of the whole drama—strictly speaking—the drama in its greatest fullness and potency. On whom, however, does he make this demand? On the musician! The whole result of his penetrating survey of the apparitions of opera, the tight knot, of which he had grasped all the threads of perception in his skilful hand—he lets go, and throws everything back once again into the old chaos! He wants a house built, and applies to the sculptor or upholsterer; of the architect, however—who comprises in himself both sculptor and upholsterer, as well as all the other persons whose help is necessary to the erection of the house, because he gives an object and arrangement to their common exertions—the critic never thinks! * * * And yet, although unconsciously, he is on the road to salvation; this is, in reality, the road out of error; in fact, it is even more; it is the end of this path, for it is the destruction of this error, and the name of this destruction is here—the notorious death of Opera—a death to which Mendelssohn's guardian angel set his seal, when he closed his favorite's eyes at the right time.

Is it first necessary to prove the nothingness, in the detection of the error already stated, of the Art-form, opera? Can it possibly be doubted that, in opera, the music is employed really as the end, and the drama merely as the means? The most cursory survey of the historical development of opera gives us an unmistakable lesson on this head: every one, who troubles himself about the establishment of this development, would involuntarily—by his historical labors alone—detect the truth. Opera did not proceed from the people's plays of the middle ages, in which plays we can trace the naturally combined working of the musical with the dramatic art; but in the luxurious courts of Italy—and it is a remarkable fact, that Italy is the only great country of European civilization, where the drama was never developed in anything like an important degree—certain noble personages, who no longer derived any pleasure from Palestrina's church music, hit upon the idea of having airs, that is to say, national melodies deprived of their native and truth, sung to them by singers, entrusted with the task of amusing them at festivals; and to these airs were joined, involuntarily, and of necessity with a certain appearance of dramatic connection, texts in verse. This dramatic cantata—the tenor of which aimed at everything except drama—is the mother of our modern opera; in fact, it is opera itself. The further it proceeded in its development from this starting point, the more consistently did the form of the air, which was left as yet as the only musical portion, adapt itself to the skill of the singers' throats; the more clear became the task of the poet, whose aid was invoked for these musical diversions; and this task consisted in furnishing a poetical outline destined to serve no other purpose on earth than to supply the wants of the singer and the musical form of the air with the necessary words. Metastasio's great reputation arose from his never causing the musician the least embarrassment, his never making any unusual demands upon him, in a dramatic point of view, and in his thus being the most obedient and most useful slave of the said musician. Has this relation of the poet to the musician changed, even as much as a hair's breadth, up to the present day? It has, truly, in what, according to pure musical judgment, is considered dramatic, and certainly differs from the old Italian opera; but not in the least with regard to the characteristic nature of the relation itself. Such is the case, and, at present, just as one hundred and fifty years ago, the poet must receive his inspiration from the composer; observe the caprices of the music; bend to the inclination of the musician, in obedience to whose taste he must choose his subject; model his characters to suit the various kinds of voice of the singers, necessary for the purely musical combinations; provide dramatic foundations for certain musical forms, in which the musician desires to indulge at length—in a word, he must, in his subordinate position to the musician, only construct his piece on the specially musical intentions of the composer—or, if he will not, or cannot, put up with all this, be considered useless as an operatic poet. Is this true or not? I doubt whether the least objection can be raised against this statement.

Haydn's "Creation" in BETHLEHEM, Pa.

JUNE 29.—For the second time this oratorio of HAYDN has been performed by the pupils of the Bethlehem Boarding-School, an institution now flourishing under the auspices of Rev. Mr. WOLLE.

The "Creation" by boarding-school girls! A novelty, as well as a wonder! But I can assure you that the thing has not only been done, but well done. We missed the orchestral accompaniment, which on a previous occasion had filled up the beauty of the performance, but this omission was, in some measure, supplied by the piano accompaniment, presided over by a Swiss lady, an instructress of the pupils. With this exception and that of the male voices, the piece was performed exclusively by the young ladies of the institution, numbering upwards of sixty, and selected from among the most suitable in age and voice.

The arias and duct passages having been bestowed upon several of the elder pupils, one or two young ladies from Philadelphia and two from New York, were executed with extreme grace and purity of feeling. Indeed we can conceive no better interpretation of this Haydn music than when proceeding from youthful and newly developed voices, when the life is yet pure and the soul just enters upon its immortal career. There could be no better appropriation of the Haydn music, and I can assure you the present occasion corroborated this sentiment in its full force. It is in some respects a different order of music from that of the strictly artistic or that of the operatic troupes, where perfection often falls into the mechanical, since it drops around us the blossoms of life's early spring, in the shape of all those ethereally harmonious conceptions of Haydn, rendered by the innocent tones of the unsophisticated girl. What a contrast between such a composition and the yellow-covered music of the young misses who are reared in no other musical knowledge than the polka or the love-song! How it chastens and elevates the imagination both of hearer and performer, when such thoughts become the theme of study!

In the immortal Third Part, you particularly feel the adaptation of the maiden voice, the delicate and modest delivery of idyllic sentiment, that constitute the concluding passages of the "Creation" one of the finest melismatic emanations of the human mind. I could make no better suggestion to all such institutions as may be able to vie with that at Bethlehem, than to try this oratorio, or passages from it, if they can do no better, in order to purify and establish the taste of their pupils.

Haydn's "Creation" is ever-enduring, as a work of that pure and sacred tone of thought and emotion which runs throughout our common humanity. Its universality of feeling will make it live forever, even as our simplest English poetry, proceeding from bards of a century ago, never dies. I would say to all institutions or musical clubs or associations, try Haydn's "Creation," as your noblest exercise, as your highest vocal aspiration.

In connection with this performance, I have to note the fact that the "Creation" was first introduced in America, as the Bethlehemites claim, by themselves, in the year 1822. About that time Mr. HUFFELDT, being on a visit to that place, was furnished with a copy of the work, and he is said to have given the first performance in Philadelphia. In the year 1823, the amateur citizens themselves produced it, and it was also attempted, with quite good success, the same year, at the village of Nazareth, with the co-operation of the Bethlehem performers. Since that time, the old "Creation," as well as many other kindred oratorios and classical compositions of MOZART, BEETHOVEN, SPOHR, MENDELSSOHN, ROMBERG, and others, has been a standing favorite at this early birth-place of sacred and lyric song in America.*

The same gentleman who personated the Adam of the first "Creation," thirty-two years since, still stands up in all the vigor of three-score, (as I should presume,) and with the youthful warmth of a rejuvenescence, in the closing duettos, those chefs d'œuvre of idyllic melody. This is my old friend, Mr. WEISS, an old esteemed citizen of Bethlehem, whose inner life has ever been within the realms of tone. When he first essayed his Raphael, last evening, I thought that age had been gently at work, and that the voice would no longer do the bidding of its master. But a second, or rather a third effort, dispelled the illusion, and my worthy friend came out from behind the mist, as in the days of yore. When he assumes Adam, he is said to be fully in his element. Maiden after maiden, (through successive generations,) who were his partners in these pastoral passages, have passed from the scene, and some mayhap from that of life itself, yet Weiss still lives on in the glory of that elder stage of manhood which delights in recalling old achievements. I have also to remark upon the very commendable singing of Mr. ROMPFER, whose excellent and correct tenor voice, as well as his versatility in instrumental music, places him in a high position of musical proficiency.

Bethlehem, the time-honored and the historical resort, still stands on the banks of that old Indian Lehigh stream, in all its placid beauty. Some modern forms of innovation have in some measure changed the associations of the place, yet Nature's picture of the Lehigh and her green-clad mountains in the southern background remains the same.—When the old clock from the belfry chimes its quarters and its halves, when the sounds of genuine, classic music emanate from the old walls of that venerable chapel, or when at midnight you hear the footsteps echo on the pavements and the quartets sing "The Chapel," or Wo Kraft und Muth, you feel that it is Bethlehem still!

Many artistes of known celebrity have, from time time, directed their steps hitherto and made it their abiding place during the summer months. Not the least of these were the Bavarian HERMANS, some years since, and at a later period the lamented KNOOP, as also WALDTUEFFEL.

A congenial musical atmosphere was not the only attraction, since the general practical inspiration which seems to hang around the spot, draws within its embrace even those who have no regard for the musical art.

Musical Chat-Chat.

In Boston the musical season is at length fairly over. Opera placards have ceased from the corners of the streets, and concert puffs and advertisements from the newspapers. Thank Heaven! will the most inveterate concert-goer say, in such days with the thermometer at ninety. The only strains now heard abroad are those of the street organs (orgues de Barbarie) and brass bands. A pleasant sight it is to see the crowds upon the Common one of these lovely evenings, standing or stretched upon the grass upon the slopes of the broad amphitheatre, listening to the music of these bands, and often hearty in their applause of the best things. We heard fine playing there the other night by the Germania Serenade Band; fine playing, too, with several really good selections on the evening of the Fourth, by one of the other bands, near which we chanced to stand, (we think it was the Brigade;) and from one of the Circus bands upon the Public Garden, there came wafted to us on a welcome breeze, that sprang up as we crossed the Common at noon day, the rich strains of the Felsenwäule overture; it was neatly, tastefully and expressively performed entire, although the instruments were all of brass, (the more's the pity,) as with all our bands. Patriotism seems to have inspired these to do their best upon the Fourth, for among the sounds that reached us through the bedlam of that day we many times remarked strains truly euphonious and musical; less screaming out of tune than usual.

In New York the hot days of the past week seem not to have driven away all music. Some melting strains were left. Silvery-voiced LOUISA PRUE has been singing in three operas: to wit, Balfe's "Daughter of St. Mark" (or "Catarina Cornaro"), the "Daughter of the Regiment," and the new comic operetta, written for her, called "The Queen of a Day." Then, too, they have had Negro Minstrelsy, of the real native sort, and in its more aspiring phases, such as Miss GREENFIELD (the Black Swan,) the LUOA family, &c. Don Giovanni by the LAGRANGE Troupe, at the Academy, drew two large and enthusiastic houses last week, and now the artistes may seek other, perhaps wholesomer than operatic airs and breezes on the sea-shore and the mountains.

The original score of MOZART's Don Juan, (so attested by the representatives of HERR ANDRE, of Offenbach, to whom it was confided for publication, and who purchased all the Mozart manuscripts,) after having been long in the market and offered to many libraries, has found a purchaser in Madame VIARDOT GARCIA. It is described as all but complete, and "full of interesting indicia and changes made by the composer's own hand.".....VERDI, it appears, found a new obstacle to the production of his Vêpres Siciliennes at the Grand Opera, in the threatened diversion of public interest through the announcement of ALBONI in the Prophète for the 29th ult. He wished to withdraw his work; but finally arranged it with the management that it should have twelve performances before Alboni should commence. This is one story. The Athenæum says, Les Vêpres is again postponed for alterations, and "the next opera in order at that theatre will be the Santa Chiara of the Duke of Saxe Coburg, by express imperial command: querre, as A dainty dish to set before our Queen?"

L'Etoile du Nord is said to be in rehearsal at Covent Garden, MEYERBEER having sent forward the recitatives which are to be substituted for the spoken dialogue in the original libretto.The German tenor, REICHARDT, now in London, is said by some to stand in the first rank among the tenor singers of the day.COSTA, the famous conductor, is to produce an oratorio of his own at the Birmingham Festival this summer. The "Messiah," "Elijah" and Beethoven's Ninth Symphony will also be performed.

It is reported that MAX MARITZKE is about to publish the "Experiences of a New York Opera Manager for many Unsuccessful Seasons.".....The citizens of Worcester, Mass., enjoyed last week a musical soirée given to his friends by Mr. CARL SENTZ, previous to his reunion for the summer season with his old comrades, "the Germanians," at at Newport. "Stella," who pleasantly gossips of such matters in the Palladium of that rural city, says: "The programme was an excellent one—full of variety and beauty; and the performances were, throughout, highly creditable to those who gave them. The opening piece, a sonata of Beethoven's, for violin and piano, was played by Mr. Sentz, and a young lady pupil, with marked taste and feeling. In this, as in the playing by the same performers, of the lovely Minstrel song and the beautiful Serenade of Schubert's, there was a strict adherence to the ideas of the composer, and a total absence of empty flourish, which, in these days of virtuosity, is truly refreshing. Mr. Sentz proved himself an able interpreter of the various styles of German piano-forte music, in his performance of a Notturmo by Schuloff; one of the Songs without Words; Chopin's "Marcia Funebre;" and Beethoven's sonata in C sharp minor, or the Moonlight Sonata, as it is generally called. His playing is characterized by a depth and purity of style which makes one lose sight of the skill of the player in admiration of the work performed. A very pleasing feature of the evening's entertainment was the singing of the Männerchor—a club, which, although yet in its infancy, shows the fine training it has received. The members have voices of remarkable freshness and flexibility; and their singing of the glees of Mendelssohn, Marchner, Zollner, &c. was in true German style of animation and expression."

Are not the people of Moravian Bethlehem, of whose performance of the "Creation" our correspondent writes so pleasantly, mistaken as to their having been the first to bring out that oratorio?

Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, JULY 7, 1855.

A Beginning, and a Hint.

For the first time, we believe, in the history of our American Universities, has there been a formal academic recognition of Music as legitimately one of "the humanities." The University of New York, at its Commencement, June 27, conferred the degree of "Doctor of Music" upon our distinguished countryman, Mr. LOWELL MASON. We trust it will not be many centuries longer before our Universities shall embrace Musical Professorships in their learned Faculties. Rich would-be benefactors may do as much good to posterity by endowing schools of Art, as by endowing schools of Literature, Theology or Science. Nay, an amply endowed permanent provision of the highest kind of orchestral concerts, oratorios, &c., in a city like New York or Boston, lifting these things far above the fluctuating patronage of half-cultivated publics, and so keeping the standard always classical and high, and ruling out all clap-trap and mere fashion, were as useful and as noble a disposition of a millionaire's abundance, as the bequest of a like fund for any sort of a new professorship at Yale or Harvard. Can Greek or Latin, Algebra or Logic, do more to refine and humanize and elevate society, than a deep, intimate love and understanding of the great tone-creations of the inspired masters? Can Homer or Virgil quicken the human soul more than Beethoven? And is it any extravagance of fancy to suggest that Handel's "Messiah" may have done as much good in the world as Dr. Paley's Ethics?

* In connection with this remark upon the "Creation," there is a good story told of a countryman, which happened some years ago. The "Creation," from its frequent performance, had become widely known, and numbers resorted to hear it from neighboring towns. Even the rural population knew it by name (Schöpfung, as it used to be sung with German text),—and a countryman happening to meet one of the Bethlehem virtuosi with his violin, addressed him thus: "Ich habe so oft von der Schöpfung gehört, spiel mir's ein mal." (I have so often heard of that "Creation," let me hear you play it once!)

These are hints which we think it behoves the fathers and wise men, the "men of eminent gravity" of our community to consider. Until recently the worth of Music, as one of the great means of intellectual, emotional and social culture, has been little known or dreamed of in this busy land, save by a few isolated enthusiasts, or small groups of such. But now there are thousands who will not hesitate to ascribe much of their best culture, much that is most precious and most soul-supporting in life's feverish and perplexed career, to Music; thousands who feel a debt of gratitude to it as deep as any feel to Plato and the great philosophers and poets, or to all the lights of literature and science; thousands who need not look upon that noble statue of Beethoven in the Athenaeum, to feel that there is as great and noble sphere for the devotion of all a man's intellectual and spiritual energies in Music, pursued as an Art, as there can be in any honored occupation. Now if this were as widely and generally believed, as it is unquestionably true, Music would be as liberally and variously endowed in Colleges and Universities, in lyceums and concert halls and lyrical temples and conservatoires in every city and large town, as any of the branches of scholastic culture have been from of old.

There is no lack of schools and colleges. There is no lack of funds, by subscription or bequest, for any needed number of professorships in any old or modern literature, in any branch of Physics or of Metaphysics. There is wealth enough, and the wealthy take a patriotic pride in these things. Whatsoever is expended upon public education is accounted well spent. It is among the glories of the merchants of Boston, as a class, that no subscription for a new observatory or telescope, or for the founding or strengthening of a scientific or a literary professorship, with a live man to fill it, is ever suffered to fall to the ground among them. Whose are the names borne by so many of the best foundations in our Alma Mater? They are the names of public-spirited, far-seeing, prosperous merchants, who saw the value of education to the coming generations, and who felt it a duty which they owed to their children and their country, to open, out of their material abundance, permanent fountains of such education in its several branches. Every month brings report of some munificent donation or bequest of this sort. Yet never so far do we hear of anybody in his will bequeathing fifty or even ten thousand dollars for the endowment of any thing musical. And why? Simply because the conviction of the usefulness of such an object has not acquired the sanction of society at large, has not become public opinion. Those having the means and will to benefit posterity, bestow their wealth, as others have done before them, upon certain old-fashioned, respectable, conventional good objects. Few seek out new and equally needed ways of doing good. Here is a wealthy and eccentric old bachelor, who has original notions and refined tastes of his own, among which perhaps a passionate devotion to good music, to indulge which he thinks it little to appear strange and visionary to his neighbors all his life. He believes in music; believes in it enthusiastically, extravagantly; cherishes it in his quiet way as the divine fire of his life; yet it is a hundred to one that when he comes to make his will, he will bestow all he has upon some conventional old form of charity, upon a hospital, a Greek professorship, a chapel, or what not, without its once occurring to him, inasmuch as it never has been done, that it is quite practicable, and would be an extremely useful thing for him to open a perennial fountain of that divine Art he so loves to those that shall come after him. But wait a few years; let Music become as widely prized and honored, as now Greek and Hebrew are, and here and there a dying millionaire will begin to think he has a debt to Music too, among his responsibilities for the true culture of posterity. We do not despair of this. No one who knows and feels the social worth of music, can despair of it. If it have such worth, it must ere long be generally felt, and then subscriptions, donations and bequests will come as naturally for this good object as for any other.

Two ways have occurred as worthy. One is to give St. Cecilia her chair among the fair and venerable "humanities" in our old universities. Another way, and one which would result in even more practical good, would be to endow a large permanent orchestra, under wise and strict conditions, for the frequent public performance in any city of the really great classical compositions of the masters,—or still better a Conservatory, which should embrace this among all the branches of a complete provision for musical instruction and example. We mean to agitate this subject, and from time to time develop these hints, under various aspects.

The London Musical World—Wagner, and Copying without Credit.

The London Musical World is translating for its readers the entire book by RICHARD WAGNER, called "Opera and Drama." This is much more to the purpose, than that constant and by no means elegantly rhetorical abuse of him, of which we have quoted a few specimens. This may do something to enlighten the world of those who speak the English tongue about the real spirit, tendency and purpose of the man, and we feel tempted to make extracts largely, thanking the World for saving us the trouble of translating. For Wagner is a man of genius and ideas, whatever his shortcomings or extravagances, and his criticism on the Opera, as now and hitherto existing, is one to be considered.

This reminds us that we have been saved the trouble of fighting our own battles lately with the said London World upon the score of "copying without credit." The New York Musical Review, whose labors have been similarly preyed upon in that quarter, and which moreover has provoked the satire of the World by its London correspondent's admiration and defence of Wagner, has gallantly and generously come to our rescue, noticing the World's retaliatory charges upon us. The London World contained what seemed an editorial of its own about Wagner, which was almost word for word identical with an article by our New York contemporary. On being charged therewith it made virulent reply in its issue of May 12, saying among other things:

The article of Wagner, alluded to above, was, historically, an abridgement of one which appeared in the columns of our abusive contemporary, who had himself remodelled it from one much longer, and much better, in Dwight's Journal of Music, the best Art-paper in America. These were "the sources in our possession." The opinions were our own—quite opposed to those of the New World, which knows little or nothing of Wagner; and these were derived from "personal experience." When we inform our readers, that the editors of transatlantic music—"sheets," (even friend Dwight), have been for years in the habit of borrowing from us wholesale, with or without acknowledgement, they will be inclined to smile at the outcry of our injured contemporary, who has scarcely ever an article worth reading of his own concoction.

To this the Musical Review replies, justly and truly, as we think:

If so, why did not this editor abridge the "much better" article instead of ours? The fact is, there is no resemblance between the two articles, and the writer of that in the Gazette (now Review) never heard of the existence of the other until the appearance of the present charge. The Musical World accuses Dwight's Journal of stealing from its columns. Those who know Mr. Dwight have too much respect for his intelligence to believe he would steal from that source, and too much confidence in his integrity to believe he would willfully take any thing without credit.

One of the best things in the Musical World article, is the remark that, "the English press is so represented that not one living being can honestly cast a stone at any one of its representatives. They may be wrong, even incompetent; but they are upright and honest to a man." Verily! the world must have grown honest since Diogenes' time! However, we all know "there's cheating in all trades but ours." If all be honest, each individual of that "all" must be. A poor kind of argument, this, to prove one's honesty: but perhaps it is the best the Musical World could find.

The London World afterwards takes occasion to remark that it is translating Wagner's book "for the benefit of Mr. Dwight of Boston, and other Transatlantic journalists, who, pirates themselves, will not tolerate piracy in others."

This is very smart, to say the least; accusing us (and everybody) of what we for one do not confess, as if the smoke and bluster of such accusation could conceal the awkwardness of the confession on your own part! When you say we borrow from you "with or without acknowledgment," why not state definitely and frankly which? Once for all we declare, as a careful comparison of the two papers will confirm, that we have in no instance copied or quoted an article purporting to be original from the London Musical World, without giving credit to that source. With credit we have copied frequently and largely, as our readers know. Many things also we have copied in the shape of summaries of Foreign News, little scraps of information, floating paragraphs of solid matter, such as we find in every paper, and for which we give no credit, since there is no knowing in such cases whom to credit. This is the universal practice in all journalizing. We may once or twice, too, have failed to state that we found a certain translation, which we published, in the Musical World; but it was in the want of evidence that said translation originally emanated from that source and was not a borrowed article as we there found it. We believe there is no established principle of newspaper ethics that condemns this. It is idle therefore for the World to try to confound this sort of borrowing with its own habit of copying without credit original editorial articles and translations made expressly for the American journals, which it would fain include in one unblushing, jolly piratical fraternity with itself. But enough said. We shall still take pleasure in transferring to our columns, when we have room, and with credit, any good things, or interesting, which our august and enterprising transatlantic senior may send us.

Music among the Blind.

By invitation of Dr. HOWE, the superintendent of the Perkins Institution for the Blind, at South Boston, we had the pleasure last week of witnessing the musical proficiency of the pupils. Music, as all know, enters largely into the system of education pursued in such institutions, and has proved an invaluable resource to those unfortunately cut off from the delights and the refining influences of the sense of sight. 'Heavenly Music' it must indeed be to them. It was at the closing of the term, and this opportunity was taken to show what had been accomplished, while the school yet numbered many of its older and most advanced pupils, who are not expected to return, but now go out to seek their fortunes in the world, armed with this fine accomplishment to serve them in the otherwise unequal contest. Some of them will be music-teachers, organists, singers in church choirs, &c., and are well fitted for these functions. One, a young lady of fine ability and rare proficiency, advertises in our columns for a situation of this kind, and from what we witnessed the other day, as well as from the report of her teachers, past and present, we do not hesitate to commend her claims.

We were highly gratified by the exhibition, as were a room full of visitors interested in music and in the education of the blind. From forty to fifty pupils, of all ages from six or seven to sixteen, took part in the exercises. They were arranged choir-wise across one end of the pleasant music-hall, in ranks retreating upward to the organ, the youngest children in front. When they sang in full choir, they were divided (more of course with regard to vocal aptitude than to true choral balance) in about these proportions: Sopranos, 17; Contraltos, 14; Tenors, 6; Basses, 8. Of these some have had instruction only a year or less, others have been pupils in the institution for many years, and under its former faithful teachers, as well as under their present successor, Mr. ANSORGE, a gentleman who has been through the whole course of thorough Normal training in Prussia, and who appears to unite benevolence and moral earnestness with true musicianship and faculty for teaching. We could not see but that the youngest members of the chorus took every note as promptly and as surely as the others.

A list was handed us of all the pieces that had been learned during the year, including a dozen grand oratorio choruses; seventeen three and four-part glees; over twenty hymn tunes; eight glees for male voices; twenty-two songs, duets, and trios; besides a number of simpler children's songs; and instrumental pieces, of which hereafter. From these we selected several pieces which were sung without previous warning. The Hallelujah from Beethoven's "Mount of Olives", and the Hallelujah from the "Messiah" were sung correctly, in good tune throughout, and with spirit. It was good honest four-part singing. Every voice was heard and every voice was true. The sopranos, as a body, were clear and musical, if there was no voice of rare beauty. We were particularly struck by the promptness and effectiveness of a row of small boy contraltos, who would be an example for any of our oratorio societies. These choruses were finely accompanied on the organ by one of the older pupils, who has a neat touch, which he afterwards exhibited to advantage in an elaborate fantasia piece on the piano. All that seemed wanting in these choruses (besides of course more bass and tenor) was that fineness of expression, that light and shade of sentiment, which it would be too much to expect. Let those who ever preach about the life of the senses as opposed to the spiritual in us, consider that the loss of any sense is the privation of a refining, spiritualizing influence; that, other things being equal, he who has all his senses best developed, is the most refined, most spiritual person. Where the heavenly hints of outward beauty find no entrance, there is naturally less refinement and delicacy of feeling. As a general rule, the voices of the blind are harsh, their manners coarse and awkward. It is much less so in this Institution, where the whole system of education is liberal, kindly, harmonious and pervaded by the æsthetic spirit. Still, one cannot help noticing the drawback; in the singing of these children expression cannot quite keep pace with technical perfection. And yet how much has been accomplished, even in this higher direction, by the Institution for the Blind!

Other pieces sung by all together were the hymn: "Bowen"—sung in a style which it would be edifying to hear in any church; the "Marseilles Hymn," very effective; and the lively chorus glee: "Good Morning," in which the answers were passed about very promptly. The Angel Trio, from "Elijah," was very correctly sung by three young ladies, of naturally good and well-trained voices. Schubert's song: "The Last Greeting," was sung in unison by several sopranos, and in good style. A funny glee: "Johnny, can you count twenty-five," for two tenors and two basses, four on a part, was given with a relish, and no note missed in the sometimes intricate movement.

Of solos we heard only one, the difficult scena from Der Freyschütz, which was a creditable aspiration on the part of singer and accompanist, although rather a large undertaking. The list of songs included Adelaida, and others of this high class, as well as simple ones; and most of these pieces have been learned by all the voices of the proper compass: i. e. they have been committed to memory, note by note, so that each can sing them with more or less effectiveness.

For instrumental music there was not much time. We heard an organ piece, with short fugue, very clearly and firmly played by a young lady. Another played a Sonata of Haydn, in a way which showed good training, although the piece was marred, in the present instance, by timidity; and another executed the Adagio from one of Beethoven's earlier Sonatas, very nicely. The Fantasia on the Fille du Regiment, by one of the boys, and perhaps the best player in the school, has been referred to. Three classes of boys, and three of girls, are taught the piano. A class of six scholars have learned voluntaries, chorus accompaniments, and tunes upon the organ; and eleven boys have made considerable proficiency upon the violin.

Questions in the theory of music were put by the teacher and answered in a manner which left no doubt that most of the scholars have a pretty clear understanding of scales, keys, intervals, chords, resolutions, &c., and several of them showed at the piano a very ready faculty of modulating from one key to others however remote.

Upon the whole we found satisfactory evidence that the pupils of the Perkins Institution have been well taught in music. The teacher, of course, is not a little aided by the whole spirit of culture and good management that pervades the Institution; but his task can be by no means a sinecure, since every pupil must be taught every note by ear. Mr. ANSORGE plainly is the right man for such a place, and will carry on the work so well begun by their first teacher, Mr. KELLER, and continued by his worthy successors, Mr. HACH and Mr. WERNER.

NEW COURSE OF HARMONY, BY L. H. SOUTHARD.

The Publishers call the attention of the musical profession to this work, as one eminently calculated to lighten the labors of the teacher, and rapidly advance the pupil. It is emphatically a PRACTICAL work, serving both as a Manual of instruction on the one hand, and a Text-book on the other; and it is believed that the peculiar arrangement of the work, together with the very large number of exercises and examples, presents great advantages, to both scholar and teacher, over any similar work of the kind. Teachers highly commend the work. Mr. WILLIAM MASON says it is a work unsurpassed in the language. Mr. GEORGE J. WESS says that it is a work perspicuous in diction, methodical in arrangement, and sufficiently copious to embrace all the essentials of the general doctrine of accord. It can be ordered through any respectable Music-seller, and will be sent through the mail on the receipt of the price, ($1.75,) postage prepaid.

NEW AESTHETIC JOURNAL.

THE CRAYON,
A Weekly Paper devoted to ART, offers itself to the attention of all who are interested in the elevating and refining influences of Beauty. Among the contributors to THE CRAYON already are BRYANT, LOWELL, STUART, REMBRANDT PAUL, A. B. DURAND, President of the National Academy of Design, DANIEL HUNTINGTON, HENRY K. BROWN, and amongst those engaged are LONGFELLOW, BAYARD TAYLOR, GEO. WM. CURTIS, REV. H. W. BROWDER, REV. SAMUEL OSWOOD, REV. H. W. BELLOWS, HOM. CHARLES SUMNER, and others of our most eminent writers. A series of papers by BUSKIN, and essays left by the eminent sculptor, HORATIO GREENOUGH, add to the interest of The Crayon.

From the Cincinnati Gazette.
We have already strongly recommended THE CRAYON, and every succeeding number proves it to be more and more worthy of all we have said in its praise. No Journal, devoted to Art, has ever been so ably conducted, in this country; and if it meets with the support it so richly deserves, we have no doubt that it will exert a most wholesome influence upon the taste of the country.

Translated for this Journal.

An Opus II.

BY ROBERT SCHUMANN. (1831.)

The other day Eusebius stepped softly to my door. You know the ironical, inquiring smile upon that pale face of his. I sat with Florestan at the piano. Florestan, as you know, is one of those singular musical men, who anticipate as it were beforehand all that is future, new, extraordinary. But this time a surprise awaited him. With the words: "Hats off, gentlemen, a genius!", Eusebius unrolled a piece of music. We were not allowed to see the title. I fingered over the leaves in a listless manner; there is something fascinating in this muffled enjoyment of music, without sounds. Besides, it seems to me, every composer has his own peculiar note-forms for the eye: BEETHOVEN looks differently upon paper from MOZART, somewhat as JEAN PAUL's prose looks differently from GOETHE's. But here I felt as if actually strange eyes, flower eyes, basilisk eyes, peacock's eyes, maidens' eyes, looked marvellously at me. In many places it grew lighter—I thought I saw Mozart's La ci darem la mano entwined through a hundred chords; Leporello seemed to leer at me, and Don Juan in white mantle to fly past me.

"Play it," suggested Florestan. Eusebius consented; squeezed into a window niche, we listened. Eusebius played as if inspired, and conjured innumerable shapes of the most living life before us: it seems as if the inspiration of the moment sometimes lifts the fingers above the usual measure of their power. The entire response of Florestan consisted, not to speak of a certain blissful smile, in nothing but the remark, that the Variations might be something by Beethoven or FRANZ SCHUBERT, if you could imagine them to be piano-virtuosos. But when he looked at the title page, and read simply:

and we in our astonishment exclaimed: "An Opus two!" and when our faces glowed with uncommon surprise, and besides a few interjections there was little to be distinguished, except: "Yes, this is again something rational—CHOPIN—I never heard the name—who can it be? at all events a genius—was it not Zerlina laughing there? or Leporello?"—really there arose a scene, which I cannot describe. Heated with wine and Chopin and much talking, we went off to Master Raro, who laughed a great deal and showed little curiosity about the Opus 2. "I know you of old," said he, "and your new-fangled enthusiasm—but bring the Chopin here some time." We promised to do so the next day. Presently Eusebius bade us quietly good night; I stayed a while with Master Raro.

Florestan, who for some time had had no abiding place, flew through the moonlit streets to my house. About midnight I found him in my chamber, lying on the sofa, and his eyes closed. "Chopin's Variations," he began, as if talking in a dream, "are still going round in my head. Certainly," he continued, "the whole thing is dramatic and sufficiently Chopin-ish; the Introduction, complete as it is in itself—don't you think of Leporello's thirds?—seems to me the least suited to the whole; but the Theme—why has he written it in B flat?—the Variations, the Finale and the Adagio, that is really something—there peeps genius out of every bar. Naturally, dear Julius, Don Juan, Zerlina, Leporello and Masetto are the interlocutors,—Zerlina's answer in the Theme shows her sufficiently in love; the first variation might perhaps be called somewhat distingué and coquettish—the Spanish grandee flirting very amiably with the young peasant girl. This is self-evident in the second, which is already much more familiar, comical and disputatious, as if two lovers were spiting one another and laughing more than usual. But how all is changed in the third variation! All now is moonlight and fairy magic; Masetto, to be sure, stands in the distance and curses pretty audibly, but Don Juan does not let that disturb him much. But now for the fourth, what do you think of that?"

"Eusebius played it quite purely—does it not leap out boldly and bravely and go right at a man? although the Adagio (it seems to me natural that Chopin repeats the first part) plays in B flat minor, than which nothing could be more appropriate, since in its beginning it warns us as it were morally of Don Juan. It is naughty, indeed, and yet how beautiful, that Leporello listens behind the bushes, laughing and joking, and that oboes and clarinets stream forth with such magical enticement, and that the full blooming B flat major so precisely indicates the first kiss of love. But all that is nothing to the last movement—have you wine still, Julius?—this is the entire Finale in Mozart—leaping champagne corks, ringing glasses, Leporello's voice in the midst of all, then the clutching and pursuing spirits, Don Juan running away—and then the conclusion, which ends in a beautifully tranquilized and real manner."

Never before, so ended Florestan, had he had a similar emotion to that awakened by this close, except in Switzerland. And that was in those beautiful days, when, as the setting sun climbed higher and higher up the highest mountain summits and finally the last ray vanished, there came a moment in which one seemed to see the white Alp giants close their eyes. One only feels that he has had a heavenly vision. "Awake thou also to new dreams, my Julius, and sleep!" "Dearest Florestan," replied I, "these private feelings are perhaps praiseworthy, although they are somewhat subjective; but however little of definite design Chopin may have had in these inspirations of his genius, I bow my head likewise to such genius, such effort and such mastery." Whereupon we went to sleep. JULIUS.

New Views of Opera.

II.

The constitution of music has developed itself in two directions in the branch of Art fixed by it, and known as Opera: in a serious direction—through all those composers who felt the weight of the responsibility which fell to music, when it assumed for itself alone the aim of the drama—and in a frivolous direction, through all those musicians, who, impelled by the instinct of the impossibility of solving an unnatural problem, turned their backs upon it, and, thinking only of enjoying the advantages that opera has gained from uncommonly extended publicity, gave themselves up to an unmixed system of musical experimentalizing. It is necessary for us, in the first place, to contemplate more nearly the former, or serious, side of the question.

The musical foundation of Opera was, as we know, nothing more than the air, while the latter, again, was the national song introduced by the singer to the aristocratic world, with the words left out and supplied by the production of the poetical artist engaged for the purpose. The development of the national melody into the operatic air was, next, the work of the vocal artist, no longer interested in the rendering of the melody, but in the exhibition of his artistic skill; he determined the resting points necessary for him—self; the change from the more lively to the more moderate expressions of song, and the passages where, free from all rhythmic and melodic constraint, he could, to his heart's content, display his skill alone. The composer merely arranged the materials for the virtuosity of the singer, and the poet, again, did the same for the composer.

We must firmly impress upon our minds these original relations of the artistic factors of the opera to each other, that we may, in what follows, perceive how these distorted relations became more and more confused from all the efforts to set them right.

From the luxurious craving of noble lords after variety in their amusements, the ballet was added to the dramatic cantata. The dances and the dance-melodies, as arbitrarily taken from the national dance-tunes as the operatic air was from the national song, allied themselves, with the coy inability of coalition inherent to everything unnatural, to the influence of the singer; while, by this heaping-up of elements totally destitute of anything like inward connection, there naturally arose for the poet the task of binding together in a combination, brought about anyhow, the display of all the artistic capabilities spread out before him. A connecting dramatic medium, which became more and more evidently a necessity, now joined, with the help of the poet, that which in itself really required no such connecting medium, so that the aim of the drama—impelled by outward necessity—was simply given, but by no means taken up. Vocal and dance melodies stood, in the coldest and most complete solitude, near each other, for the display of the singer's or dancer's skill, while it was only in what should, at a pinch, connect them, in the musically recited dialogue, that the poet exercised his subordinate influence, and that the drama was at all apparent.

Nor did recitative arise in opera, as a new invention, from a real impulse towards the drama; long before this speaking style of song had been introduced into opera, the Christian Church had employed it for the recitation of Biblical passages. The cadence which, in these recitations, soon became, in obedience to the precepts of the ritual, stationary, and common-place; only apparently, not really, any longer speaking, and rather indifferently melodic than expressively conversational, was next transferred, but also modelled and varied by musical caprice, to opera, so that, with the air, dance-melody, and recitative, the whole apparatus of the musical drama—absolutely, as regards its constitution, unchanged down to the most recent opera—was definitely fixed. The substance, too, of the dramatic plots serving as a foundation for this apparatus, soon became stereotyped; mostly taken from the totally misunderstood Greek mythology and hero-world, they formed a theatrical scaffolding deficient in all capability of exciting warmth and sympathy, but which, on the other hand, possessed the faculty of presenting itself for the use of every composer, to be treated according to his peculiar views, and thus we find that the majority of these texts have been set to music again and again by the most dissimilar musicians.

GLUCK'S revolution, which became so celebrated, and which has been wafted to the ears of many ignorant persons as a complete distortion of the views commonly taken until then of the constitution of opera, really consisted in the mere fact of the composer's revolting against the caprice of the singer. The composer, who, after the singer, had especially attracted the attention of the public, since it was he who always provided the singer with fresh materials for the display of his skill, felt himself injured by the singer's influence in exactly the same proportion that he was desirous of fashioning the said materials after his own creative phantasy, so that his work, and perhaps only his work should, at least, strike the hearer. Two roads were open to the ambitious composer, for the attainment of his end; either to develop the purely sensual substance of the air, with the assistance of all the musical means at his command, as well as of all those to be afterwards found, to the highest and most voluptuous fullness; or—and this is the more earnest way, which we have now to pursue—to restrict all caprice in the execution of the air, by an endeavor on the part of the composer to impart to the tune to be executed an expression suitable to the accompanying verbal text. If such texts were, in conformity with their nature, to have the value of the feeling conversation of acting personages, feeling singers and composers must long previously have thought of stamping their virtuosity with the necessary degree of warmth, and Gluck was assuredly not the first composer who wrote passionate airs, nor were his singers the first to sing such airs with expression. But that which makes him the starting point for what is, decidedly, a most complete change in the previous position of the artistic factors of opera to each other, is: that he enounced with consciousness, and on principle, the appropriate necessity of having both in air and recitative an expression in keeping with the accompanying text. From this period, the preponderating influence in the arrangement of the opera passes, most certainly, to the composer: the singer becomes the organ of the composer's intention, and this intention is, with full consciousness, enounced, in order that the dramatic substance of the accompanying text may be satisfied by being truly expressed. The only thing, in fact, attacked, was the unbecoming and heartless desire of the singer to please; but, in all other respects, everything relating to the completely unnatural organization of opera remained exactly as before. Air, recitative, and dance-music, each completely separate, stand as causelessly by each other in Gluck's operas, as was previously the case, and is so, almost always, even at the present day.

In the position of the poet towards the composer, not the slightest change was made; the position of the latter towards him had in fact become rather more dictatorial than before, since, after enouncing the consciousness of his more elevated task—with regard to the vocalist—he carried out, with more naturely weighed zeal, the arrangements in the construction of the opera. The poet never thought of mixing himself up at all in such arrangements. * * *

But it was Gluck's successors who first thought of taking advantage of this position of theirs for enlarging the forms they found ready to their hand. These successors—among whom we must comprise the composers of Italian and French origin, who, shortly before the conclusion of the last, and at the commencement of the present, century, wrote for the operatic theatres of Paris—imparted to their songs, with a more and more complete degree of warmth and truth of immediate expression, a more extended formal foundation. The old established divisions of the air, still retained in their essential characteristics, were fixed upon more varied motives, and even transitions and connecting passages drawn into the domain of expression; the recitative joined involuntarily, and more closely, the air and even entered as a necessary expression into its composition. The air, however, gained an important degree of expansion from the fact that more than one person—according to the dramatic exigencies—took part in its execution, and that thus the essentially monological characteristic of the old opera was advantageously lost. It is true that pieces such as duets and trios had been long previously known; but the fact of two or three persons singing together in an air had not fundamentally produced the least change in the character of the air, which, in the melodic plan and maintenance of the thematic tone once adopted—which tone did not exactly refer to individual expression, but to a general specifically musical disposition—remained quite the same, nothing being really changed in it, whether performed as a monologue or as a duet, except what was perfectly material, namely: the fact of the musical phrases being sung alternately by different voices, or by all together, by a simple harmonic contrivance, such as two or three voices, etc. To indicate this specifically musical element, so far that it might become capable of vivaciously alternating individual expression, was the task and work of the above mentioned composers, as is evident in their treatment of the so-called dramatico-musical en- semble. The essential element of this ensemble always remained in truth simply the air, recitative, and dance music; only, whenever, in the air or recitative, a vocal expression, corresponding to the text-foundation, was once acknowledged as a fitting exigence, the truth of this expression logically and of necessity had to be extended to whatever dramatic connection was contained in the text-foundation. From the honest effort to satisfy this necessary consequence, arose the extension of the older musical forms in opera, as we find them in the serious operas of Cherubini, Méhul, and Spontini. We may say that, in these works, is fulfilled what Gluck wanted, or may have wanted—yes, in them is attained, once for all, whatever natural, that is to say, in the best sense of the expression, consistent qualities could be developed on the primitive foundation of opera.

The youngest of the above three masters, Spontini, was so perfectly convinced of having really reached the utmost limits of operatic style; he had so firm a belief in the impossibility of his productions ever being, in any way, surpassed, that, in all his subsequent artistic efforts, which he published after the works of his great Parisian epoch, he never made even the slightest attempt, in form or meaning, to go beyond the stand he had taken in those works. He obstinately refused to recognize the subsequent, so-called romantic, development of opera as anything but an evident decay of opera; so that, on those, to whom he afterwards communicated his ideas concerning this subject, he necessarily produced the impression of a person prejudiced, to madness, in favor of himself and his own works, while he really only enounced a conviction, which could very easily be founded upon a perfectly sound view of the constitution of opera. On surveying the deportment of modern opera, Spontini could, with justice ask: "Have you materially developed, in any manner, the musical component parts of opera in any greater degree than what you find in my works? Or have you been able to effect anything intelligible or sound, by really going beyond this form? Is not all that is unpalatable in your productions simply a consequence of stepping out of this form, and have you not been enabled to produce all that is palatable simply within this form? Where, now, does this form exist more grandly, broadly, and comprehensively than in my three great Parisian operas? Who, however, will tell me that he has filled out this form with more glowing, passionate, and energetic substance than I have?"

It would be difficult to reply to these questions of Spontini in a manner that would confuse him, but, in every case, still more difficult to prove to him that he was mad, if he held us to be so. Out of Spontini's mouth speaks the honest voice of conviction of the absolute musician, who gives us to understand: "If the musician will, by himself, as arranger of the opera, bring about the drama, he cannot, without in addition exposing his utter incapacity, go one step further than I have gone." In this, however, there is involuntarily expressed the demand for something further; "If you desire more, you must apply, not to the musician, but to the poet."

But how did this poet stand with regard to Spontini and his contemporaries? With the whole growth of the musical form of opera, with all the development of the capabilities of expression contained in it, the position of the poet was not in the least changed. He always remained the preparer of foundations for the perfectly independent experiments of the composer. If the latter, through successes obtained, felt his power for freer movement within his form increase, he only set the poet the task of serving him with less fear and anxiety in the supply of subjects; he said to him, as it were, "See what I am able to accomplish! Do not trammel yourself; trust in my activity to resolve your most hazarded dramatic combinations, body and bones, into music." Thus was the poet merely carried along by the musician; he must have felt ashamed to bring wooden hobby-horses to his master, when the latter was able to bestride a real steed, for he knew that the rider understood how to handle the reins bravely—the musical reins, which were destined to guide the steed hither and thither in the well-levelled operatic riding-school, and without which neither musician nor poet dared to bestride it, for fear it might spring high above the inclosing fence, and run off to its wild, magnificent nature-home.

The poet thus certainly attained, by the side of the composer, increasing importance, but only exactly in the proportion that the musician ascended before him, while he merely followed; the strictly musical possibilities alone, which the composer pointed out to him, were all that the poet thought of, to serve as his standard for arrangement and form, and even for the choice of a subject; he remained, therefore, with all the reputation which he, also, was beginning to gain, only the mere skilful person, able to serve the “dramatic” composer so suitably and well. Immediately the composer himself took no other view of the relative position of the poet, than that which he derived from the nature of opera, he could only regard himself as the responsible factor of the opera, and thus, with right and justice, retain the position assumed by Spontini, as being the most suitable, since he could procure himself the satisfaction of producing in that position, all that was possible for a musician, if he wished the opera, as musical drama, to preserve its claim as a valid form of art.

ROBERT OF LINCOLN.

BY WM. CULLEN BRYANT.

Merrily swinging on brier and weed,
Near to the nest of his little dame,
Over the mountain-side or mead,
Robert of Lincoln is telling his name,
Bob-o'-link, bob-o'-link,
Spink, spank, spink;
Sung and safe is that nest of ours,
Hidden among the summer flowers,
Chee, chee, chee.

Robert of Lincoln is guilely drest,
Wearing a bright black wedding coat;
White are his shoulders and white his crest,
Hear him call in his merry note—
Bob-o'-link, bob-o'-link,
Spink, spank, spink;
Look what a nice new coat is mine,
Sure there was never a bird so fine.
Chee, chee, chee.

Robert of Lincoln's Quaker wife,
Pretty and quiet, with plain brown wings,
Passing at home a patient life,
Broods in the grass while her husband sings
Bob-o'-link, bob-o'-link,
Spink, spank, spink;
Brood, kind creature; you need not fear
Thieves and robbers while I am here.
Chee, chee, chee.

Modest and shy as a nun is she;
One weak chirp is her only note.
Braggart and prince of braggarts is he;
Pouring blasts from his little throat—
Bob-o'-link, bob-o'-link,
Spink, spank, spink,
Never was I afraid of man;
Catch me, cowardly knaves, if you can.
Chee, chee, chee.

Six white eggs on a bed of hay,
Flocked with purple, a pretty sight!
There as the mother sits all day,
Robert is singing with all his might
Bob-o'-link, bob-o'-link,
Spink, spank, spink;
Nice good wife, that never goes out,
Keeping house, while I frolic about.
Chee, chee, chee.

Soon as the little ones chip the shell
Six wide mouths are open for food;
Robert of Lincoln bestirs him well,
Gathering seeds for the hungry brood.

Bob-o'-link, bob-o'-link,
Spink, spank, spink;
This new life is likely to be Hard for a gay young fellow like me.
Chee, chee, chee.

Robert of Lincoln at length is made
Sober with work, and silent with care;
Off is his holiday garment laid,
Half-forgotten that merry air,
Bob-o'-link, bob-o'-link,
Spink, spank, spink;
Nobody knows but my mate and I
Where our nest and our nestlings lie.
Chee, chee, chee.

Summer wanes; the children are grown;
Fun and frolic no more he knows;
Robert of Lincoln's a humdrum crone;
Off he dies, and we sing as he goes,
Bob-o'-link, bob-o'-link,
Spink, spank, spink;
When you can pipe that merry old strain,
Robert of Lincoln come back again.
Chee, chee, chee.

Verdi's New Opera.

[Correspondence London Musical World.]

The long-expected, oft-announced, incessantly-rehearsed opera, Les Vêpres Siciliennes, has at last been produced at the Grand-Opéra. Its production was attended with considerable success—a success attributable to four causes, which I place in order of merit: 1st, The admirable manner in which the music was interpreted by Mlle. SOPHIE CRUVELLI and most of the other artists; 2d, the mise-en-scène, which left nothing to be desired; 3d, the inherent interest of the subject of the libretto; 4th, the music which Sig. VERDI has composed to illustrate that subject. Beginning at the fourth clause, Sig. Verdi, in my opinion, has written no work containing more beauties or greater defects; Les Vêpres Siciliennes resembles a mosaic, in which two artists of unequal merit have been employed. A merguez of elegant design and elegant execution is interwoven with another, coarse in conception and deficient in finish; want of harmony consequently pervades the whole, and the very beauties themselves mar the perfect success of the work, by bringing more prominently into notice the deficiencies to which they are allied. At times, the music is graceful, elegant, and sweet, suited to the situation it illustrates, dramatic in character, and admirable both in design and execution. But scarcely has the public expressed its approbation, and the hum of applause barely ceased, ere your ears are dinned with some stunning chorus shouted in unison, some air taxing the capabilities of the most stentorian lungs; or your sense of musical and dramatic propriety is outraged by music altogether alien to the situation, and unsuited to the scene. The second act of the Vêpres Siciliennes is probably the best which Signor Verdi has yet composed. It is full of beauties, and contains little to criticise. When the curtain fell at its conclusion there was a general shout through the house for the composer, who was led on the stage by Mlle. Cruvelli; where he received the ovation which he had justly merited. O! si sic omnes! In the very next act occurs the most important and dramatic situation of the opera. An entry of conspirators, an attempt to assassinate the governor, a separation between two lovers, and a father's preservation by his son, have supplied Signor Verdi with no better inspiration than a worn-out polka worthy of M. Alary, and ludicrously discordant with dramatic exigencies and propriety. Although Signor Verdi has achieved success, he has made no advance in his art, but, on the contrary, has produced a work which as a whole, is unquestionably inferior to Rigoletto and Il Trovatore. I will now proceed from generalities to details, and, as M. SCRIBE has, in a note at the head of his “livret” declared that “the general massacre known under the name of the ‘Sicilian Vespers’ never took place”—an assertion leading one to suppose that M. Scribe places historical truth on a level with that of his own fictions—I will give a short account of the Sicilian Vespers which form the subject of the present opera.

It was in the year of grace 1282 that these events occurred, which constitute one of the most tragical episodes in the world's history. Charles of Anjou had delivered the island of Sicily into the keeping of governors, whose cruelty and rapacity were inhuman even in those dark ages. The people were ground down by taxes and imposts, barbarously beaten, deprived of their wives and daughters by the lust of a brutal soldiery, and confined in dungeons such as still exist in the island, for the immurement of those who have offended King Bomba. The nobles were humiliated and disgraced, their daughters deprived of their wealth and confined in convents, when they refused to marry some chosen one among the governor's needy adventurers, while the executioner found constant employment in branding, maiming, torturing, and murdering, those who proved refractory, or revolted against the tyranny to which they were subjected.

The entire population groaned under the yoke imposed on them, and thirsted for vengeance. On the afternoon of Easter Tuesday, the 31st of March, 1282, the people repaired to vespers at the church of the Saint Esprit, about a mile from Palermo, to celebrate the third day of Easter. The church was filled to overflowing, and those who were excluded from its walls formed themselves into groups on the adjacent grass or in the neighboring gardens. “Mirth and youthful jollity” everywhere prevailed, and dancing and singing were the order of the day. A few of the French soldiers constituting the garrison joined the fair dancers, whose lips they pressed and whose waists they encircled in that free and easy manner so natural to the Gauls, but so likely to lead to “explanations” when the owner of the pressed lips or encircled waist revolts against such familiarity. Accordingly a murmur passed through the group of Palermitan bystanders, whereon the soldiers added jeering to insult. Stones were thrown, and, on the troops defending themselves, knives, daggers, and hatchets were soon brought into play. A scene of terrible carnage then commenced, with shouts “Death to the French.” The butchery, at once begun, was continued for the space of a whole month, and during that period a number of Frenchmen were put to death, by some historians estimated at 20,000, by none at less than 10,000. John of Procida was among the most active leaders in this revolt, and his name and exploits, forming the theme of many a poem and romance, have now been celebrated by MM. Scribe and Verdi in the opera of Les Vêpres Siciliennes.

The curtain rises on a scene representing the great square of Palermo, with French officers and soldiers drinking and singing in chorus. Presently the Duchess Hélène (Mlle. SOPHIE CRUVELLI) sister of the late Duke Frederick of Austria, crosses the stage with her attendants, returning from church. The duchess is detained as a hostage at Palermo, and laments her brother murdered by the Governor. The soldiers demand a song to enliven them; Hélène—like Marcel in the Huquenots—at once complies with their request. She accordingly sings a cavatina replete with life, energy, and movement, stirring the blood in the veins of her Sicilian hearers, who with loud shouts repeat the refrain, and draw their daggers to attack the French. There is but one opinion as to the manner in which Mlle. Cruvelli delivered this air, and all critics, whether friendly, hostile or neuter, have united to sound her praises. Just as the fray is about to commence, Guy de Montfort, Governor of Sicily (M. BONNEHEE), appears, and his dreadful presence at once calms the excitement.

No man dares speak, save one, and that man is Henri (M. GUEYMARD,) a young Sicilian, the natural son of the Governor by a native of the island, whom he had seduced and abandoned some twenty years before. This youth is unacquainted with the secret of his birth or the name of his father, and has joined John of Procida (M. OBIN) in his conspiracy against the French domination. He is beloved by Hélène, who is in equal ignorance of his paternity. He braves the Governor, who dismisses Hélène and all the bystanders. "Serve in the French camp," says the Governor, who dearly loves his unacknowledged son; "it is your only chance of safety." "I will not." "You refuse; then death must be your fate." "I care not." "Meanwhile, nevermore see Hélène." "I fly to her," says Henri, and the curtain falls on the first act.

The second opens with a charming scene, in a smiling valley near Palermo, with the chapel of Sainte-Rosalie on an eminence in the distance. John of Procida is alone, moody and thoughtful. He expresses his sensations in an air, O mon pays, tant adoré, which is interrupted by a chorus of bass voices behind the scenes. They shout, "Death to the French, new life to their country," and, as the voices die away, Procida resumes his interrupted song, which concludes with a stretta, quick, rapid, and admirably in keeping with the situation. M. OBIN sang this air to perfection, and fairly divided the applause with the composer. Hélène arrives, recognises Procida, and they unite their voices in hope for the deliverance of their native soil. Procida departs to add fuel to the flame commencing to burn among the people, and Henri is left alone with Hélène. He discloses his love in a charming duet, exquisitely sung by Madlle. Cruvelli, and to which M. Gueymard also did full justice. A passage on the words Moi! qui simple soldat, which forms an accompaniment to, and embroidery on the theme sustained by Cruvelli, called down thunders of applause, and the whole duet is graceful, elegant, and charming. But alas! the course of true love never did run smooth; an officer arrives, who forms an unwished-for addition to the lovers' tête-à-tête, and who bears an invitation for Henri to the Governor's fête. He refuses with disdain, and is carried off captive. He bears with him the antidote of love to the bane of imprisonment, for Hélène has promised her hand, if he will avenge on the French the death of her murdered brother.

Procida returns, preceding the conspirators and friends, who have united to celebrate the fête of Sainte Rosalie. Sicilian dancers, tarentellas, &c., follow in rapid succession.

The French soldiers are long espy the happy groups, and, throwing themselves into the midst, carry off the girls best suited to their taste; an outrage they commit in broad daylight, and in presence of their assembled relatives. Stupor, indignation, and rage, succeed each other in rapid order; the people give way to their passions in a chorus well suited to the scene, and when the voices of all, gradually increasing in volume, have arrived at the very climax of indignation, the chorus is interrupted by an ensemble of the principal singers on the words, Ils frémissent enfin, et de honte et de rage, which produced an admirable effect, and was much applauded. In the midst of these tumultuous cries, comes an air wafted over the waters, "in sounds by distance made more sweet." The enraged populace listens to the song, and presently beholds a boat freighted with gallant Frenchmen, and noble dames, who, escorted by bands of music, are proceeding to the Governor's fête. At the sight of their foes the passions of the mob are roused to violence, and, whilst from the boat proceeds a strain of sensuous music, voluptuous and love-inspiring, the stage re-echoes to the rude and impassioned chorus of the angry conspirators. This double chorus is united by the composer with rare skill, and the effect was tremendous. The curtain fell to shouts of applause from all parts of the house, and Signor Verdi—after long resistance to a call which would admit of no denial—was at length led before the curtain by Madlle. Cruvelli, to receive the applause which the beauties of the second act had fairly won for him.

Diary Abroad.—No. 17.

BERLIN, June 3.—Again settled in my little room, through the windows of which the notes of a thousand sparrows—are not two sparrows sold for a farthing?—and the air, fragrant from the gardens below, come with their soothing influences! The temptation is strong upon me to throw aside books and papers and wander off in the cool shades and by the still waters of the leafy Thiergarten. There I might hear Nature's music; the sighing of winds in the pines, the gentle rushing of brooks, the clear notes of thrushes, finches, and possibly, nightingales. Oh, it makes me half a hater of Republicanism to visit almost any European city and compare its public grounds, shady with trees, brilliant with flowers, offering each lover of stillness and solitude hidden recesses of thickest foliage, with the patches of ground, which some of our cities have had the conscience to reserve to the public.

But to-day I must write. What quantities of matter have been accumulating during the last weeks! It must be transferred, in part, to paper some time, and what little freshness is left is fast fading. In part—for if all were written out it would go no small way toward filling the new edition of Blank's works in forty volumes, 8vo. But let me go back to—

April 22.—Was it not Judge Marshall, who interrupted the lawyer with, "Brother So-and-so, there are some things which a Chief Justice of the United States may be supposed to know"? So there are some things which the musical reader may be expected to know; among them the remarkable preface to one of his works, which was written by that great German composer, who, learned in all the wisdom of the Italian and French schools of his day, struck out a new path, and waged war against them; inextinguishable, until they were extinguished. The principles which GLUCK—whose biography has been so mangled by Fétis—announced in the preface to Alceste, first triumphed in Vienna, and after the elevation of his pupil, Maria Antoinette, to the throne of France, and Gluck's re-appearance in Paris consequent thereupon, accomplished a more renowned if not a greater triumph there. Of all Gluck's works in the Italian style, we never hear a note. His German works—though written perchance to Italian or French words—are among the highest efforts in music. So it was with MOZART and HANDEL. Their early works are forgotten. Gluck passed away and MOZART, CHERUBINI, BEETHOVEN—great names—WINTER, WEIGL, and others of less note, followed, disciples of the author of Orpheus; and the influence of this, the true German school, is traceable in every work, come from where it may, which during this century has been successfully put upon the stage. How direct and vast the influence, which those years passed by the young ROSSINI in Vienna, where he heard the classics of our great Germans, especially Beethoven, exerted upon his style! What a gulf between the Di tanti palpiti music of his early works and those grand things on which his fame may safely rest as one of the greatest geniuses that have written! The influence of Rossini upon the later Italian school, is another of those things which the musical reader is supposed to know. Thus Italy gave music to Germany,—Germany has returned the gift with noble offerings of gratitude.

Well, Gluck laid down certain principles, which may however be summed up in this: Music in opera is to be employed only as a means of expression to the actor, and of exciting the sensibilities and passions of the audience; it is to be there, not for its own sake, but to heighten the effect of the drama as a whole. Hence when one, who has heard only the modern Italian operas, with their set airs and concerted pieces, their roudades and rhythmical riddles, comes to hear Gluck, the music seems to him a most extraordinary mixture of recitative and melody. The main thing heretofore at the theatre was to hear this or that singer sing this or that famous song; as a drama the opera was little or nothing. Now he is all afloat; recitatives run into melodies, melodies into recitatives. Concerted pieces are few and never written to display the singers. The music does not, somehow, satisfy him, so he at length gives his attention to the dramatic action upon the stage—wanders with Orpheus through Orcus into the Elysian fields; mourns with Iphigenia or shares the wrath of Achilles; becomes more and more interested—finds his sympathies touched in an entirely new manner, and shares as he never shared before in the jubilee of the final joy. Of the dramatist he thinks highly,—of the composer, he confesses his inability to see wherein his greatness lies; he did not think much of the music. By and by a light breaks in—it was the unostentatious, the modest clothing, which the composer had given to the drama, which so powerfully wrought upon him. Now he sees the greatness of Gluck. According to the principles laid down in the Alceste preface, the poet, the painter, the decorator, the costumer, the composer, and the ballet master are all equals; each doing his own peculiar work and laboring, all, to the one end and aim of producing a drama, which shall be as real to the grown up and cultivated spectator, which shall command his sympathies and affect his heart, as did the dramatized nursery tale, when a child, he laughed and wept at the Christmas pantomime.

This principle must commend itself to every thinker. If the music be the only thing—if the drama be nothing, as many seem to think,—let us separate them, give the drama to the stage and the music to the concert room. MEYERBEER, a slow and laborious composer, is governed by the same principle, and all the ridicule or argument in the world cannot convince me that he has not had, in his way, a certain degree of success, so long as I feel at "The Huguenots" or "The Prophet" how appropriate and touching are his combinations. He is no Mozart, we all know.

Mozart's perennial fount of melody, from which Rossini and others have drunk so largely, was what probably no other composer [Handel?] ever possessed. And here is just that wondrous something in which Mozart is alone and beyond all other composers for the stage. He never fails of having fully at command both modes of musical expression; the melody is the melody for his text, and the harmonic combinations are just as exquisite. Most composers are deficient in the one or the other. Our recent writers of one school give us polka, waltz or galop melodies, with harmony beneath contempt; those of the other school, learned and labored harmonies, which are tedious unto death for the want of the life-giving soul of melody. The difference in the result is that polka dancers sustain the one a few nights, and learned old fogies the other. A season passes away and the operas have disappeared like the leaves of autumn.

BEETHOVEN in his one opera placed himself at a single step with Mozart and Gluck. Fidelio is the most wonderful first dramatic work ever written. What might we not now have had from his pen, if the Directors of the Opera in Vienna in 1807 had accepted the proposals he made them! Who that knows Fidelio, the dramatic music in the "Ruins of Athens," the Adelaide, and his two or three scenas, and the Christus am Oelberg, must not mourn at the sad mistake made by the powers that were! Had he been called upon to devote the necessary time and study to vocal writing, Gluck and Mozart would not have stood as they now do, like Saul, "from his shoulders and upward higher than any of the people." I think VERDI was intended by nature for a composer, but I am afraid the genius given him,—like girls kissing each other,—is decided waste of the raw material. All this, and ever so much more of the same sort, better or worse, passed through my mind last night at the performance of "Tannhäuser."

[Having written thus far, I went down to hear and see "Don Juan" again. The Anna was Fraulein TIEDJENS from Vienna,—a tall, beautiful, noble-looking young woman, a good actress, and endowed with a fine, clear, flexible voice. She has but to Italianize her name into Signora Tiden-nanny, to come over and make as great a sensation in our country as that German girl, Fraulein DEUTSCH did a few years since under the name of TEDESCO; or as Sophie CRUVELL of Bielefeld is now doing in Paris with a h at the end of her name. The Zerlina was TUCZEK, now Frau HERRENBURG, excellent except at times oppressed with "wobble;" but allowance is to be made for an increasing weakness of the chest. How grandly this opera is here put upon the stage; it would do OULIBICHEFF's heart good to see it. For instance in the ball room scene, not a note of music comes from the orchestra; some thirty musicians, in three bands, play the minuet upon the stage, and the music grows fast and furious until, at Zerlina's scream behind the scenes, that strangely effective burst of discord from the orchestra depicts stronger than words the confusion and dismay of the dancers. So too in the graveyard scene, the statue of the Commander utters his awful tones to the unearthly sounds of an accompaniment which comes from the tombs—the orchestra is silent; and you must sympathize with the terror of Leporello—it is terrible, and so was the entire finale. How true is the instinct of genius! I was admiring again the other evening the fine art of Shakespeare in placing the comic scene, where Lenox and Macduff wake up the porter, just before the discovery of Duncan's murder—what a ghastly contrast! Just this effect is gained by the music in the supper scene, which precedes the entrance of Don Juan's awful guest. I was just mourning that Beethoven wrote no more for the stage; I now mourn that Mozart had none of the fine texts which have been wasted upon—better not call names. Yes, "Don Juan" is, musically considered, the greatest work ever put upon the stage.]

To return to Tannhäuser. I need waste no words upon a description of this drama, its successive scenes, the story and so forth; all this is on record in Dwight's Journal, better than I can do it,—I shall therefore simply record the impressions left upon the mind after hearing it for the first time, and that unluckily at the close of a day of fellowship and communion with an old and very unmusical acquaintance, 'yclept Sick Headache.

Impression 1. While Mozart, Cherubini, Beethoven and their school adopted Gluck's views, but still made the texts given them—and this lay in great measure in the character of those texts—more subservient to their purposes than did their master—the musician being far greater than the poet—the music therefore far greater than the poetry, oftentimes separable from it, most numbers being beautiful musical creations in themselves—WAGNER, on the other hand, is endeavoring to carry out Gluck's principles to their fullest extent. Having made the effects of single chords and musical phrases his special study, he throws overboard all the impediments of the musician and looks upon himself only in the light of dramatist; but a dramatist, whose verse shall be heightened in its stage effect not merely by the rules as given by Hamlet, but by all the power which lies in musical sounds,—not necessarily tunes.

Impression 2. That in Tannhäuser he has not fully accomplished this; the march for instance, the choral of the pilgrims, and some other portions being "regularly composed" music.

Impression 3. That one sees clearly by this work, that a drama in which the principle is carried out fully in every line, nay, in every word of the text—as it is said to be in Lohengrin—if successfully executed, would be appreciable and of interest even to the common auditor. For after the first feeling of strangeness was worn off, the musical clothing of the words would no more be thought of than the rhetorical inflections in the voice of a good actor, and yet like those inflections stir up the very foundations of the soul; and indeed in a still higher degree.

Impression 4. That, as a drama, Tannhäuser is faulty in the want of sufficient rapidity of action, in making too much of mere scenic effects, in the want of a due gradation of increasing interest to a grand culminating point in the finale; and in making the springs of action of too refined and delicate a nature to admit the necessary broad masses of light and shade.

Impression 5. That this may still be regarded as a work full of soul, and a remarkable argument by way of example, in favor of Wagner's theory.

Impression 6. That the author of Tannhäuser is not a very great dramatic poet, nor a very great composer; yet that this opera must rise to a high place in public estimation and become a stock piece on the German stage; but that it can never be given in any other language, nor indeed be fully clear to an auditor who cannot to a certain extent feel the force of the words of the text—those words which sprang from the mind of the composer already clothed in musical tones.

Impression 7. That when Dame Nature gives the world a man in whose single brain are lodged the genius of Shakespeare and the genius of Mozart, that man will be able fully to satisfy all the demands of Wagner's Theory, and his works will be the highest efforts of human intellect for the stage. But Opera, Drama,—what will they be?

May 2.—Heard this evening as performed by the Breslau Sing Akademie, with the operatic orchestra, FREDERICO SCHNEIDER's Wellgericht ("Last Judgment").

What a bore!

May 5.—Professor STENZLER of the University—a Sanscrit man—is also a fine musician. He told me an anecdote which MENDELSSOHN told him. When the great composer was a boy of twelve years and studying with ZELTER, the latter brought out various works of BACH, or at all events rehearsed them in the Sing Akademie (of Berlin). Zelter was one of those all-knowing men, who can improve every thing, correct all sorts of faults, and so on. This he was in the habit of doing by the cantatas of Bach.

"Well, Felix, how did you like the cantata to-day?" Felix expressed himself on the whole not fully satisfied, though the work just sung was by Bach. On further questioning, he pointed out certain passages as seeming to him unequal to the rest and injurious to the effects.

"Pshaw! I wrote that myself," said the old egotist.

This afternoon, in the music hall of the University, Mozart's Requiem by the Sing Akademie. What a strange crotchet that was which crept into GOTTFRIED WEBER's head, that this was patched up by Mozart out of youthful works to a certain point and then finished by SUSSMAYER! Who can hear it without feeling it to be the work of Mozart, the dying man!

Musical Chat.

JULIEN il Grande, of Crystal Palace memory, is expected in New York, with a new monster orchestra of unrivalled artists, early in August. It is said that he brings with him "a live tenor, the greatest in the world of course," and it is even hinted that it will be TAMBERLIK. But we have since learned that the recent conversion of Castle Garden into a depot for emigrants casts a doubt upon Jullien's coming to America. . . . The management of the Academy of Music, for the next season, has fallen, it is said, into the hands of Mr. ULLMAN, SONTAG's man of business. It is understood that he goes abroad immediately to engage an operatic troupe, and that his plan of operations is very large, and contemplates the furnishing of Boston and Philadelphia with opera simultaneously with New York, and the devotion of two out of five nights each week to German opera, as well as Italian. This plan ought to succeed. . . . We hear rumors of no less than three distinct German opera enterprises in New York this summer; one is already in operation at Wallack's theatre, where a performance of Fidelio, with Mlle. LEHMANN, as the heroine, is anticipated.

We had a pleasant visit this week from CARL BERGMANN and HERT ALBRECHT, of the Germania Society; both looking bright and well; the latter happy to his heart's content in his life among M. Cabet's colonists in Nauvoo, whither he intends returning after the summer reunion of the Germans at Newport. Shall we not send for Bergmann to conduct the Ninth Symphony, when our Beethoven statue is inaugurated? and shall not that occasion be made musically a truly noble one, and give an impulse and a tone to all our musical affairs for the year following? . . . We understand that another statue of Beethoven is to be modelled by our young townsman, WILLIAM W. STORY, now in Europe, whose admirable full length statue of his father, the late Judge STORY, now adorns the anteroom of the Athenæum.

Mr. C. BREUSING, 701 Broadway, New York, has recently made a large importation of Roman Catholic choir music. It consists of easy masses, by Mercadante, father Lambillote, and other composers in modern style, Ave Marias, offertories, etc., by various composers. . . . Bergamo, the birth-place of DONIZETTI, has erected a monument to that composer. . . . A French paper (so translates the Evening Gazette) thus describes the habits and appearance of VERDI, now conducting his new opera, Les Vêpres Siciliennes, in Paris: "He goes but little into the world, and lives very privately with a few of the least excitable and most reflecting of his countrymen. He is about forty years of age, resembling in appearance the Germans rather than the Italians, with none of the exuberance and excitability of the latter; on the contrary he is very silent, very much reserved, and rather uncivilized. His stern physiognomy, his light brown hair, his pale face and hollow eyes, his thin lips, all give to him a mysterious aspect, somewhat mitigated by his impassibility of manner. He visits no one, scarcely ever salutes his friends, seldom speaks, and is apparently lost in meditation. He is indeed a strange Italian!"

As a bonne bouche for 'Young Italy' we copy the following from a New York paper, which in enumerating the operatic prospects of the summer, concludes with: "And, we believe, there is a 'German silver' sort of an opera somewhere in the city; but he who can fall back upon Dutch gutturals after the celestial music of the birds of Italy, can drink lager beer after a surfeit of sparkling champagne."

HECTOR BERLIOZ, says Willis's Musical World, thus merrily comments in the Journal des Debats on the engagement of the late queen of the Grand Opera, Mme. STOLZ, at Rio Janeiro: "So Madame Stolz returns to Brazil for 400,000 francs—and insurance against sea sickness—and six servants—and four poets—and eight horses—the gratuitous view of the Bay of Rio, night and day—cloudless sun—real enthusiasm—rivers of diamonds—scarfs embroidered by the hands of Marchionesses—turtle doves and negroes restored to liberty after each performance, without counting the free men who become enslaved!!! How was it possible to resist? But we should resist at least, and not allow our sky to be pillaged, and our stars carried off, by those men of the Antipodes, who have their heads upsidedown!"

BOSTON, JULY 14, 1855.

Popular Amusements.

The recent Sängerfest, or Singing Festival of the Germans in New York, carried its moral deeply home to many a thinking, would be true American. Especially in these times, when "Americanism" is set up as a sort of politico-religious idol, when we are exhorted to maintain a surly, jealous and exclusive attitude toward all foreigners, and to reject foreign influence, the example of so much faculty of innocent and wholesome self-enjoyment in a vast mass of foreign population, met for no end ostensibly but pleasure, and in the midst of such a feverish work-day world as ours, is one from which we may well take a lesson. We are glad to see that it has led many of the newspapers, of all parties, even the most ultra American, into a tone of reflection, which we trust will not soon be dropped. It can but do us good to think about these things. We have been too thoughtless of them. Divided between money-making and politics on the one hand, and religion without much of "the beauty of holiness" on the other—between a barren puritanism of correct deportment and its natural alternative of stupid, bestial indulgence, we have somewhat as a people lost the art of free, spontaneous, genial, happy life. We are an unhappy people; none the less so that we are more prosperous than others. Prosperity is the bugbear tyrant whom we serve as anxious bond-slaves, fearing to call one moment of our life our own, fearing to live, in our unceasing, feverish pursuit of the mere means of living.

We are an anxious people, uncomfortably demonized and ridden, night-mare-like, by that which gives us power. We go ahead faster than others, but it is by a Centaur-like contrivance, by allowing so much of our real vital human Self to be absorbed into the lower animal, or the machine that carries us. Soon we shall cease to be men at all, we shall be so "fast." Your native American "live Yankee" wastes his life in rivalling a steam-engine; he makes himself a mere machine for generating power—power for what? And with what a solemn, pious, lean, hard-favored way he does it! With what a quasi-religious reverence he quotes his business maxims, his rules of principal and interest, and so forth! How he amalgamates unworldly orthodoxy with the most secular showman's cant in the advertising of his wares! How he practically confounds religion with his own selfishness, as generalized into prudential maxims!

Perhaps there are no people who put forth so much of will, so much of multifarious power as we; as there are certainly none who have so much political freedom, so much liberty and even license of opinion. And yet we have perhaps as little real freedom as any other. We are the slaves of our own feverish enterprise, and of a barren theory of life, which would fain make us virtuous to a fault, and substitute negative abstinence for harmonious positive living. We are sadly destitute of the spontaneous element. We are afraid to give ourselves up to the free and happy instincts of our natures. All that is not business, or politics, or study, or religion, we count waste. We have done it so long, that now we are like little children, unfit to be left to ourselves to enjoy ourselves together. Pleasure becomes intemperance with us; amusement, untaught, uninspired by higher sentiments, runs into the gross and sensual.

We lack geniality; nor do we as a people understand the meaning of the word. We ought to learn it practically of the Germans. It comes of the same root with the word genius. Genius differs from the other ruling principles of life by the fact that its methods are spontaneous. Genius is the spontaneous principle; it is free and happy in its work; it is a practical reconciliation of heartiest pleasure with the highest sense of duty, with the most holy, universal ends and sentiments of life. Genius, as BEETHOVEN gloriously illustrates in his Symphony, finds the keynote and solution of the problem of the highest state in Joy. Now all may not be geniuses, in the sense that we call Shakspeare, Mozart, and Raphael, men of genius. But all should be partakers of this spontaneous, free and happy method of genius; all should live childlike, genial lives, and not wear the marks of their unrelaxing business, or the badge of party and profession in every line and feature of their faces.

This genial, childlike faculty of social enjoyment, this happy Art of Life, is just what our countrymen may learn from these musical festivals of the Germans. There is no element of national character which we so much need; and there is no class of citizens whom we should be so glad to adopt and own as those who set us this example. So far as it is a matter of culture, it is by the artistic element that it is chiefly to be brought about. The Germans have the sentiment of Art, the feeling of the Beautiful in Art, and consequently in Nature, more developed than we have. Above all, Music offers itself as the most available, most popular, most influential, of the Fine Arts: Music, which is the Art and language of the Feelings, the Sentiments, the spiritual Instincts of the soul, and so becomes a universal language, and tends to unite and blend and harmonize all who come within its sphere.

A clergyman in the interior of the state of New York, one of the earnest, devoted, truly pious sort, in a letter expressing his sympathy with our "Journal of Music" enterprise, writes: "I wish we could cultivate Music sufficiently among us, to make it, as it seems to me it might be, a great antagonistic to the baser passions and animal appetites of the people, and even to render unnecessary what we in this State have just begun most seriously to quarrel about, 'a prohibitive liquor law.'" There is the true philosophy of temperance. Privation is not temperance. Prohibition may be even as great an evil as intemperance. It is but the fatal, fruitless, hopeless oscillation from one unnatural extreme to its opposite. The prohibition scheme leaves out the free, spontaneous, genial element of all true social life. You ask for bread, it gives you the bitter stone of a factitious morality. What makes men intemperate is the innate craving for excitement, for joy, for a free, happy feeling of some sort, and the blind rushing to the cheapest means thereof in order to escape the barrenness and tameness of their drudging, sober lives. If you would weaken the temptation to intoxicating drink, you must give the people other, wholesomer excitements. Teach them the art of enjoying themselves, like the Germans. Teach them to love Music. Kindle in them an artistic enthusiasm. Make their lives æsthetic; arm them with resources, not merely of the serious, intellectual and moral, but of the spontaneous and genial sort. Then the good things of this earth, the wine that maketh glad the heart, &c., will not have to be preached and theorized and voted and legislated out of all right to existence, in order that they may cease to be dangerous to natures to whom God has made them really congenial. Then men may drink and may enjoy and be as glad as little children, and yet none the less be men, self-possessed and erect in all the dignity of manhood. They tell great stories of the quantities of lager-bier drank at that German festival. Nine thousand dollars' worth, it is said, on the one day of the pic-nic! Yet no disorder, not one person drunk! It was a great sum to consume in that way. It would have gone far, invested in some permanent works or means of Art; it would establish the best kind of concerts in a city for the year round; it would place a noble organ in a Music Hall; it would purchase the finest collection in the world of casts of all that is valuable in the antique sculpture; endow a library, or what not. We say nothing of the economy of the thing. Our citizens would throw away as much any day in some mere formal, pompous political celebration, which means nothing, or burn it away in senseless fire-crackers; any amount do they willingly spend in noise and smoke, only without the joy, without the real heart's good that the German finds in his lager-bier and song. For to them the beer is a symbol, as well as the song. There is a sentiment about it. And it were well worth ninety times nine thousand dollars, could we imbue our people with that same kind of genial social feeling.

But we must keep space for the following pertinent remarks about the German festival, which we have saved up from the Courier and Enquirer of June 27:

There is not the slightest indication of any utilitarian purpose in the assemblage. It was neither political, nor commercial, nor religious, nor benevolent. Its object was not directly or indirectly to make any man greater, or richer, or better, except so far as man is made either or all of these by the hearty enjoyment of simple and innocent pleasure. Could any thing be more un-American! Here were men from the various towns and cities of the New England and Middle States who had left their business to come on here only to spend three or four days in walking, crowned and garlanded, in procession, in singing and the enjoyment of athletic sports. Men, not boys; hard working, sober men, not idlers and rowdies. What could be more un-American! * * *

And yet Germans as a nation are at least no less thoughtful, no less thrifty than Americans. Boast as we may of our system of education, there are more cultivated men among the merchants and mechanics of Germany than among the corresponding classes in this country; while in general thoughtfulness and devotion to the study of the great social, political, scientific, or literary questions, Germany is very far beyond us. The Germans who come here, always bring more or less money with them, and they are among the most thrifty and prosperous of our population. Yet they find much time—all of them, in fact, the exceptions being very rare—for mere innocent pastime, having for its only objects recreation and pleasure. * * *

Our joyless aspect has been so long noticed that it has become a national trait by which we are described and recognized. It was well said that if there be less misery in the United States than in other countries, there is also less happiness. We toil to live, and live to toil. All of us do it, rich as well as poor. If a man choose to retire from the world altogether, it is well; he can do so; but, whatever his wealth, if he remain in the active world at all, he feels that he must work as if he were working to keep himself and his family from starvation. He is on the swift tide of affairs, and he must ride upon it and rush on with it, or be overwhelmed and cast upon forgetful shores. We go about with anxious faces; we think of our business as we walk; it is with us when we lie down and when we rise up: it consumes us, body and soul. Great nervous energy—in which we surpass all other nations,—enables us to endure fatigue and accomplish great things; but our physical type has degenerated; we as a nation have less of that beauty which results from vigorous health and finely balanced organization, than any other composed of the higher races; and after our feverish toil or our feverish pleasure is over, we collapse at once into inertia, torpor, a repulsive taciturnity which almost amounts to moroseness. Able to put forth on occasion at least as much physical or mental strength as any other people, and having that perseverant determination which makes us continue our unflagging labor as long as body and soul will hold together, we have yet less elasticity of muscle and of mind than any other nation. We rush fiercely on to a certain end and there drop, successful but exhausted winners of a victory that brings us no joy; unless, indeed, it opens the road to another; when by some mysterious process our exhausted energies are at once recruited, and we plunge again into the struggle with unabated vigor. We have strength and spirits for work, but none for the serene enjoyment of quiet and homely pleasures.

Perhaps it is hopeless for us to attempt to live another life. Inexorable nature may possibly have doomed us to this existence of joyless toil that we may, machine-like, work out her great problem in this age and in this country. But this does not appear. There is no reason for believing that we would achieve less if we looked more like men with a smiling heaven above our heads, and a glad earth beneath our feet. We need not work less if we played more. The constant and systematic interruption of our toil by innocent recreation—not reading and lecture-hearing, and other "intellectual" employments, but hearty, homely amusement—has actually become to us a great national want. More than any other teaching, we need to be taught to be happy; and could we get a lesson from our German friends, their visit would win them yet a warmer welcome.

Letter from Leipzig.

JUNE 20.—Eight days in Leipzig have gone by like a dream—though the American delegation there is composed, by no means, of a dreamy set of fellows; at all events I have not found them so. They "dig" a good portion of the time, and if after dinner it is thought fitting to have a little fun over a cup of coffee—for that is the beverage, whose business is it? And here's to the American delegation at Leipzig!

What strikes me most here is the musical atmosphere in which the musical students live. I cannot say that the professors here surpass everybody else,—for instance I am inclined to place DEHN of Berlin, before HAUPTMANN or RICHTER of Leipzig, as a theorist—but that is not the point. Attention here is kept always upon the business of learning music; the entire musical man is cultivated. KELLY of Providence, and WILSON of Springfield are devoting themselves mainly to composition and the organ; but at the same time acquiring a familiar acquaintance with music in all its branches and in all styles.—PRATT of Boston devotes himself to the cultivation of his fine barytone voice, but when he gets back to Boston he will be found not a mere fine singer, but a man of musical knowledge, and high culture in other departments than singing alone. He will be found unrivalled, I think, in the execution of the deep soul-full songs of SCHUBERT and his school. Once a week the pupils of the Conservatory meet in the hall for music. At those which I attended we had stringed and pianoforte quartets and trios, sonatas, solos on instruments, songs, arias, German, Italian, and indeed from all schools, all executed by the pupils. Sometimes they are called upon to give their own compositions, and thus everything is done that can be done to lay broad, deep and secure a general musical cultivation. For instance; GOESCHEL, one of the finest singers in Germany, a most beautiful tenor, is vocal professor. I have been particularly pleased at the course he pursues with an American pupil—Miss JENNY BUSK. She is still quite young, not over fifteen or sixteen, and is endowed with one of the finest, clearest, most bird-like voices I have heard, and of a compass beyond anything I ever heard. Three several times she sang clearly and distinctly four octaves, the last time ascending the scales, through the whole twenty-nine notes! Here then is an organ of musical expression most rarely found, and one that must be dealt with most gently and carefully, especially just at this period of life. Accordingly the mere practising of vocal exercises is made to be but a small part of her musical education. She is called upon to devote a good portion of her time to the study of Italian, German, &c., a foundation is laid by bringing her into other classes in the Conservatory; so that when the time comes for devoting herself entirely to her vocal studies she will have that culture, that artistic mental development, which will give soul to all that her astonishing voice shall execute. I have great hopes of this young Baltimore lady.

What I rejoice at most when in Leipsic, is to see how, without any special effort to lead the pupils in any one direction, where nothing is said of Italian and German schools,—at any rate, where there is no quarrelling about them, and where they are fully and fairly represented, this general cultivation results in the formation of a taste true to the really great in music as the needle to the pole. It is the fashion of course in Leipsic to praise BACH, and to go into ecstasies over Bach's music. But fashion alone could not call out such audiences and chain their attention so, as one sees there on Saturday afternoons, when the Thomas School boys sing their two motets in the church. These are not always by Bach, by any means, but when they are by him, one sees the unmistakable signs of an approval founded upon appreciation.

Why, says one, a year or two since I thought the half of Dwight's Journal the trashy offspring of pre-tentious prejudice, and the talk about classical music all humbug. Now my highest ambition is to do something, no matter how little, or with how much labor and pains, to make the folks at home capable of sharing the world of musical enjoyment, which is now mine, but of which a year or two since I had no conception.

Another says, he really don't know what he shall do when he gets home. He expects the people will "make a row" if he gives them true organ playing, but he means "to put it through."

There are so many opportunities also to hear the greatest singers and instrumentalists, each in his or her own peculiar music and style, that a pupil of the Conservatory learns involuntarily to feel the true from the false and meretricious.

CORRECTION.—Our attention has been called to two misstatements in the communication week before last, signed "First Division," on the subject of our Military Bands. First, the New York Band and the Boston Brigade Band were spoken of as equal in numbers; whereas the former really numbered 22, and the latter 18 instruments. Secondly, the band which played on the last day of the parade, was not the Brigade Band, but some other. We do not suppose the writer meant to injure the reputation of the Brigade, or any other band, but we cheerfully make the corrections.

The above was intended for last week's paper, but crowded out by press of matter. We have since received a pleasant letter from the musical director of the "Boston Brass Band," who informs us that to that band belongs the credit of the Felsenmühle overture at the circus, as well as of the good playing on the Common on the evening of the Fourth, referred to in our "Chit-Chat." We are glad to hear it; glad to know that we have two good bands instead of one. We doubt not we have more. We have found no fault with the musicians who compose our bands; we have not said they were not masters of their art; and certainly it is no fault of theirs if the fashion of the day demands all brass, and if the military economies do not encourage the formation of large bands. Our quarrel is only with the principle (or rather fashion) of exclusively brass music, (a quarrel in which we doubt not many members of our bands sympathise fully with us); the only end of our remarks has been to arouse attention to the desirableness of bands composed as formerly of both reeds and brass, and numerous enough to be effective in summer evening concerts in the open air.

To this end we suggested, that a large band of this kind might be organized, either by private enterprise, or under the auspices of the city, more particularly for civic celebrations, processions, &c., including music on the Common:—a band for musical, rather than for mere military ends. With the military side of the question we have nothing at all to do. Of course, if small companies of fifty will have bands on their parades, they must be limited in number, and it is no fault of the musicians if they band their instruments together "in quantities to suit purchasers." Yet why not train in larger combinations? Why not have one "regimental band" (we think they call it), as in New York, which also would be available for music without muskets! But as to the military requirements in the matter, it is not for us to dictate or suggest; since, from our peace point of view, we really see no reason why the "pomp and circumstance" of war should ever clothe itself in music; the more "calathumpian" the accompaniment, the more in character, it would seem.

NEW COURSE OF HARMONY, BY L. H. SOUTHARD.

The Publishers call the attention of the musical profession to this work, as one eminently calculated to lighten the labors of the teacher, and rapidly advance the pupil. It is emphatically a PRACTICAL work, serving both as a Manual of instruction on the one hand, and a Text-book on the other; and it is believed that the peculiar arrangement of the work, together with the very large number of exercises and examples, presents great advantages, to both scholar and teacher, over any similar work of the kind. Teachers highly commend the work. Mr. WILLIAM MASON says it is a work unsurpassed in the language. Mr. GEORGE J. WREN says that it is a work perspicuous in diction, methodical in arrangement, and sufficiently copious to embrace all the essentials of the general doctrine of accord. It can be ordered through any respectable Music-seller, and will be sent through the mail on the receipt of the price, ($1.75,) postage prepaid.

IMPORTANT MUSICAL PUBLICATION.

We shall publish on the 20th of July, 1855,

BAKER'S CHURCH MUSIC;

A COLLECTION OF

Hymn-Tunes, Chants, Sentences & Anthems,

SELECTED AND ARRANGED FROM THE

WORKS OF BOTH ANCIENT AND MODERN MASTERS,

TOGETHER WITH MANY

ORIGINAL COMPOSITIONS.

BY B. F. BAKER.

This work is intended particularly for the use of choirs in churches; but it contains a complete series of elementary studies for schools and classes, together with a variety of pieces suitable for Singing Societies and Musical Conventions.

In the arrangement of the hymn-tunes, the editor has endeavored to combine simplicity and good taste; avoiding pedantic difficulties, and yet not falling into feebleness.

The subjects of the hymn-tunes are chiefly taken from the old masters; but as they have been more or less altered to suit them to different forms of metres, it has not been deemed necessary to give the names of the authors.

The hymn-tunes and anthems contributed by professional friends, are printed in their original forms, with the authors' names. The sentences, motets, and anthems contained in this work will be found adapted to the use of different denominations, on their various occasions of worship. In the hope that this work may meet the wants of choirs and singers generally, the editor respectfully submits it to the candid consideration of the musical public.

NEW AESTHETIC JOURNAL.

THE CRAYON,

A Weekly Paper devoted to ART, offers itself to the attention of all who are interested in the elevating and refining influences of Beauty. Among the contributors to THE CRAYON already are BRYANT, LOWELL, STREET, REMBRANDT PEALE, A. B. DURAND, President of the National Academy of Design, DANIEL HUNTINGTON, HENRY K. BROWN, and amongst those engaged are LONGFELLOW, BAYARD TAYLOR, GEO. WM. CURTIS, REV. H. W. BEECHER, REV. SAMUEL OSBORN, REV. H. W. BELLows, Hon. CHARLES SUMNER, and others of our most eminent writers. A series of papers by RUSKIN, and essays left by the eminent sculptor, HORATIO GREENOUGH, add to the interest of The Crayon.

From the Cincinnati Gazette.

We have already strongly recommended THE CRAYON, and every succeeding number proves it to be more and more worthy of all we have said in its praise. No Journal, devoted to Art, has ever been so ably conducted, in this country; and if it meets with the support it so richly deserves, we have no doubt that it will exert a most wholesome influence upon the taste of the country.

The Life of Music.

From A. B. MARX'S "Music of the Nineteenth Century."

If we follow step by step the course of Nature, we find that everywhere man first commences with his senses;—and so too in his music. I hear! that is the first germ of music; even the cry, which joy or sorrow rends involuntarily from the breast, first becomes aught to me, when I hear it. I hear!—that is as much as to say: I become conscious of hearing, I become aware of that which lets itself be heard. Whether it rest there with the mere fact that I have perceived something, or whether that something becomes beneficial, pleasant or injurious to me, already it has knit relations between me and the outer world; it can awaken desire in my breast, even were it only the desire to perceive a sound again, and consequently to produce the sound myself, in order that I may perceive it.

Here Music, on the lowest step of course, commences its existence. I produce, myself, I render audible the sound for which I craved; I craved simply to hear in general,—or to hear this given sound,—or it may be shifting sounds. In all this there is scarcely anything but sensual appetite; the understanding steps in only with the repetition of the one, or with the alternation of the several sounds, so as to establish a rhythmical observance of time and accent, and make the whole intelligible through some sort of order in the single moments of sound.

Thus far the whole essence of the matter is a purely outward play with sensible objects, (sounds), the individual purport and significance of which for the time being remains wholly unregarded. But the play-ground is a wide one and continually expanding; and the result, the product of the play is a more enlarged possession, a more enlarged power and dominion of Art. I hear, have a pleasure therein and a wish to hear again; produce something hearable by my own act, enjoy at once the sensible phenomenon and my own energy, which approves itself therein. In this mere impulse to excite the sense variously, to avoid wearisome monotony, to enlarge the sonorous arena, sounds of the most different quality were brought together; our varieties of instruments, from drums and tympani, cymbals and triangles, through the wind instruments and harps and viols, are thousands of years old;—the timbrels of Israel, the sistras of ancient Egypt, the flutes and salpinxes and lyres of India and Greece prove this. In obedience to the same impulse to open the widest path to the rhythmical play and alternation of sounds, has the tone-system kept progressively extending; thus the Greeks of old invented ever fuller and more extensive systems, and in our own days our pianos and our orchestras are continually stretching upward and downward into new octaves.

One may naturally ask, in the full feeling of what our Art of Music has become, whether what prevails upon that lowest step is already Art? For our raised apprehension it is not. And yet some important men have been unwilling to recognize in our Art anything but a play of the senses (KANT), or a play of forms (HERBART); LEIBNITZ has resolved it into latent, unconscious calculation; the treatises upon Acoustics (CHLADNI, BINDSEIL) have ascribed its interest to the greater or less simplicity of the tone proportions, just as man delights in the contemplation of regular figures, such as triangles, quadrangles, but "not in sept-angles" (KEPLER.) And how many musicians, from their words and works, may properly be called professors of the same creed, scoffers and deniers of everything deeper!—Rather let us own, that there, already there reigns Art—only not our perfected Art. Is the germ, the seed-vessel, out of which the future tree or living being will have been developed, yet a tree, an animal, a man?—yet these contain already the still veiled, unshaped future.

Yes, the progressive influence of these accredited impulses and strivings must everywhere be recognized, and cannot be ignored.

They have shown their efficacy not only in the region of sounds and in the tone-systems; they have created and disseminated Harmony. If already in the East and with the Greeks harmonic secondary tones occasionally chimed in with the principal tones; if in the Organon of the middle ages the melody was accompanied by a constant succession of Fourths, Fifths, and Octaves, thus laying the foundation of our Harmony; the only appreciable impulse to all that was the pleasure found in an increased sonority, in a tonally organized fullness of sound—I might say, breadth of sound, which at all events was more procurable through these rude harmonies, than through the union of ever so many voices in mere unison or octaves. It is the same thought which has introduced the Mixtures in our organs, and which keeps them there as indispensable. The entire old doctrine of Harmony rests, as its fundamental contrast of consonance and dissonance, as every one of its rules shows, throughout upon the purely sensuous perception and intellectual elaboration of the contrast between "the agreeable and the repulsive." The human mind had there gradually created a world of harmonies, in which their own attractions and tendencies (for instance, the resolutions of the so-called dissonances and dissonant accords) came forward and imperiously asserted their validity, by no means always in harmony with what would fain have shaped itself out of the heart and brain of the artist. To a higher standpoint, to minds "who could do what they would," was reserved the harmony of the artist's spirit with the independent spirit of the tones; while at the same time the shifting play with harmonies, unconcerned about their spiritual design and meaning, went on as before; so it was with the chromatic writers at the turning point of the middle ages; so it has been with thousands up to our very newest romanticists, who—with the any thing but romantic SPOHR at their head—riot in keys and harmonies, like swimmers in the waves, one signifying just as much as the other.

The same play has begotten Counterpoint,—and first through that effected the development of Harmony (as I have before suggested.) If in the Discant of the middle ages the voices strayed away from union with one another into a Second, a Third, a Fourth, and again ran together into unison;—if afterwards the Flemish contrapuntists (and after them the German, English and Italian) placed a melodic motive of three or four tones now in this and now in that voice-part, now held it stationary upon one degree or transplanted it to others, and now inverted it: what governed here was nothing deeper than the need of a tone-play, of change, so as not to become wearied out too soon, and of holding fast, so as not to fall into confusion and distraction. This character predominated in the whole middle age church music down to PALESTRINA—and beyond him. That no deeper meaning lies in all that melodic, polyphonic web of tones, the unbiased student, in spite of the halo which THIBAUT and other fanciful dilettanti throw around the later comers in this direction, must recognize, if he remarks that the same forms and formulas are expended upon the most opposite sentiments and words, and that any intelligent accenting of the word, any significant resounding of the mood or sentiment only appears in brief exceptions, accidentally—that is to say without any motive. And must we not confess the same thing even to-day of all the French popular melodies, of a great part of the German, of the greatest part of all Italian and French opera music, of the instrumental music, of the saloon music for "society" devoid of all deep and abiding interest, and grown blasé, tame and shallow?

And yet, in spite of all, this harmless play with tone-forms is a fountain head,—and one that never can be dried up—for our Art and for the well-being of humanity in general. From within outward stirs this play, and its attractive charm, in the very process of our life. The breath draws the vital air into the lungs; the air exhausted of its vitality oppresses, stifles us, and must be discharged to make room for the renovating inspiration. Expiration is deliverance, it is renewal of life's hope; its energy is a becoming aloud, is voice,—all higher life has voice;—voice is the blossoming of the breath, of the inwardly nourished flame of life. In the voice the two poles of life, joy and sorrow, are energetically revealed. In the richness of the voice the rich activity of the internal life process announces itself. In the voice my life announces itself in its many-sidedness and fulness, I feel it and others understand it;—and that is a feeling of self, a satisfaction even in the bitterest shriek of pain. That too is consolation; only hopelessness and absolute despair are dumb like corporeal death; for they are spiritual death. And in the same sense song, or rather "singing," that richest, freest, and most self-determining and limitless play among the sounds of my inner life, may be called the blossoming of the voice. So the tree rears its blossoms to the sunlight, and so shining insects and silken butterflies, belonging to this tree, like detached blossoms flit about those fastened ones, which have for their object to become fruit; just as the breath of life sends forth the voice, which becomes glorified in song. And this "from within outward" is met by the sympathetic sensual charm from without inward.

That is the fountain head of the tone-life in man. It must be inexhaustible, since it is born anew in each new man; it is as old as the human race, and it is eternally new. It, with all the joy that cleaves to it, is immortal as long as there are men, as long as man lives. Hence the suckling sings already in his way, and to his last days the old man; hence one sings (or whistles) when in danger or anxiety; hence the East had its mourning women, and we ourselves have our dirges at the grave.

But herein is the progress to a higher step already indicated and conditioned.

Verdi's New Opera.

[Concluded from last week.]

Act third commences in the cabinet of Guy de Montfort, at Palermo. He is informed that Henri, having refused his invitation, has been brought in as a prisoner; and the prisoner is led before him. In a duet of considerable merit, the Governor informs Henri that he is his father, and a phrase in the words

"Pour moi, quelle ivresse, inconnue, De contempler ses traits chéris!"

which was well delivered by BONNEHEE, was much applauded. Henri trembles at seeing before him his enemy, his father and the seducer of his mother united. He rushes from the stage and flies to seek Procida and Hélène, his lover and his friend.

The scene now changes to the palace of Palermo, where the ballet of Les Quatre Saisons is represented before the assembled court. Hélène, Henri, and Procida arrive masked; Hélène determined to carry out her scheme of slaying the Governor; Henri, who has not yet informed Hélène of the secret of his birth, resolved to save his father. She raises her arm to strike, but, at the moment the blow is about to fall, she finds her lover's breast between her dagger and the hated tyrant. Henri thence becomes an object of detestation and scorn to the conspirators, whose plans he has frustrated, and to Hélène, whose vengeance he has balked. She repulses him, declaring that he has lost her love for ever. Henri rushes from group to group, protesting and vowing, but his words are thrown to the winds, for the conspirators, in a chorus written in unison, and sung at the very top of their voices, refuse his explanation, disbelieve his vows, and the curtain falls on Act 3; the finale to which forms a most striking contrast to that which preceded it, being an ill-arranged combination of sounds emitted from many voices and many instruments—noise, et preterea nihil. Act 3 indeed is a failure. The trio of conspirators; the son trembling for his father's life, and divided between love and duty; the fair Sicilian bent on avenging her brother's death; and the stern patriot resolved on his country's liberation, can find no better means of expressing their feelings than the air de ballet, to which the dancers are pirouetting on their arrival. Were it not that Signor VERDI had on previous occasions treated us to similar eccentricities, it would be incredible that the second act, so impassioned, dramatic, and replete with beauties, could have proceeded from the same composer as this common-place, trite, vapid, and trashy third act.

In the fourth act, Montfort has arrested Hélène and Procida, and Henri comes to visit them in prison. He declaims an air intended to be grand, but utterly wanting in idea or inspiration. Hélène issues from the depth of the dungeon, and loads with reproaches the traitor who should have avenged her brother, but who has saved his murderer. Then follows a duet, wherein Henri confides to her the secret of his birth, and Hélène forgives him. This duet, "Ami, le cœur d'Hélène pardonne au repentir," is a charming composition, and sung sotto voce by Mlle. CRUVELLI and M. GUEYMARD—it was encored with enthusiasm. The tyrant descends into the dungeon, and orders the immediate execution of the conspirators, who take leave of the world in an ensemble: "Adieu, mon pays, je succombe." A "De profundis," chanted in a neighboring chapel, comes like the "miserere" of the Trovatore, to throw its gloomy pall over the situation. The condemned await their death with resignation, when Henri demands their pardon of the Governor. Montfort replies that if Henri will publicly acknowledge him as his father, his request will be granted; but this Hélène positively forbids, preferring to suffer death rather than that the hated tyrant should hear the word "Father" proceed from the lips of the son. She therefore marches resolutely to the scaffold; but the moment the axe is about to fall, Henri cries out "Father, father!" the headman's hand is stayed, and the pardon is granted.

But Montfort is not content with the pardoning only, and exclaims—

"Pour réconcilier la Sicile et la France, D'Hélène et de mon fils j'ordonne l'alliance."

The duchess refuses; she will never wed the Governor's son. Procida whispers in her ear, recommending compliance. "Never, never!" replies she. "Silence! it is a ruse," says Procida, and she gives a feigned consent. The whole of this scene is weak in conception, and puerile in execution, whether as regards the libretto or the music. The one is worthy of the other, and both are childish in the extreme.

The fifth act develops the idea that had suggested itself to the Procidan mind, and proves him to be wanting in invention, and commonplace in idea. There is no wedding without bells, thought he, and a bell shall be the signal for the massacre of the hated French. The chapel is prepared, and a chorus of young girls heralds the bride's approach. She arrives, and thanks them in a bolero, "Merci, mes jeunes amies," which, owing to the charming execution of Mlle. CRUVELLI, was enthusiastically encored. Henri arrives accompanied by Procida, who then details his plan to Hélène. At the moment the bells announce that Hélène has wedded Henri, the massacre will commence, which is to strike without mercy every Frenchman in Sicily. She refuses to countenance the scheme, and rather than be a party to it, renounces the hand of the man she loves. Her reasoning seems to be—no marriage, no bells: no bells, no vespers; no vespers, no massacre. Henri approaches to lead her to the altar, and is surprised, as well he may be, by her informing him that "Cet hymen ne s'accomplira pas."

The lover and conspirator are alike in despair at this determination, which thwarts the love of the one, the revenge of the other. A trio ensues, in which the tenor supplicates, for, says he,

"Tu veux me ravir mon amour"—

And the bass adjures, for, says he,

"Tu veux me ravir ma vengeance"—

Hélène is divided between love for her betrothed and devotion to her country; she stands irresolute and perplexed, when Procida gives the fatal signal; the bells toll, a group of men, sword in hand, throw themselves on Montfort and his friends, and the curtain falls as the massacre begins.

In this act the music is altogether foreign to the purpose, and utterly unsuited to the scene. Hélène sings a bolero, a polonaise profusely adorned with ornament and fioriture; she seems to have forgotten her murdered brother, her bleeding country, her feigned marriage, and her unslaked vengeance. Henri too has ceased to remember his mother seduced, his country enslaved, and busies himself with festival and gaiety alone. Who would think, when listening to the sound of these mandolines and castagnets, that a nation is about to assert its nationality, and to take the most fell revenge on its oppressors and its foes? But thus has it pleased M. Scribe and Signor Verdi, and the epithets I have bestowed on the fourth act are equally, or in a stronger degree, applicable to the fifth.

Of the execution, I can speak in terms of unqualified praise. Though the opera was not concluded until one o'clock in the morning, the artistes never tired in their zealous efforts to do their utmost for the composer and his music. Mlle. Cruvelli was indefatigable; Signor Verdi owes much to her untiring exertions, and to the wonderful display of genius, talent and art which she combined in her representation of the Duchess Hélène. She sang and acted with passion, soul and energy, and roused the audience to unwonted enthusiasm. Three times was she encored, and over and over again re-called before the curtain. She gave her first cavatina with great fire and vigor, murmured the romance à demi-voix with exquisite simplicity and grace, and vocalized the Bolero in the most brilliant style. Her carriage and deportment as she walked to the scaffold were noble and resigned; the accents of her voice in the scenes with her lover touching and tender beyond description. Her triumph was complete.

M. Gueymard also did his best, and, though always inelegant and ungraceful in his bearing, he subdued his voice and moderated his ardor, so as to escape the extravagance of gesture and singing to which he is too apt to yield. In the duet with his father and that with Hélène, he fairly won and merited the applause he received.

M. Bonnehee has a fine barytone voice, an excellent method, and a good style. He made the most of his part, though the idea of a father constantly repulsed is by no means a pleasant one to depict in action. M. OBIN was superb in the part of Procida, and looked a chief conspirator to the life.

[From Punch.]

The Musical Apologist.

We have numerous collections of music in the shape of "Treasures," "Bouquets," and other forms in which "Music for the Million" is administered; but considering that some of our celebrated vocalists are in the habit of not singing when advertised, almost as often as they do sing when announced to appear, we think that there is room for a new musical publication, to be called the "Musical Apologist." It is all very well to furnish a series of the popular airs of some celebrated tenor, but his unpopular airs are almost as familiar to the public ear, and would form a very voluminous series if they were to be put together in the way we have suggested.

We should be glad to see a work on the pathology of the operatic artist, with an exposition of the diseases to which great singers are subjected. We think it would be discovered that the maladies to which they are liable vary according to the season, and that the Bronchitis Derbyitis or the Influenza Ascotica will be found at about this time of the year, extremely prevalent. We have known also some very severe cases of a sort of theatrical syncope, attended with pressure on the chest, and a sense of emptiness, which has been observed to come over a singer or actress going up a flight of stairs to the door of the treasury. These and other maladies would fill a volume, if the subject were to be taken up by a professional man of adequate knowledge and experience.

Our object, however, in commencing this article, was to furnish a few musical apologies to be used at Operas and Concerts in the absence of any celebrated artist attacked with sudden indisposition. In order to give a medical certificate a character of fitness to the occasion required, it would be advisable that it should be adapted to the air advertised to have been sung by the absentee, and it should then be confided for execution to some substitute for the missing vocalist. Supposing, for instance, that a prima donna were announced to sing Una voce at a Concert, and in consequence of the money not being forthcoming, or from some other cause, she were suddenly to be seized with a severe hoarseness, the following air might be given with great effect by the seconda donna, who may have taken the place of the indisposed artiste.

RECITATIVE.

You know what we artists are,
When on payment we rely:
Disappointment brings catarrh,
Or may to the ankle fly.

AIR.

I'm grieved exceedingly to come before you
For indulgenza—I must implore you.
La prima donna—can't get her salary,
And sprained her ankle—in crossing a gallery.
If they don't pay her—why should they use her?
She's indisposed and—she hopes you'll excuse her.

The following specimen would furnish a good musical apology for an operatic tenor—absent we will say from a promised performance of some Italian opera, and having an excuse sung for him to a well-known air in Fra Diavolo :—

Upon his couch reclining,
Our tenor you might now behold
With a slight attack of cold—
'Tis his complaint of old.
Last night he went out dining,
And feeling just a cap too low,
Whene'er the bottle round did go,
The wine was let to flow.
Tumblers! While the brown meats they're eating,
Hock and champagne repeating,
Diavolo—diavolo—diavolo.
Although he should be playing
To-night—he doesn't feel inclined
And trusts—he shall the public find
As they are always—kind.
No more I need be saying,
For you the old excuses know,

How a tenor's voice can go,
When he has been so-so!
Trembling caused by the last night's meeting,
His burning head is beating,
Diavolo—diavolo—diavolo.

For Dwight's Journal of Music.

Music the Exponent of Emotion.

"Every one, as a child, has experienced a pleasure in studying the changeable forms of the Kaleidoscope. Such a Kaleidoscope is Music, although of an incommensurably higher grade. It brings before us, in a constant series of new developments, beautiful forms and colors, now softly blending and now harshly contrasting, yet always full and symmetrical. The difference between the two consists in this, that whereas the tone-kaleidoscope is the immediate emanation of an Art-working mind, the other visible one is but an ingenious mechanical toy. Would we elevate the operation of colors to a level with Music, and try to illustrate that operation by begging of the latter art, we should necessarily fall upon the device of the color-piano or the eye-organ, the invention of which evinces that, as far as relates to form, the two phenomena rest upon a common basis.

"It is an extremely difficult task to describe this independent beauty, or that which is specifically musical in the Art of Tone. Since music is the representative of nothing pre-existing in Nature, and has no tangible contents, any description of it must consist either in dry, technical terms, or poetical imaginings. Her province, in fact, 'is not of this world.' All the fantastic descriptions, characteristics and outward views of a Tone-work are figurative or erroneous. Where another art admits of description, it is here only metaphor. It is time that Music should be imbibed, as Music, since its proper comprehension, as well as its true enjoyment, must proceed from itself." — Dr. E. Hanslick, vom Musik-alisch Schönen.

The author from whom we extract the above remarks, in a treatise on the "Musically Beautiful," comes forward into the arena of musical æsthetics with the assumption that music, although it be the exponent of feeling, cannot justly lay claim to all that has been attributed to it in that department. We think that, in coming into conflict with those old and established claims, he has advanced some new ideas, and that he will find a school of thought ready to give him a hearing, and follow in his footsteps. The necessity we always feel of connecting thoughts of an orchestral nature with outward forms, leads to the constant alliance between musical imagery and some counterpart sought for in nature.

We profess to describe feeling by the thousand combinations of tones, that constitute the works of musical invention, but we have never, as yet, produced tangible names for these tone-emotions. If we adopt the analogy of colors, we can make some nearer approach to a representation or detail of feeling; yet, even with this aid, we can fall upon no effective language.

If each distinct musical idea, as we are wont to term it, were a language, it should be adapted to but one set of emotions, and should belong to them alone. It would not dare to depart over into any other province of emotion, but would represent a word-language in a musical sense, by remaining the exponent of emotion in one sphere only, and extending to no other. Such are the usages of written language, every grade of thought having its distinctive phraseology and forms of expression, so that no intellectual idea can spring up, without having its special representation in written speech. The pretensions of Music, on this score, are vague, doubtful and assuming.

Where the same forms of melody are adapted to similar or congenial emotions, we have no reason to doubt the claims of the Tone-Art; but where we find the same forms of composition, or what is usually termed musical ideas, used to express opposite subjects or contrasting feelings, we may reasonably conclude that Music appears before us with entirely false pretensions. The poet is able, through his ornamental structure of word-forms, to give us a subjective picture of Niagara Falls; but when OLE BULL attempted the same thing before a credulous amateur audience, he could do no more than work their imaginations up into a false belief of what they could not actually realize. His gentle chromatic rising and falling of stringed sounds, expressive of a rising and descent of emotion, the sudden burst of bass notes and chords, intimating, perhaps, an entrance into the sublime, may do, no doubt, for the occasion represented; yet the identical combinations of tone, grouped in almost the same position, have been used to describe scenes at total variance with Niagara Falls, and acting with opposite influences to those of this great natural wonder. The noted "Cramambuli," the drinking-song and jovial accompaniment of the German students' carousals, is adapted to sacred melody by our American psalmodists, a circumstance that would tend to show, if music were a language in the common acceptance, that there is but a shade of difference between the incitements of piety and those of the bacchanalian bowl.

This we may say in regard to the identity of tone-language to express opposite emotions; but the more difficult problem is involved in the question of the manner in which an outward scene can become the subject of a tone-composition. We are willing to admit that an outward action of Nature can give rise to a successful imitation of sounds, and thus produce an entertaining piece, the harmonious combination of the master improving upon the monotonous operations of external nature; but when instrumental music attempts to exhibit the subjective workings of the same scene, it departs, invariably, into the province of vague theory.

Before Music can become a language of emotion, in a strictly analogous sense, she must, necessarily, adapt all her tone-structures to specific purposes, allowing no one to act in the place of the other, but each to preserve its appropriate and definite class of emotional thoughts. What the exact state of the soul may be, while dwelling with mysterious and delighted gaze upon some great natural wonder, neither poet nor tone-painter has ever succeeded in revealing, let his work have been ever so loftily conceived, or his combinations ever so grandly brought together. Yet the right to that bold task can more justly be claimed by the musical composer than by any other, since the most highly wrought species of mental inspiration proceeds from the influence of modulated sounds, and the state into which they elevate the imagination is, necessarily, akin to that produced by Nature's expressive silence.

We can, however, give another construction to the term language, which would not altogether exclude it from the domain of Music, and that is when it addresses the mind by association.

When the Ranz des Vaches is heard in distant lands by the Swiss mountaineer, it recalls the memories of the past. It does ineffably more than this, by raising up before the mind's eye the whole picture of native scenery, outwardly grand and beautiful, renewing the forgotten tales of life, and recounting long-buried emotions. In effecting all this, Music is a language, addressing not only the sense, by the pictures of tangible Nature, but appealing to the soul by a power of tone-thought which nothing else could supply. In so far it is language, but becomes so only by association.

To describe a scene never beheld by the auditor of the piece, through intricate tone-combinations, is one of those erroneous assumptions alluded to by the philosophical writer, from whom we have made the foregoing extracts. Music can describe only that which the hearer has seen, and in doing this, association furnishes the key to the comprehension of the object of description. But even here it is indispensable that the hearer should have wandered amid the scenes and localities described by the tone-master, and enjoyed there with him each specific feeling. He must needs have seen the outward object as he felt the inward movement, which was intended to be fitted to that peculiar situation. This is all that descriptive music, subjectively designed, is able to perform. To attempt local description, therefore, except by the powers of association, to lead the imagination into an evening study, a woody shade, a twilight musing, is a fiction, and should be expelled from the theory of musical invention and romance. If we view it in the degree or intensity of feeling it shows forth, the analogy to language becomes more striking. Here, although the precise situation of the soul is not exhibited, yet the degree of its elevation is so nearly reached, as to become description, in a musical sense, and for which we have no expressions in a written terminology. To display this elevation, as well as a corresponding depression, is the aim and destiny of the Tone-Art. These antipodes of human emotion have no adequate psychometer in any form of practical word-language, and it has never belonged to the attributes of Music to record the intensity of feeling by the instrumentality of a harmonious mechanism; the interpreter, if not the language, of the soul's experience.

If we inquire into the reason why the musical composer selects a visible picture in order to give a name to his composition, we can find no other explanation than in the fact that the soul's perceptions have no nomenclature. By referring the imagination of the hearer to a visible scene, a common emotion is at once called into activity; hence musings by twilight are, in some measure, identical; and if a certain theme becomes associated with this occasion, it exercises the part of language. All word description must, necessarily, be confined within the limits of sense, expressing that which is tangible and felt, only in as far as it is seen.

Upon this ground also we find the mere popularity of music to rest, in the same manner that a popular literature proceeds from the actual events of life, the descriptions of noted scenes and genre details.

The pictorial art places before us all the outward scenes of life and nature, but how deeply the soul felt in the study of those scenes it has never yet revealed. This attribute belongs to the Art of Tone, and in denying its claims to do all it pretends to, we refer more to the phraseology of description than the intensity of effect which lies in music.

What it describes it does musically, and its nature can be comprehended only musically, and by those initiated into the whole sphere of musical thought, as we are obliged to term it. When the pictorial art resigns this species of internal description to the Tone Art, the latter may be said to begin where the former leaves off, but that both can move within the same sphere, is impossible.

To the painter emotion is a sustenance which is visible in the emanations of his pencil and breathes throughout his works. Yet the emotions conceived by him and giving character to his finest touches of lines and colors, lights and shades and proportions are described in the language of the pictorial art, which approaches the nearer to a language the more visible it becomes. The tone artist, treading upon ground which the painter cannot reach, or where he forbears to step, we think is somewhat justified in laying claims to a higher destiny than the other arts are admitted to. In the history of emotion itself we might find a clue to enable us to decide upon this disputed problem. Every one's own experience tells him the relative degrees of emotion proceeding from the study of the fraternal arts, and this degree of emotion is the true criterion by which to weigh the real worth and moral influence of Art. In judging of his own favorite branch of art each one decides according to the intensity of his feelings in its pursuit, and hence we should judge its whole value depended upon the sustenance derived from emotional influences.

It is a remarkable truth that the world of sense often leads us into the world of Tone. The most romantic localities are full of musical inspiration, and where the soul cannot discharge itself by the language of the pencil it resorts to music to express its joy. This fact has doubtless given rise to many pleasant fictions in the shape of outward scenes claimed to be represented by musical compositions. The music might have been written at the place attempted to be described, but it could not have been written of it. It exemplifies, however, very forcibly the necessity of the cultivation of the Euterpean art, leading us a step higher than the platform of Nature into the ethereal region which we term harmony of tone.

If, as we have already assumed, the composer begins where the artist ceases, if the limits of imitative art form the starting point of musical feeling, we can perceive the wide range left for its enjoyment. This lies extended over the whole world of abstraction, and the inventions of a musical fancy having no counterpart in Nature, no reality of substance to copy, but proceeding from the combinations of pure thought itself, always destroying its own harmonies in order to be able to reproduce them, and soaring far beyond the world of sense, its illimitable nature can, in some measure, be appreciated.

As this branch of human development extends we shall always be adding to our fund of musical thought, for which we have as yet but feeble expressions, and these derived from the analogies of a language which are but an indifferent substitute for that which we really need. Our nomenclature of musical thought must become more exclusively musical, before it can lay open its real meaning and designs to the mind and imagination. Every combination of tones, every group of symphonious representations, all the swells and cadences of rhythmical compositions, all those dashes of discord, which in BEETHOVEN, precede the beautiful ascents into harmony, and to which we could give no better name than the Beethovenism of tone-thought; all these and a thousand other forms should have a ready vocabulary, to render the science we are but entering upon, complete and open to the understandings of all.

NIGHT.

I.

O calmly, lovingly, Night vast and deep,
Bend round the breathing world! Thou cool-browed wife
Of fiery Day—he, stirrer of old strife—
Thou, soother, mother, in whose heart we keep
A hiding-place to dream, to hope, to weep!—
Who still exhaled in the purple sky
The old star-bloom of Immortality,— Wrathing our momentariness and sleep
With dignity so sweet and sovereign!
Happy the Earth to kiss thy brodered hem!
Her weak and flagging aspirations take
New pinions in thy shadows; thou dost make Love deeper bliss, and even care and pain
Are great and worthy since thou touchest them.

II.

Thou seem'st to solve the Eternal Unity
That holds us all. How far, and dim, and deep,
Bathed in the separate sanctity of sleep—
Lost in thy wide forgetting, do we lie!
Oh lest that dim abyss, where Memory
Beats her disabled wing and Hope is not,
Point to yet wilder deeps, unearth our thought
In thy far glances! Through the serene sky,
When day from the impurpled hills furls up,
And heaven's white limits fall, the Infinite,
Long crushed within, breathes forth its mystic pain:
From vast of height, and depth, and silence, stoop,
And lift with mystic faith its brow again,—
Call unto Peace the eternal child, dear Night!

III.

Darkness surrounds me with its phantom hosts,
Till silence is enchanted speech. I feel
Those half-spent airs that through the laurel reel,
And Night's loud heart-beats in the tropic coasts,—
And, soaring amid everlasting frosts,
To super-sensual rest, as it might outweigh
A whole world's strife, o'er me gaunt Himalah
Droops his broad wing of calm.—Those peaks, like ghosts
Outstaring Time, through darkness glimmering!
No rush of pinion there—not bubbling low—
But death and silence, past imagining,—
Only day in and out, with endless swing
Their aged shadows move, and picture slow
One on another's unrelenting snow.

IV.

Oh high-born souls, such as God sends to mould
His ages in—and you too, who have known
The pang of strife, and are at last at one
With Nature so—yea, all who have made bold
Our timid dreams, and proffered to the hold
A certain joy—come mingle in life's cope
Star-fields of verity and stable hope
With these swift meteors and illusions old.
I sent this summons through the depths of June,
When Life surged up so warm and affluent,
It wrapt the very whiteness of the moon;—
No wonder many came—they came and went—
And thou, who sleep'st half sad and wak'st with pain,
Thou camest too, and dost alone remain.

V.

So reed-like fragile, in the world's whirl nought, Beggared in earthly hope, alone and bare,— Heart pierced, wings clipped, feet bound, but grandly there,
Ay, and with odds 'gainst Fate, thou standest, fraught
With courage to know all!—Thus is thy lot
Worlds deep beneath thee.—Lov'st thou that keen air?
Thou ask'st not hope, nor may the falsely fair
Approach thy clear integrity of thought.
Such power, what shall we call it? For this time
Not love, nor yet faith—but eternity
Dilating the mean day. The spirit, free
And self-reliant, from its purer clime,
O'erruling earth, by spirit-law sublime—
God cleaving for thee, the remorseless sea.

Improved Piano-Fortes.

DRIGGS'S CONCERT.—A crowded and pleasant Concert was given last evening at Dodworth's Rooms to introduce to the public an improved Piano of singularly sweet and mellow intonation. To those who prefer softness of sound to power this new piano will be most welcome. Some of the tones stole as softly and subduingly over the senses as the melting melody of Mario, but it would be heard with far more advantage in the private room than in a large concert room. Our countrymen, who have carried invention into almost all other regions, have yet penetrated little into the world of sound. We welcome therefore these improvements in an instrument which exercises so sweet an influence in the household, and is now so charming a necessity to refined social life.

The improvements, which we understand are the invention of Messrs. Driggs and Schunmaker, citizens of one of our Western States, consist of a "Linguine" or "Sweet-Voiced Attachment," to which we were indebted for such soft, subduing sound. It is quite simple—being merely a series of metallic tongues firmly fastened to a metallic plate attached to the sounding-board, from which they draw tone. They cannot get out of tune—no mean consideration in the country—and are in fact a tuning-fork for each string. The touch and style are precisely that of the piano.

To this are added a new mode of tuning the piano with a horizontal screw and a new scale called the octave scale, which are claimed as important improvements, but which are more interesting to the few professional pianists than to the multitude who love delicious harmony without inquiring how or whence it comes.—N. Y. Tribune.

HUGHES AND DENMAN'S PATENT PIANO-FORTE.—This newly-invented instrument was exhibited on Saturday evening at the Polytechnic Institution by Mr. Reynolds, the organist of St. Bride's, who explained its nature and performed several pieces upon it. The novelty consists in the arrangement of the keys, which certainly affords the player some remarkable advantages, by facilitating the execution of difficult passages, and enabling him to produce effects otherwise quite impracticable. It would require the aid of a diagram of the key-board, and of musical notes, to make this invention clearly intelligible. The natural scale, arranged on the common pianoforte in one row of white keys, is here arranged in two rows; the first row being in thirds—c, e, g, b, &c., while the row behind it contains the intermediate notes, likewise in thirds—d, f, a, c, &c.; and there is a third row of black keys as on the ordinary instrument. Consequently the key-board is only one-half the ordinary length, and twice the number of notes are brought under the same stretch of the hand, without any diminution of the width of the keys. It is evident that this arrangement must have many advantages, particularly in the execution of arpeggio passages, and in the production of much fuller and more extended harmony than is practicable on the common pianoforte. But there are also disadvantages, and the greatest is the entire change in the method of fingering, to which performers taught in the ordinary method will be unwilling to submit. Scale passages, easily played on one row of keys, must necessarily be increased in difficulty by being played on two rows; and other objections of a similar kind may perhaps be made. But at the same time we must observe that Mr. Reynolds seemed to have conquered any difficulties which the new mode of fingering may present; for he played Mendelssohn's Wedding March, a fantasia "The Standard Bearer," and the Overture to Zampa with apparent facility, producing very striking and remarkable effects.—London News.

Musical Chat-Chat.

RICHARD WAGNER has got through with the Philharmonic Concerts at London, and left there on the 28th of June for Switzerland. The Musical World gives him a parting kick, for which it seems to have summoned up all its energy. Its editorial is in the main a vigorous one, and contains more real reasoning than some of its former ones of which we have given specimens; but its temper is savage to the last degree; it frets and scolds itself away at last in sentences like these: "The musicians of young Germany are maggots, that quicken from corruption." "There is as much difference between Guillaume Tell and Lohengrin as between the Sun and ashes." We read all sides and wait. Meanwhile the opinions of all London are not represented by the said World, the Athenæum and the Times; the critic of the News, whose judgment is perhaps worth as much as that of any of them, writes thus of the last concert:

"The two great symphonies of Spohr and Beethoven, which formed the principal features of the concert, were played in a style which reflected the highest honor, both on the conductor and the orchestra. The time of every movement was taken with perfect judgment; where it differed—as in the introductory adagio, and in the finale of Beethoven's symphony—from the mode to which we have been accustomed at these concerts, the difference was justified by the excellence of the effect. . . . At the end of the concert, Herr Wagner was greeted, before leaving the orchestra, with loud and general applause, which was most justly his due. Whatever differences of opinion may exist among our critics, as to the peculiarities of his style as a composer, there can be no question as to his genius and attainments, or as to his high position among the musicians of the age."

Speaking of Wagner, we fear the extracts we have been making from his book: 'Opera and Drama,' have been found rather hard reading. We are somewhat puzzled as to the policy of continuing them. We had hoped, by a judicious series of extracts, to give in moderate space, and by little and little, a tolerably fair outline of the whole unfolding of Wagner's thought. But the work spreads, before us too long and in too close connection. Moreover the style, involved and difficult enough in itself, seems to have become even more so in the translation from which we have been borrowing. The London translator (Musical World) seems to have chosen to preserve the baldest and harshest literalness, and in the rendering of certain words to have laid down a uniform rule for himself which does not always work well. Thus how absurd to settle the ambiguity of the word Erscheinung, which may mean appearance, phenomenon, manifestation, vision, apparition, &c., &c., by Englishing it always "apparition," and instead of saying: "Every manifestation, or appearance in the world of Art," to say "every apparition"! Yet there are too many rich things in the book to forego entirely, and we have concluded to copy striking passages from time to time, without regard to the unity of the whole.

We forgot last week to make one or two corrections in our account of the musical instruction at the Institution for the Blind. In one sentence we may have given the impression that the list of pieces from which we heard the pupils sing had been entirely learned during the year past; whereas most of the pieces had been practised by many of the scholars during several years, and under the former teacher; yet they were of this year's acquirement with the younger portion. Again, we stated the ages of the pupils too low; instead of from six to sixteen, we should have said they ranged from eight or nine to from sixteen (the limit by the rules) to twenty, of which age there were three or four remaining in the school. . . . By the way we learn that Mr. GEORGE F. ROOT, the accomplished teacher for some time of the Institution for the Blind in New York, organist and director at the Mercer St. Church, and principal of the Normal Musical Institute for teachers, has been obliged to give up his professional engagements in New York, so numerous are the calls made upon his services in conducting musical Conventions and gatherings throughout the country.

A wonderful ophicleide virtuoso has made his appearance in Paris, by the name of Signor COLOSANTI:—any relation to the "Colossus of Rhodes"? Speaking of this colossal instrument we are reminded of a band of sisters, Amazon players of brass instruments, who are giving concerts in Ohio, under the title of the THAYER FAMILY. . . . Promenaders on the Common these warm evenings must have been highly edified by strains proceeding from the Public Garden, where an Anaconda and we know not what other monsters are exhibited:—a solitary, forlorn, but noisy enough brass instrument of the valve genus, tooting an air with variations to the droning accompaniment of a single hoarse bass, like a serpent,—perhaps his very Snake-ship who is under exhibition.

Pleasant accounts are those which our "Diarist" and German correspondent (whom we welcome back to our columns after an interval made necessary by over-work and illness,) writes of the progress and truly high artistic tone of our young American musical students at Leipzig. GEORGE W. PRATT, whose fine singing of the songs of SCHUBERT, &c., has produced so good an impression, is a Boston boy, the son of Col. James Pratt. He is a graduate of Brown University, and has been a teacher of music in our public schools. We find a notice of him in the Leipzig Signale's account of the annual examination of the Conservatory, on the 7th of June, in the hall of the Gewandhaus, as follows: "Air from Mendelssohn's Elijah, sung by Herr George Pratt of Boston. The enormous heat of the room must have been somewhat unfavorable to the fine baritone voice of Herr Pratt; for the rest he delivered the Aria in an intelligent and praiseworthy manner." A Gewandhaus audience is a severe ordeal to pass. Mr. Pratt has since gone to London, where he will remain sometime with GARCIA, the teacher of JENNY LIND. . . . Mrs. EASTCOTT, the American prima donna from Italy, is singing in opera at Drury Lane, London. . . . Mr. HENRY SQUIRES, the tenor, is still studying at Naples, where he has made a successful appearance in Il Trovatore, and has refused tempting offers, it is said, from London. "L'Abon-year," the correspondent of the Evening Gazette, has heard him frequently and writes in exalted terms of the beauty of his voice and singing.

The newly started rumor, which re-appears annually, of LISZT's intended visit to this country, is now contradicted by authority in the Neue Berliner Musik-Zeitung. . . . A German letter-writer, speaking of AUBER's "Jenny Bell," says much of its success is due to SCRIBE, who still remains "the first librettist of our time; he knows his AUBER, his MEYERBEER, his HALEVY, his ADAM by heart, and in his store-house each of these composers has his several alcove." . . . THALBERG's new opera, Christina di Svezia, has met with a complete fiasco in Vienna. It is the third new opera which has met the same fate in that capital this season; VERDI's La Traviata, and somebody's Marco di Visconti being the other two.

Where did we read—or can it be that we dreamed it?—that at the late meeting of the Société des Musiciens, in Paris, a memorial was addressed to the Institute, or to the Academy, upon the serious mischief done to music by the prolific inventions of M. SAX, his horns and tubas, of all shapes and sizes, having driven out nearly all the gentler instruments from the orchestra? If any friend can send us a copy of said memorial, we shall be infinitely obliged. —And this brings us back to our bands. That we have material enough for the largest and best sort of band in Boston, on the old plan, is evident from the skilful playing which we hear from so many of our brass bands. On the Common, recently, we have listened more or less to the "Boston Brass Band," "Bond's Cornet Band," the "Brigade," and the "Germania Serenade Band," and all played in good tune, with good blending and shading of the harmony, and often in pieces which displayed great skill and delicacy of execution. The fault, as we have said, is not in the musicians, but in the fashion. It is a musical fall, in which we have "sin-ned all," and which we must trace back, we suppose, to the ingenious inventions of the arch-tempter, Sax.

Miss HENSLEY has had a successful concert in Springfield, Mass., her old home before she came to Boston. We quote from the Republican:

"It was a triumph. Miss Hensley, though affected to agitation by the circumstances of her appearance, fulfilled to the utmost the reputation she brings home with her. She sang with marvellous richness and power, and added to genius the rare accompaniment of persevering cultivation. The first greeting of the audience was almost wild in enthusiasm. Applause followed applause, and it fairly rained flowers. At every appearance, a like warmth of feeling manifested itself, encouraged, as it was, by the distinguished merit of her performances. The stage and the retiring room fairly blossomed with flowers. The younger Hensley, Miss Louise, received only less warm greetings, and won largely upon the respect and affection of her hearers, as well by her charming appearance as by the purity, simplicity, sweetness and richness of her vocalization. She has a hardly less distinguished future than that now opening upon her sister."

Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, JULY 21, 1855.

Music at Harvard College.

So our venerable Alma Mater at Cambridge has at length taken a first step in the direction we have so long urged, of recognizing and installing Music in her circle of the arts and sciences! The office of musical instructor and organist to the University has been created, and our young townsman, Mr. L. P. HOMER, who has spent many years of earnest study with the best musical masters in Germany, and who is one of our most thoroughly taught musicians, as well as a man of general intelligence and a gentleman, has been appointed to the place. We doubt not his good influence will soon be felt among the students, and that ere long a high authority in favor of Music will go forth with a power of example from Old Harvard. It is but a small beginning, it is true. The office, as we understand it, is pretty much limited to the conducting of the Chapel music upon Sundays, and the training of the choir therefor. It is very far short of anything in the nature of a musical professorship. But it is a beginning; it is the entering wedge, and we may well rejoice in it.

The next step will be for Alma Mater to institute some official, tasteful oversight over the music of her Academic festivals, her exhibitions, class days and Commencements. Something a little more classical than has been customary there on such occasions, would sound more in harmony with academic shades, calm intellectual studies, black gowns, and slow, pensive steps. Verily the obstreperous, echoing din of M. Sax's brazen family is enough to put to flight all the Muses. The Brigade Band played very well on Wednesday at Commencement, as do many of our brass bands always. But such "harmony music," as the French technically term that of the modern bands, sounds strangely unharmonious in a church; and as the loud martial strains rang out across the plain, during the dinner procession, one who heard it in the distance must have had difficulty in conceiving of a train of meek and gowned professors keeping step behind such whooping and defiant blasts. (If they were Luthers, going before Emperor and Council, at the risk of burning, it might do; and in that case the tunes might be selected from Il Trovatore.)

When the University shall be prepared to take this one step further, when Music as an Art, vocal and instrumental, shall be formally encouraged, taught, provided for among the students,—giving simple, elementary instruction as far as may be to all, and offering furthermore to those who have a talent and a calling for it, to conduct them just as deeply into the Cecilian mysteries as they will go,—then it will not be impracticable to add to college festivals the inspiring element of truly refined and classical music furnished wholly or in part by the students themselves. Or even in the want of such resources, the leader or leaders of that branch of culture in the College, would see to it that the music procured from without for such occasions should be something characteristic and distinct from that which is associated with all military musters, firemen's parades, circuses, and what not; would exercise invention in the matter, and be responsible for something really good and fitting;—not leaving it as an indifferent affair to the city fashions, as we leave the cut of our garments to our tailors, whose motive is not taste or beauty.

It was well in the University to begin with its religious music. There is where the true tone can be best set; there, where the occasion excludes triviality, and where attention to whatever may be worthy is secured, as it is nowhere else. With a good teacher and presiding mind in that department, it can but naturally follow that some inspiring musical influence shall flow down through all the other musical channels of college life. And then the good of it will be so felt, that one day we may hope to see, not merely practical class teachers of music, but a musical professor, in the University, who shall lecture on the history and literature of Music, the principles of taste, the philosophy and progress of the Art, its various schools, and so forth; a chair, from which, filled by a live man, shall emanate new light and impulse to the cause of musical high Art throughout our land. Then will be realized the wish long cherished by the more music-loving sons of Harvard; the end for which, however far it might seem in the future, the "Harvard Musical Association" was organized, and has already formed by slow accumulations during its twenty years' existence, the modest nucleus of a fund for this very purpose, hoping, as such an object becomes more appreciated, to inspire others to do more. In taking leave of the subject for the present, let us lay before our readers the following suggestion of the New York Musical Review for last week:

Dwight's Journal of Music, in noticing the degree of "Doctor of Music," recently conferred upon Mr. LOWELL MASON, improves the opportunity to urge the establishment of musical professorships in our Universities. We agree heartily with the editor in his recommendations upon this head, and offer a suggestion. We propose that the three flourishing societies of Boston unite in calling together a Grand Musical Festival for the coming autumn, to which leading musicians shall be invited from all parts of the country, and at which some of the master-works shall be performed. Let the proceeds make a nucleus for a musical professorship at time-honored Harvard; the sum thus collected, however small, would, we doubt not, be sufficiently swelled by the "solid men of Boston," and the example set would find imitators in behalf of other institutions.

SONNETS TO NIGHT.—Have there been any finer sonnets written in this country than the five which we have copied, on another page, from the last number of The Una, the paper so ably and gracefully devoted to "the elevation of Woman?" Read them slowly—you must, for their movement is slow; and ponder well each line and phrase, for they will bear it; in each the image is precise, original, complete. The whole five sonnets are marked by weight, nobility and grandeur of thought, and depth of feeling, and the poetry sustains itself at the height of its great theme, with which the whole tone of expression is in harmony. The only point in which they seem not "equal to themselves" is in the want of a more sonorous rhythm. How such thoughts would have sounded in a Milton's diction! Yet they are not less rhythmical than Wordsworth often is, and the third sonnet even in this respect leaves little to be wished. We understand that they were written by a Massachusetts lady, whose "Hymn to the Sea," as published in "Thalatta," has been much admired.

Musical Correspondence.

From NEW YORK.

JULY 14.—I have been reading in your Journal of to-day the account given by your "Diarist" (whom, by the way, I am glad to welcome back to your columns after so long a pause) of Don Giovanni, as performed in Berlin. "I, too, was in Arcadia"—I too have "sunny memories" of the exquisite mise-en-scene of this opera on the Berlin and Dresden stages, but also in strong contrast with these, a more recent one of a representation thereof in our own city. I cannot refrain from sending you some comments upon it, which you should have had sooner but for my absence from town in the interval.

The opera was given by the LAGRANGE troupe, and well enough performed too not to spoil one's pleasure in the music. I shall not, of course, at this late day, criticize the vocal and dramatic rendering, (though I must say that MORELLI sang the Fin ch'an del vino as only an Italian can, and better than I have ever heard it sung)—my object is merely to show how miserably scenic effects are still managed here, even at the Academy of Music.

In the first place an absurd and tasteless ballet was inserted in the finale of the first act, interrupting the action, breaking the harmonic connection of the music, and wearying all who come to hear as well as see. This over, the orchestra took up Mozart again where they had left him, and to the triple dance movement which followed, a few couples from the chorus danced—a quadrille! I must mention en passant that of the three masks only one, Don Ottavio, made his appearance in black—the ladies were concealed respectively beneath a sky-blue and a bright domino,—which of course divested the thrilling scene in which they appear, of all solemnity. The statue was dust-color, with flesh-hued face, and, if I remember rightly, smaller than the Don. And in the banquet scene the musicians made their appearance only when the orchestra was already half through the music intended to be played by them.

Thus far my deep enjoyment of the music had prevented my being much disturbed by these outward deficiencies, but the last scene was tame enough to cool down the most enthusiastic listener. After pronouncing the dread sentence, the Commander vanished beneath the stage, upon which a few flashes of pink light issued from beneath the side scenes, Don Juan staggered about the stage for a while, and then walked off as coolly as possible, as if he were making his exit from a drawing room. And all this while those mighty final chords were sounding an accompaniment, to nothing but the rising and withdrawing of the audience. I cannot describe the effect produced upon me by this quiet manner of proceeding. I care as little as any one for éclat and tumult upon the stage, but in a case like this, where the music and the scenic effect are so indissolubly connected, where they complete each other, such a milk and watery arrangement is unpardonable. Even the chorus of demons was omitted, and the music thus being rendered incomplete, no one, who did not know the plot, could dream that or how the dissoluto was punito.

I have since found, in the Monatsheft for July, a notice which may account for the altered finale of Don Juan, and clothe it in English dress for your readers.

"An Irish traveller, who has just returned from Spain, relates the following interesting fact: 'In the Caridad, (a church in Sevilla) lie the remains of Don Juan, widely celebrated through Mozart's opera of the same name. He is not only no mythical personage, but performed, in reality, more wild feats than could be gathered into an opera. He died a repentant sinner, and, in his will, requested to be buried on the road leading to the church, so that all the pious souls who visited the sanctuary, might tread upon his grave. In consideration, however, of this pious wish, and his final penitence, the monks have received him into the interior of the church and permitted him to be buried there.'"

From LEIPZIG.

JUNE 21.—In my letter yesterday I spoke of the general artistic influences brought to bear upon the musical student in the Conservatory here. It would be natural enough to suppose that mere execution would be forgotten in the striving after the higher qualities. This is not at all the case; a large proportion of the young men already distinguished owe their dexterity to the excellent instruction here. MENDELSSOHN himself employed the highest virtuosity only as a means—but much of his music demands that means. His principles still rule in Leipzig.

While sitting around a little table, with a glass of beer before us, in German style, Professor PLAIDY told us a story of pianoforte execution: When AUGUST GOCKEL, (who I believe is somewhere in America "at this present,") was a pupil in the Conservatorium, he was a great favorite of Mendelssohn's, who appointed him on a certain occasion to play the pianoforte part of the Fantasia for piano and orchestra. The piece which preceded this on the programme was played, and all was ready for the fantasia, when Mendelssohn who was conducting, looked round, but no Gockel. "Where's Gockel? Where's Gockel?" said he to Plaidy.

"I don't know; he was here just now." Professor P. hurried out of the room and found his man in the passage below, walking up and down, whether overcome with the heat, or bashful, or frightened, deponent knoweth not.

"Why, Gockel, they are all waiting for you!" The young pianist rushed up stairs, down through the orchestra, popped into his seat as if shot, and began the fantasia without a look or word to anybody. He took it up at lightning speed, and Mendelssohn's hair, said he, stood right up!

Luckily the piano begins some sixteen bars before the orchestra, so that there was time for some preparation on their part. Gockel went through it just at that lightning speed, to Mendelssohn's utter astonishment, nor did he drop a note.

One forenoon we spent at an organ "Prüfung" or examination. I have mislaid my list of the pieces, and only remember that some nine or ten young men played in the presence of the professors and such of the pupils as chose to go to the cold church. Among the pieces were an organ sonata by Mendelssohn, a composition by RICHTER (I think); something by SCHUMANN, and of course fugues by BACH. WILSON, of Springfield, played one of these very creditably.

My last day in Leipzig was perhaps the pleasantest. It was ascension day, and at the Catholic church an Ave Maria, by LISZT, some ten minutes long, was sung, he being there in person to direct. The piece was generally liked, but was not thought to betray any remarkable creative power on the part of the composer. It was interesting however and amusing to see that tall, straight, world-renowned character, with monstrous long hands in white gloves, protruded "about a foot" beyond his coat sleeves, waving out the time and expression of his music to his choir of Conservatory singers. The usual portraits give a good idea of his face, though his thick hair begins to shew the effects of time in whiteness here and there, and his features have acquired a sort of hardness, if one may so speak.

After the Ave Maria the "American colony," with one or two visitors like myself, and two or three Germans, all adjourned to KELLY's room. Who is that handsome little fellow, with light hair? That is HENSEL, from Chemnitz, of whom we have told you so much. He left the Conservatory not long ago; and left it because the professors could find nothing to give him to study. One of the best things Plaidy gave him was a set of Etudes by THALBERG, of immense difficulty, and he was to bring one of them at the next lesson. He brought them all, perfect! He had the most astonishing memory, I don't know anything he can't play by rote. Once get him at it, he will play all day, he likes it so.

We had not been long in K.'s room before Hensel was with one accord called to the grand piano, and after some discussion it was agreed that he should play BEETHOVEN's Sonata Appassionata.

"Do you want the music?"

"No! I can play better without."

So, twisting his cigar in the corner of his mouth, he began the Appassionata. It does me good now to think of it. Then the majority called for a piece to show his execution, and as a recent number of Dwight had had an account of some one's playing Mendelssohn's Wedding March, as translated by Liszt, this was decided upon. With lightning speed he gave it us, with not a note before him, and without losing a note. Third, a Triller, by SCHULHOFF, in which the fellows said he rivalled that famous player on his own domain. Fourth, Trübsinnschwärzung, by SCHUMANN. Fifth, Etude Symphonique, Schumann. Sixth, at my request for something graver, CHOPIN's Marcia Funebre, most splendidly executed. Seventh, for the sake of comparison, the March from Beethoven's Sonata, op. 25, (this played from notes).—Eighth, Polonaise, Chopin. Ninth, Sonata by himself, in A minor, ending in A major, unanimously liked. Tenth, a very beautiful and of course immensely difficult Etude by RUBENSTEIN. Eleventh, Mazurka, Souvenir de Varsovie, Schulhoff. Twelfth, Mazurka, by KUEHN. Thirteenth, Etude, Chopin. Fourteenth, Lied ohne Worte, (Spinnerlied) Mendelssohn. Fifteenth, another Lied, No. 1, Heft VI. Sixteenth, the accompaniment (by note) to Schubert's Wanderer, which PRATT sang gloriously. And, finally, Seventeenth, the first movement of that great E minor Sonata of Beethoven, op. 111.

For two and a half hours Hensel played to us, only twice referring to the music, in one of these pieces only because he was playing an accompaniment, and then left us, as it was time for him to keep an engagement.

The next day I was again at Berlin, almost envying those who can pursue such studies under such auspices.

IMPORTANT MUSICAL PUBLICATION.

We shall publish on the 20th of July, 1855,
BAKER'S CHURCH MUSIC;
A COLLECTION OF
Hymn-Tunes, Chants, Sentences & Anthems,
SELECTED AND ARRANGED FROM THE
WORKS OF BOTH ANCIENT AND MODERN MASTERS,
TOGETHER WITH MANY ORIGINAL COMPOSITIONS.
BY B. F. BAKER.

This work is intended particularly for the use of choirs in churches; but it contains a complete series of elementary studies for schools and classes, together with a variety of pieces suitable for Singing Societies and Musical Conventions.

In the arrangement of the hymn-tunes, the editor has endeavored to combine simplicity and good taste; avoiding pedantic difficulties, and yet not falling into feebleness.

The subjects of the hymn-tunes are chiefly taken from the old masters; but as they have been more or less altered to suit them to different forms of metres, it has not been deemed necessary to give the names of the authors.

The hymn-tunes and anthems contributed by professional friends, are printed in their original forms, with the authors' names. The sentences, motets, and anthems contained in this work will be found adapted to the use of different denominations, on their various occasions of worship. In the hope that this work may meet the wants of choirs and singers generally, the editor respectfully submits it to the candid consideration of the musical public.

Translated for this Journal.

The Life of Music.

In that harmless play of the tone-life which we have described, man is a mere creature; each is simply one of these millions of human beings, following the general, indiscriminate destiny of the race. But I, but every man, leads a peculiar, individual life, and would fain feel himself an individual, a unique, independent and legitimate existence, with his own relations, inclinations, ends, and dispositions; nay, every moment of our life renews this claim for itself, and transforms it as occasion prompts. I am not content with simply hearing whatsoever, I would apprehend what corresponds to me, to my own mood in all its changes and alternations; I will not merely shout out that I am: all that is in me, every chord that is stretched and attuned in my soul would fain sound for itself, and seeks in sympathizing breasts an echo from without, or else returns back into my own ear, to announce me to myself, to give me back my joy, my grief made beautiful and mild by such reverberation.

This is the second step in the tone-life, the inner life of the soul's moods and feelings, which sympathetically transmits itself through sound and the Art of sound. Here Music is the "Art of the Soul,"—the soul which feels itself and listens to the faithful echo of its every stirring. Here sympathy reigns from within outward, and from without inward. It commences in deep twilight. Already in inanimate Nature it is well known that a sounding body by the power of its vibrations will awake the echo of its own tone in every neighboring body tuned to the same pitch; when you raise the dampers of a piano-forte, a tone strongly sung or otherwise produced, will set the corresponding strings to vibrating; and not only the strings tuned to the same pitch, but also the next related tones—(thus if you sound C, you you will hear c, g, c, e, g, b, and then, though not perceptible to every ear, the c and d besides)—a type of the mutual understanding that prevails throughout inanimate Nature.

In men we find the first trace of this sympathy, anticipating all clearer consciousness, in the capacity to sing after given tones, ("by ear," as we say,) or to imitate the sound of strange voices and sonorous instruments. How do I set about it to sing over after another this precise C which I have been allowed to hear? How is it that even the two or three years' old child succeeds in it? Who taught the three years' old MOZART to find out thirds upon the key-board and feel so happy in their chiming? In all this there is already discrimination; else instead of the given tones one would sing other tones; else Mozart would have occasionally struck seconds; here is discrimination, and consequently here is knowledge, understanding;—only it is veiled and dream-like, rather an instinct of the true, which reaches just so far toward clear consciousness, as the individual with his present need and present mood can go.

This is the stand-point, upon which musicians commonly are wont to recognize each other and each other's talent; this is what they claim as the peculiar domain of their Art. And with right too, even if the summit and the limits of the Art are not to be found here. To tones thus attuned (Tonbestimmung), to this material tune (Stimmung), the physical organ of music,—to the tuneful voices (Stimmen) both of song and orchestra, corresponds the tune or humor (Stimmung) of the mind, this general inclination, not yet strained up to any determinate pitch of thought or will, and the increasing or relaxing tension of the inclination. The mood or humor may concentrate and point itself to some determinate thought, to some precise word, it may become will or act, may ultimate itself in that, or it may persist and work on as an exhaustless and perpetual fund of soul; always it is this "Freudvoll und leidvoll,"* this "Hangen und bängen," this "Himmelhoch jauchzen, zum Tode betrübt," this vague fluctuation and tossing of the soul, this hot desire so shyly shrinking from its object, this sorrow full of sweet consolation, this joy so soon suffused by films of sadness, this warmly colored (as ever CORREGGIO dreamed,) chiaro-oscuro of the soul. This is a realm of Music, where it reigns before all arts; a realm of which the painter gives you only glimpses from afar, and which the poet can only indicate by paraphrase, and never in a palpable, exhaustive manner; he must (as KLEIST expresses it with such fine feeling in his Kathchen) "dissolve himself into the world," before he can experience what moves the soul "more charmingly than the sound of harps, more persuasively than the holy psalter of David."

* From Clärchen's Song in Goethe's "Egmont."

If we cast a look back here upon the first life-circle of our Art, we find that the distinctive progress to the second lies in this: that it is no longer the general, indeterminate, pure creature impulse, moulded by the understanding purely from without, which manifests itself in tones, awakens sympathy or answers to the tones that reach it, but it is an individual, inward, fluctuating direction of the vital energy, of the soul conscious of itself and of its casual needs and inclinations. The higher circle does not exclude but include the lower, as the leafy crown does not deny the trunk and root from which it budded forth. The greatest part of the German people's songs, and with them of the Swiss and Flemish, Scandinavian, Scotch, Irish, English, many of the South Russian, Polish, Basquish and old French songs, many which lent a voice to the renewed life of the People in the first French revolution,—the greatest part of all the German opera and church music, and of the French operettas which attach themselves to the German, as well as the preceding and accompanying operas of Cimarosa, Paisiello and others,—the instrumental music, as especially developed through HAYDN and MOZART, and as continued in the earlier works of BEETHOVEN and the most of his contemporaries and followers, are entirely peculiar to this step. Many works of their predecessors, particularly BACH, belong to it, while others are but "tone-crystallizations" out of the first life-step, and others reach out far above the fluctuating play of moods into higher regions.

It is important to understand, that in the world of life and spirit it is not possible to draw sharp, abstract limits. Every state, every sphere of intellectual activity has its forerunners and successors; the series of them must not be conceived of as so many sections of a line, but rather as so many circles, whose circumferences intersect; one part of the middle circle overlaps on that which goes before, and another upon that, which follows;—and yet every part refers to its own centre. Thus already in the middle age the spiritual tendency and feeling of the following time appears, but more in the form of a presentiment, almost entirely as the undesigned, unconscious consequence of the prevailing contrapuntal and harmonic impetus. Thus Bach continues the counterpoint of the ancients, but with him it has become (in the way of allusion and as it were groping even in his earlier works,) entirely another thing; before the ardor of the new Pygmalion the stone begins to warm out and to clothe itself with a shimmer of life color. So in Haydn and Mozart the idea of the future, whose power was already lent to the evangelist Bach, announces itself in clearest glances; so Beethoven stands for half his life upon their standpoint, moulds according to their forms—and still what he moulds is different from the model and grows toward the future. It is not the beginning and end, but the centres which determine each of the intersecting spheres.

Who can estimate, how many and how various the moods whose sound has swelled and died away here in this sphere of music; what eager interests have here been excited, what painful ones dispelled or mitigated; how many pangs of existence, how many torments of thought have been soothed; how much rudeness and harshness of mind softened here at this holy shrine of sympathetic Art! Here every age has sounded out its inmost, every artist has confided to us what his listening ear has caught of the pulsations of his time and what he has felt sympathetically vibrating in his own soul. For this very reason our own life and heart's desire can never quite be satisfied with the old strains, that have been attuned before us, because every life is one peculiar in its new sufferings and joys. To Humanity, to a soul that overlooks them from the height of ages, they are the eternally old; to us, to each one who now lives them, they are new, entirely peculiar to him, they are moulded to his circumstances and have grown to them like the skin to the body. All that is particular here is transitory, and can only operate as a memorial upon one who may be able for a moment to recall the past in which it arose. HILLER felt himself authorized and pledged to compose over anew the arias of HANDEL (and he it was, who re-introduced his great predecessor to his fatherland); but Hiller's songs and musical plays, once so admired and famous, are such music as we now could scarcely bear to hear. Thus do these trusty interpreters of the heart and its most hidden mysteries rise up like constellations in the shining heavens, into the zenith of the peoples upon whom they shed their balsam, and then sink, disappear in the deep lap of night, unforgotten only by him, who counts the weary and the glad hours of Humanity. Each passes by, a moment in the existence of the race. But ever among men lingers the deep longing for the comfort of this soul's Art, and ever mounts the sympathizing voice anew out of the heart's beat, to descend into the heart that craves it.

If it was the problem of the first step, to build up the musical Art out of the rude beginnings of Harmony into all the Gothic ornamentation and scholastic subtleties of the most artificial Counterpoint: for the second step this strict, hard architectural science could suffice no longer. Already BACH's most fortunate son, EMANUEL, was constrained to renounce the lofty, strict style of the father; the age of prophecy and holy consecration was past; man established himself upon earth in a more earthly and humanly comfortable manner, and could no longer bear the heavy yoke of Jeremiah, nor soar upon the eagle wings of John in the might of steadfast, inspired faith. Art grew more comfortable and more personal, it was made more mild and pliable,—it became so tame that at the tomb of the old Bach one almost shuddered at his "hardness", called his deep dialectic expositions of the inmost tone-life "mere reflection" and "cold calculation", and found his church music not sufficiently "church-like". But all the fresh joy of the people and of youth, all that natural tenderness and heartiness of earth's children which so enticed the soul in the tones of a Haydn or a Mozart,—all that was now softened and adorned by Art with the most delicate and lovely charm and with the most nimble and elastic motion. The Cantilenas became more flexible, the voices subordinated themselves more willingly to one ruling voice, the harmony became more flowing; the Rondo and Sonata forms developed themselves in playful freedom, and stretched their limbs like light couriers to bear away their master; in the Opera, Mozart with his light and variously shaped arias, duets, terzets and finales broke through the restraints of the uniform Italian opera, and knew how to adapt it to his fine sense of tones, to his delicately strung soul, and—so far as could comport with that—to the moods and characters upon the stage. The inspiration and freedom with which he walked in that path, can only be appreciated when we compare his forms with those of his followers, which became so much broader, heavier, and at the same time poorer and more uniform, without producing anything deeper or any thing—to the mind—really new. This we may observe in WINTER, PAER, RIGHINI, BOIELDIEU, down to SPOHR, ROSSINI and still later writers.

New Views of Opera.

III. NAÏVE DIRECTION—MOZART.

If, in the development of opera, we designate as reflecting the direction in which this most noble property of music was raised on principle, by GLUCK and his successors, to the rank of arranger of the drama, we must call the other direction, in which—especially on the boards of Italian opera houses—the said property, in the case of happily gifted musicians, was manifested unconsciously, and entirely of itself, the naïve direction. It is characteristic of the former, that it was developed, as an important production, in Paris, before a public that, naturally unmusical, rather acknowledges and inclines to a well-ordered, dazzling mode of speech, than to the feeling substance of the speech itself; while the latter, the naïve direction, has especially remained the property of the sons of the native land of modern music—Italy.

Although it was a German who displayed this tendency in its greatest brilliancy, his high mission was only assigned him from the fact, that his artistic nature was similar to the undisturbed and spotless clearness of a bright expanse of water, over which the peculiar and most beautiful blossoms of Italian music bent, in order—as in a mirror—to perceive, recognize, and love themselves. But this glass was simply the surface of a deep, endless sea of yearning and longing, which, from the immeasurable fullness of his being, stretched out to the surface, as the utterance of what was below, in order, from the love-like greeting of the beautiful objects bent over it, as though thirsting for the recognition of their own being, to gain figure, form and beauty.

Whoever thinks he recognizes in MOZART the experimentalizing musician, passing from one attempt to another, in order, for instance, to solve the problem of opera, can only place beside this error to counterbalance it, another;—the attributing naïveté to MENDELSSOHN, for instance, when the latter, distrustful of his own strength, hesitatingly and slowly approached opera only gradually from the greatest distance. The naïve and really inspired artist throws himself with enthusiastic recklessness into his work of Art; and it is not until that is finished, and stands before him in its reality, that he obtains, from his experience, the true power of reflection, which protects him, generally, from mistakes, but which, in a particular case, and, therefore, when he feels impelled anew by inspiration to artistic creation, completely loses again all its power over him. Nothing is more characteristic of Mozart, with reference to his career as an operatic composer, than the careless absence of choice with which he began his works; he thought so little of reflecting on the fundamental æsthetic scruples of opera; that it was rather with the greatest ingenuousness he set about composing music to every opera text proposed, actually indifferent as to whether the text was or was not a thankful one to him, as a pure musician. If we take all his æsthetic observations and remarks, preserved in one place and another, we shall find that all his reflection does not certainly rise higher than his celebrated definition of his nose. He was so completely and perfectly a musician, and nothing but a musician, that it is from him we can, most evidently and convincingly, comprehend the only true and right position of the musician to the poet. It was exactly in opera that he produced this most important and decisive result for music—in opera, on whose form he never conceived the idea of working with, as it were, absolute poetic sovereignty, but in which he produced what he could by his purely musical capability, while on the other hand, by the truest, most untroubled adoption of the poetic intention—wherever and however this was to be met with—he developed this purely musical capability of his to such a pitch of fullness, that we do not find in any of his absolutely musical compositions, especially in any of his instrumental works, the art of music so extensively and richly developed as in his operas. The grand, noble and sensible simplicity of his purely musical instinct, that is to say, the involuntary possession of the essence of his art, rendered it actually impossible for him to produce, as a composer, ravishing and intoxicating effects to places where the poem was flat and insignificant. How little did this most richly gifted of all musicians understand our modern music-makers' trick of raising towers of music, glittering like gold, upon a shallow and unworthy foundation, and of playing the enraptured and inspired where all the poetic work is hollow and empty, for the purpose of thus most clearly proving that the musician is really the principal personage, who can do everything, and can even create something out of nothing—exactly like the Almighty himself. Oh! how fervently do I love, and how highly do I respect Mozart, that it was not possible for him to compose for Titus music like Don Juan, or for Coxi fan tutte, like that of Figaro—how ignominiously would this have disgraced music! Mozart always composed music, but he could never write beautiful music, except when inspired. Although this inspiration necessarily proceeded from his inward and peculiar powers, it only appeared bright and brilliant when fired from without, when the lovely object, which, ardently oblivious of himself, he could embrace, was displayed before the genius of the most divine love within him. Thus it would have been exactly the most absolute of all musicians, Mozart, who would long since have most satisfactorily solved for us the operatic problem; who would, namely, have assisted in producing the truest, most beautiful, and most perfect drama, had he but met with the poet, whom he, as a musician, would only have been obliged to assist. He did not, however, meet with the poet: at one time, a mere tiresome, pedantic, or, at another, a frivolous, sprightly manufacturer of operatic texts supplied him with his arias, duets and concerted pieces, for composition, to which pieces, in proportion to the warmth they awoke in him, he wrote such music, that they always gained the most suitable expression, whereof, according to their natures, they were in any way capable.

Thus, Mozart only demonstrated the inexhaustible power of music to satisfy every demand of the poet on its capabilities of expression, in the most incredible fullness; and, in this altogether unreflecting course of proceeding, this magnificent musician also discovered, in truth of dramatic expression, and in the most endless variety of his causation, this power of music in a far greater degree than Gluck and all his successors. But anything founded on principle was so little apparent in his whole mode of proceeding, that the mighty pinions of his genius really left the formal scaffolding of opera untouched; he merely cast into the forms of opera the fiery stream of his music, but the forms themselves were too weak to contain this stream, which flowed out of them to where it could, in continually more free and less restrictive limits, expand, in a manner agreeable to its natural yearning, until we again meet with it swollen out to the proportions of a mighty ocean in the symphonies of BEETHOVEN. While, in purely instrumental compositions, the most peculiar capability of music was developed to the most immeasurable power, the forms of opera, like stone walls gutted by fire, remained standing, naked and cold, in their old shape, awaiting the next guest who should fix his temporary home within them. Mozart is of great importance only generally for the history of music, but in no way, especially, for the history of Opera, as a separate branch of Art. Opera, which in its unnatural existence was bound to no laws really necessary for its life, might fall, as an opportune prey, to the share of the first musical adventurer that presented himself.

We can here altogether pass by, unnoticed, the unedifying sight offered by the artistic creations of the so-called successors of Mozart. A considerable number of composers imagined that Mozart's operatic style was something to be imitated in its form, thus naturally losing sight of the fact that the form was of itself nothing, but Mozart's musical genius exactly everything; no one, however, has ever succeeded in imitating the creations of the mind by mere pedantic arrangements.

IV. THE ARIA—ARTIFICIAL FLOWERS—ROSSINI.

One thing alone remained to be enunciated in these forms—if Mozart developed, with the most unclouded naïveté, their purely musical value to the highest perfection, the real foundation of the whole system of opera was still, agreeably to the source from which it sprang, to be made known in the most unmysterious and naked publicity in the same forms; the world was still to be informed, plainly and frankly, to what aspirations and what demands upon Art, opera was indebted for its origin and existence; and that these aspirations were not in any way directed to real drama, but to a kind of enjoyment—seasoned by the apparatus of the theatre—in no wise seizing and inwardly vivifying, but merely intoxicating and superficially amusing. In Italy, where operas arose from such an aspiration—as yet unconsciously—it was destined, also, to be finally satisfied with full consciousness.

We must here examine more closely the constitution of the air (aria).

As long as "airs" continue to be composed, the fundamental characteristic of this form of Art will always have to prove itself an absolutely musical one. The national song sprang from a close and simultaneous working of the art of poetry and the art of music, which had grown up together in intimate alliance—from an art, which, in opposition to the purposely plastic art of civilization, almost the only one understood by us, we scarcely feel inclined to call an art, but which we might, perhaps, designate as the involuntary exposition of national feeling by artistic means. In this case, verbal and musical poetry are one and the same thing. The people never think of singing their songs without a text; without verbal verse no melody could exist for them. If, in process of time, and from modifications of the parent race the melody varies, the verbal verse varies in just the same manner; for the people, a separation, no matter of what description, is unintelligible; the two form together one whole, appertaining to itself, like man and wife. The creature of luxury heard this national song only from a distance; from his lordly palace he listened to the passing reapers, and the sole portion of that song that penetrated into his glittering halls was the melody, while the words died away, as far as he was concerned, below. If the melody was the entrancing odor of the flower, and the verse its body, with all its delicate organs of generation, the man brought up in luxury, and merely wishing to enjoy partially with his olfactory nerves, without at the same time enjoying with his eye as well, extracted this odor from the flower, and artificially distilled from it the perfume, which he drew off into phials, in order that he might carry it about with him, as he liked, and moisten with it himself and his magnificent apparel, whenever it suited his fancy to do so. Again, in order to gratify himself with a sight of the flower, he would have been obliged to go nearer; to descend from his palace into the glade; to force his way through branches, twigs and leaves; and for this the noble and comfort loving individual in question did not feel the least inclination. With the fragrant substratum he now sprinkled, also, the dreary wearisomeness of his life, and the hollowness and nullity of the sensations of his heart, the artificial plant that sprang from this unnatural impregnation being nought else than the operatic air. However varied and arbitrary the combinations into which it might be forced, it remained constantly unfruitful and always itself alone; what it was and could not avoid being:—a mere musical substratum. The entire aerial body of the air evaporated into the melody, which was sung, and, at last, fiddled and blown, without the least notice being taken of the fact that a verbal verse, or even a verbal sense, existed beneath it. The more the odor, however, was subjected, in order to supply it with materials for corporal adherence, to all kinds of experiments, the most pompous of which was the serious pretence of the drama, the more did people feel it was weakened by all this mixing with what was hard, and foreign to it, and even that it lost a portion of its voluptuous strength and loveliness. The individual who restored to this odor, unnatural as it was, a body, which, though an imitation, imitated as deceptively as possible the natural one that once poured forth, from its natural abundance, into the air, the said odor, as the spirit of its being; the wonderfully skilful manufacturer of artificial flowers, which he formed of velvet and silk, and painted with deceptive colors, moistening their dry calices with the said substratum of perfume, so that odor began to exhale from them almost as from a real flower—this great artist was JOACHIMO ROSSINI.

In the case of Mozart, the melodic odor of which we have been speaking had found so nourishing a soil in a noble, healthy, artistic example of humanity, perfectly consonant to itself, that it forced out again the beautiful flower of true Art, which carries us away in the most fervent rapture of the soul. But, even in the case of Mozart, it found this nourishment only when what was allied to him, what was healthy and purely human, presented itself as poetry to be wedded with his completely musical nature; and it was almost a more fortunate chance that this circumstance repeatedly fell to his lot. When Mozart was abandoned by this fructifying god, the artificial element of the odor could only succeed in maintaining itself, and that artificially, with great exertion, and without true and necessary life. The melody, at whatever expense it might be cherished, sickened of the cold, lifeless spirit of formality, the only inheritance that this victim of an early death could leave his heirs, since precisely what he took with him in death was—his life.

What Rossini, in the first blush of his luxuriant youth beheld around him, was the harvest of death. If he looked upon the serious French, so-called, dramatic opera, he recognized with the penetrating glance of the zest for life inherent to youth, a tricked-out corpse, which even SPONTINI, striding forward in magnificent solitude, was no longer able to animate, because—as if for his own glorification—he was already embalming himself alive. Impelled by a bold instinct for life, Rossini tore the mask from the face of this pompous corpse, as if to discover the ground of its future life; through all the magnificence of the garments which proudly enveloped it, he discovered, this—the true ground of the life even in the case of this personage that carried itself so highly—melody. If he cast a glance on native Italian opera, and the work of Mozart's heirs, he again beheld nothing but death—death in empty forms—when melody rose up before him as their life—downright melody, without any pretence of character, which would have appeared in his eyes altogether hypocritical, when he looked on all the unfinished, violent and half things that had sprung from himself.

But Rossini wanted to live, and perceived very clearly that, in order to do so, he must live with those who possessed ears to hear him. Absolute melody had struck him as the sole vital principle in opera; he had only, therefore, to observe carefully what kind of melody he must adopt in order to be heard. Completely passing over all the rubbish in the shape of scores, he directed his powers of listening to where the people sang without notes, and what he heard there was what, in the whole range of opera, the ear retained in a more involuntary manner than any thing else; the naked, ear-pleasing, absolute melodic melody, that is to say:—melody which is precisely melody and nothing more; which glides into our ears, we know not wherefore; which we repeat, we know not wherefore; which we adopt to-day instead of that of yesterday, and which we forget again to-morrow, without, again, knowing wherefore; which has a melancholy sound when we are merry, and a merry one when we are out of sorts, and which, notwithstanding, we continue to hum over to ourselves, we once more do not exactly know wherefore.

Rossini struck up this melody, and—lo and behold—the secret of Opera was manifest. All that reflection and æsthetic speculation had built up, Rossini's opera-melodies pulled down, so that it was swept away like some unsubstantial figment of the brain. The lot of dramatic opera was no other than that of science with those problems, which are, in truth, based upon a false hypothesis, and which when minutely examined, become more and more confused and incapable of solution, until, at last, Alexander's sword does its work, and cleaves the leathern knot through the middle, so that the thousand ends of the thongs fall apart in all directions. This sword is precisely the naked deed, and such a deed did Rossini perform, when he made every operatic audience in the world witnesses of the perfectly decided fact, that people merely desired to hear "pretty melodies," where mistaken artists had taken it into their heads to convey, by musical expression, the substance and aim of a drama.

Every one raised his voice in shouts of joy to praise Rossini, who so well understood how to make a separate art of the employment of these melodies. He did not devote the slightest attention to the organizing of the form; he took the simplest, driest, and most flimsy which he found ready to his hand, but then he filled it, most logically, with the only substance it had always needed: narcotic, intoxicating melody. Completely indifferent as to the form, precisely because he left it altogether untouched, he employed his genius in the most amusing feats of juggling, which he caused to be executed within the limits of the form in question. To the singers, who had previously been obliged to study for the purpose of obtaining dramatic expression from a wearisome, meaningless verbal text, he said:—"Do whatever you like with the words; only, above all things, do not fail to get lustily applauded for lively flights and melodious entrechats." Who obeyed him more willingly than the singers? To the instrumentalists, who had previously been drilled to accompany, as intelligently as possible, pathetic vocal phrases with corresponding and simultaneous execution, he said:—"Take it easy, but, above all things, do not fail to get properly applauded for your respective and particular skill, in the passages where I give you an opportunity of so doing." Who thanked him more ardently than the instrumentalists? To the author of the operatic text, who had previously sweated blood, under the obstinately prejudiced arrangements of the dramatic composer, he said:—"My friend, do what you like, I do not need you any more!" Who was more obliged to him than the operatic poet, for this release from an unthankful and difficult task?

But who idolized Rossini more, for these benefits, than all the members of the whole civilized world, so far as operatic theatres could contain them? And who had more reason for doing so than they? Who was, with so much power, so perfectly obliging towards them as Rossini? If he heard that the public of a particular city was fond of having runs executed by the fair singers, while the public of another town preferred a languishing style, he gave his fair singers of the first place only runs, and those of the second only languishing strains. If he found that people here liked the big drum in the orchestra, he commenced his overture to a rustic opera with the big drum;* if he was informed that the audience there was passionately fond of crescendos in ensemble movements, he put his opera in the form of a continually recurring crescendo. Once only did he have cause to repent his obliging readiness. He was advised to be careful when composing for Naples; his more sterlingly written opera did not take, and Rossini determined never again in his life to work with care, even if advised to do so.

When Rossini surveyed the prodigious results of his treatment of opera, he cannot be accused of the least vanity or arrogant pride for laughingly telling people to their face that he had discovered the true secret of opera, after which all his predecessors had groped about in vain. When he affirmed it would be an easy task for him to cause the operas of his greatest predecessors, even including Mozart's Don Juan, to be forgotten, simply by again setting the subjects to music after his own fashion, there was not the slightest arrogance in his assertion, but simply the certain instinct of what the public really required from opera. In truth, our musical religionists would have had to view the appearance of a Don Juan by Rossini with the greatest disgrace to themselves; for we must, most assuredly, conclude that Mozart's Don Juan would have been compelled to give way to Rossini's—if not for ever, at least for a very long period.

The following is the real influence exercised by Rossini on the question of opera:—he appealed, with might and main, from the opera to the public; he made this public, with its wishes and its likings, the actual factor of the opera.

Had the operatic public possessed, in the slightest degree, the character and the importance of the people, Rossini would appear in our eyes the most fundamental revolutionist in the domain of Art. In the eyes of one portion of society—but a portion which, in its social superfluity and even harm, is simply an unnatural excrescence from the people, and only to be regarded as a cluster of caterpillars, gnawing away the healthy, nutritious leaves of the national tree, from which they derive, at most, but sufficient strength to flutter through an ephemeral and luxurious existence as so many airy and dazzling butterflies—in the eyes of such a cutting from the people, a cutting that, upon a sediment sunk down to filthy coarseness, could only raise itself to vicious elegance, but never to true, beautiful human culture; in fact—to use the right term—in the eyes of our operatic public, Rossini was simply a reactionary, while we are to look upon Gluck and his successors as methodical, conscious, and, as regards their material success, powerless revolutionaries. In the name of the luxurious, but, in fact, sole actual substance of opera, and the consistent development of the same, Joachim Rossini exercised a reactionary influence against the doctrinaire revolutionary maxims of Gluck, as successfully as Prince Metternich, his great patron, in the name of the inhuman, but, in fact, sole actual substance of the system of European government, and the consistent maintenance of the same, exercised a reactionary influence against the doctrinaire maxims of the liberal revolutionists, who, within this system of government, desired, without completely suspending its unnatural essence, to restore the principles of humanity and reason, in the same form that expressed the essence in question. As Metternich, with perfect justice, could not conceive the State otherwise than under absolute monarchy, so, with no less consistency, Rossini only conceived opera under absolute melody. Both said, "Do you want state and opera; here are state and opera for you—there are none other!"

With Rossini ends the real history of Opera. It came to an end when the unconscious germ of its being had developed itself to its most naked, conscious fulness; when the musician was recognized as the absolute factor, endowed with unlimited and sovereign power, of this work of Art, and the taste of the theatrical public as the only standard of restraint. It came to an end when the pretence of drama, to its very first principles, was practically set on one side; the employment of the most unrestricted vocal virtuosity, most pleasing to the ear, recognized as the only object of the vocalists, and the demands which, in consequence of this, they made on the composer, acknowledged as their inalienable right. It came to an end, when the great musical public could only conceive the substance of the music under the perfectly characterless melody, the structure of musical form in the slipshod connection of the operatic pieces, and the constitution of music, according to the impression it produced, in the narcotic, intoxicating effects of an operatic evening. It came to an end on the day that Rossini, idolized by Europe, and smiling in the voluptuous lap of luxury, thought fit to pay a visit of ceremony to the secluded, morose Beethoven, wrapt up in himself, and accounted half mad—a visit which the latter did not return. What did the longingly rolling, dark eye of the voluptuous son of Italy perceive, as it involuntarily fell upon the savage brilliancy of his incomprehensible adversary's glance, broken down with pain, sick with aspiration, and yet braving death? Did the fearfully wild locks of the Medusa-head, that no one looked upon without dying, shake themselves at him?—So much is certain, Opera died with Rossini.

Auber.

From the Paris correspondence of the Leipzig Signale, apropos of the new opera, "Jenny Bell", we translate the following:

"AUBER has been for forty-two years a composer of French operas. His first attempt: Le Séjour militaire, as well as his second: Les testaments et les billets doux, were failures. La Bergère Châtelaine, which was produced in the first months of the year 1820, opened the long series of his musical successes.

"It may not be uninteresting to recall the names at least of this master's works. There have been produced by him: Le Séjour militaire, 1818; Les billets doux, 1819; La Bergère Châtelaine, 1820; Emma, 1821; Leicester, 1822; La Neige, 1823; Léocadie, 1824; Le Maçon, Le Concert à la Cour, 1825; La Témide, Fiorella, 1826; La Mulette de Portici, 1827; La Fiancée, 1828; Fra Diavolo, Le Dieu et la Bayadère, 1830; Le Philre, 1831; Le Serment, 1832; Gustave, 1833; Lestocq, Les Chaperons blancs, 1834; Le Cheval de Bronze, 1835; Actéon, L'Ambassadrice (alluding to Mme. SONTAG), 1836; Le Domino noir, 1837; Le Lac des Fées, 1838; Zanetta, 1839; Les Diamants de la Couronne, 1840; Le Duc d'Olonne, 1841; La Part du Diable, 1842; La Sirène, 1844; La Barcarolle, 1845; Haydée, 1847; L'Enfant prodigue, 1850; La Corbeille d'Oranges, 1851; Marco Spada, 1852; Jenny Bell, 1855.

"Auber began as a dilettante and thought he could fulfil his calling as a musician by a school-boy imitation of MOZART; it was not until his third opera, when a reverse of fortune compelled him to look to music for his daily bread, that he drew from his own inspiration, and the first throw proved successful. "Emma", and afterwards "Leicester", "The Snow", "Leocadia", "Fiorella", "Masaniello" (La Mulette), &c., placed him in the list of important musicians and made him a director of the Conservatoire.

"It is worth remarking with regard to Auber, that since his fifth opera, "Leicester," he has had no collaborateur but SCRIBE. This fidelity is somewhat touching, but it was also a shrewd calculation; for Scribe knows so accurately the peculiarities of Auber, he has studied his virtues and his failings so well, that he helps him in a libretto very much as our theatre poets in the writing of their dramas keep before their eyes the excellencies and defects of the actors. * * *

"Auber wants for a complete genius the heart of BOIELDIEU. He has esprit enough for three Frenchmen and melodies worthy of the richest Italians. He is elegant as an Athenian, and as full of imagination as a Southerner; but deep passion he is as little capable of feeling as expressing; he distinguishes himself from MEYERBEER in this regard, merely by the fact that he does not try to express any. He often lacks in unity and grandeur of song, but he supplies this want by elegance and richness. Auber is an individuality, a French individuality, and even in his orchestration he has the precision, the clearness, the sparkling, many-colored quality of the French mind, but at the same time its superficiality and limitation. As a Spring breeze merely stirs the surface of the lake to gentle ripples, so the music of Auber merely moves the surface of our sensibility.

"Auber is moreover full of knowledge, and it is a mere humor du grand Seigneur, if he loves to hide his science under flowers and gives himself out for a musical ignoramus. A like whim is it, if he, like ROSSINI, affects a contempt for music, such as the creator of his works could not possibly entertain at heart.

"From the overture to the last bar the new opera of Auber is distinguished by all the brilliancies and shades of the composer. It is a flower wreath of lovely melodies, a piece of musical fire-works, full of sparkling inventions and original turns. To celebrate the alliance with England, "Rule Britannia" and "God save the King" are woven into the third act with tolerably good effect."

THE THREE FISHERMEN.

BY CHARLES KINGSLEY.

Three fishers went sailing out into the West,
Out into the West as the sun went down;
Each thought of the woman who loved him the best,
And the children stood watching them out of the town,
For men must work, and women must weep,
And there's little to earn, and many to keep,
Though the harbor bar be moaning.

Three wives sat up in the light-house tower,
And trimmed the lamps as the sun went down,
And they looked at the squall, and they looked at the shower,
And the rack it came rolling up ragged and brown!
But men must work, and women must weep,
Though storms be sudden, and waters deep,
And the harbor-bar be moaning.

Three corpses lay out on the shining sands
In the morning gleam as the tide went down,
And the women are watching and wringing their hands,
For those who will never come back to the town;
For men must work, and women must weep,
And the sooner it's over, the sooner to sleep,
And good-by to the bar and its moaning.

SONG.

BY CHARLES KINGSLEY.

There sits a bird on every tree,
With a heigh-ho !
There sits a bird on every tree,
Sings to his love as I to thee ;
With a heigh-ho, and a heigh-ho !
Young maids must marry.

There blooms a flower on every bough,
With a heigh-ho !
There blooms a flower on every bough,
Its gay leaves kiss—I'll show you how :
With a heigh-ho, and a heigh-ho !
Young maids must marry.

The sun's a groom, the earth's a bride,
With a heigh-ho !
The sun's a groom, the earth's a bride,
The earth shall pass—but love abide,
With a heigh-ho and a heigh-ho !
Young maids must marry.

For Dwight's Journal of Music.

Music an Exponent of Emotion.

I have carefully read the article of "J. H.," in the last Journal, twice, and am not yet certain that I know what his opinions are. Let my remarks, therefore, be considered neither antagonistic nor in confirmation of his views, but simply as supplementary.

Theories are valuable only when they can be put to a test by some practical example. If it be claimed that Music can paint outward nature, let descriptive Music be played to those ignorant of its design and see how nearly they will agree in interpreting it. If it be claimed that Music can express definite shades of emotion, let Music designed to express such emotion be played to those ignorant of the design, and see how nearly they will agree in their analysis. If it be objected that the expression comes through the similarity of pieces with which associations of ideas are connected, let the experiment be tried upon those who have no musical memory whatever and see whether their analysis agrees with that of other persons.

I have been for twelve years in the habit of trying such experiments, taking every precaution against sources of error, and have come to the following conclusions, not doubtfully, but with all the fulness of conviction that I feel upon questions of science.

First; that Music is capable of expressing definite shades of emotion with precision and certainty, but it is not capable of painting scenes, except by the association of such scenes with such emotions. The expression of joyous exhilaration and a sense of freedom would, for instance, naturally suggest mountain scenery, but the music would not describe the mountains, it would only express the joyous exhilaration and freedom; and that to another person might suggest other circumstances. As "J. H." justly says, "the music might be written at the scene, but not of it."

Secondly; the expression lies principally in the melodic phrase, and only secondarily in the harmony, or in the tempo.

I will not trespass further on the time and space of the Editor of the Journal, as my proof of these two propositions would not consist in fine spun reasoning, but in a detail of hundreds of carefully devised, carefully tried experiments upon various individuals of my acquaintance.

Let me only add, that when an American or English Psalmist adapts a secular melody to sacred words, he does not, as "J. H." seems to imply, change the expression of the air. Batti, batti, and "Smyrna" have the same expression, and there's no religious element in it. On giving "Smyrna" to an unprejudiced person, susceptible to musical impression, but who had never heard of Batti, batti, he said:

"That is not fit for a sacred melody, it is the billing and cooing of a young married couple."

The melodic sentence from Handel—expresses the feeling of triumph, with a slight mingling of scorn, and will express nothing else, even if you should sing it to the words:

My genial spirits droop, my hopes are fled.

From the New York Tribune.

Ristori, the Italian Actress.

[Our foreign correspondents have occasionally referred to the great success which Madame Ristori, with a company of Italian actors, has lately achieved at Paris.—The following criticism upon her performance is taken from the Paris correspondence of the Grenzboten of Leipzig, and as giving the judgment of a cultivated and intelligent German, will be interesting.]

We have learned to recognize in RISTORI one of the first actresses of the present time, an artist worthy of reproducing the masterpieces of every literature. Shakespeare could ask for no lovelier Juliet, no tenderer daughter, no Desdemona with more artless passion; Goethe for no more charmingly self-sacrificing Klärchen, no more womanly-loving Gretchen, than this Ristori. She unites peculiarities which are found together only in the most highly gifted nature—in the most magnificent talent. The political condition of Italy, like that of Germany, has this beneficent influence, that it does not encourage on the boards capacity in one direction only, however great it may be. The Italian cities have not, like Paris, twenty theatres, every one of which fosters some morbid speciality—perhaps as geese are fattened with particular reference to their livers. In Italy, as in Germany, an actress who has become a favorite of the public must essay all departments. We cannot therefore wonder that Ristori has had occasion to develop all her present capabilities in beautiful symmetry.

Up to this time she has played three great parts—in Silvio Pellico's Francesca di Rimini, in Alfieri's Mirra and Orestes. We have only seen the two first.

Everybody knows the daring attempt of the prisoner of Spielberg to stretch out Dante's tragic catastrophe over five acts. In spite of the fine verse that distinguishes Pellico's muse, in spite of the poetic fervor which the echo of Dante's great creation awakens in the heart of the modern singer, the action, feeble, lifeless, and empty, limps on from scene to scene, till the decisive moment which Dante has painted so touchingly, so simply and so grandly in a single verse:

Quel giorno più non vi leggemmo avante.

The artist represented this soft passion, this resigned love, up to its last outburst of fiery passion, with so much simplicity, grace, purity and natural warmth, that we forgot for the time all the faults of the drama. Entranced by the wonderful tones of this musical voice—enraptured by this grace of feature—we followed with delight every lineament of this poetic creation as Ristori interpreted it to us. It is impossible to represent with greater truth this love battling under the veil of a pretended aversion—this sting of conscience, which awakens when passion rises into consciousness—the holy outflow, the irresistible longing, which transports to the fatal kiss,

La bocca mi baciò tutto tremante.

A great artist must she be called indeed who can introduce such innumerable shades, such a rich variety, into this tedious, uniform melancholy. But still greater astonishment does the actress excite in the part of Alfieri's Mirra. Who does not remember the horrible fable in Ovid's Metamorphoses? Mirra, the daughter of the King of Cyprus, loves her father Cynirus. * * *

* * * Herein lies her great triumph. This impossible part which the poet sought to shield from our abhorrence by all the arts of timorous concealment, she has unfolded to us without prejudice to that sympathy which the struggle of this noble and, in her rendering, chaste soul must awaken in us. Ristori revealed herself to us in another form. If she had a subdued, soft, womanly fondness as Francesca, as Mirra she knew how to bring out the womanhood of her heart in terrible dualism with the frenzy of excited passion. The spectator cannot for a moment forget that he beholds a fearful struggle between the most beautiful human purity and the most abominable love. If there is anything in this rendering which we have to censure, it is the lack of moderation which occasionally leads to overacting. But this fault is outweighed by the many excellencies which are displayed in other respects. Ristori can be a tenderly-loving, grateful daughter, a self-sacrificing friend, and a monster of passion urged on by the furies, and seldom is it that mien and gait and bearing follow the ever changing expressions of the tongue with such thorough truth as here.

Compared with Rachel, Ristori has the pre-eminence which versatility and completeness of talent must always have. Ristori is a woman, she has all the aid of the heart; hers is an artless nature, and in all her artistic representations she is animated by human passion. In comparison with her, Rachel is a statue with a fine voice. How great the difference is between the two actresses is seen in comedy. Ristori is coquettish, delightful, captivating—all the while artless and womanly, and all her characters breathe a spirit of decorum. Her form is noble, her features attractive; and to be called beautiful, she lacks only youth, but not youthfulness, which she possesses in its truest sense.

STANZAS.

We cannot bid our strength remain,
Our cheeks continue round;
We cannot say to an aged back,
Stoop not towards the ground.

We cannot bid our dim eyes see Things as bright as ever,
Nor tell our friends, though friends from youth,
That they'll forsake us never.

But we can say, I never will,
False world, be false for thee;
And oh, Sound Truth and Old Regard,
Nothing shall part us three.

Household Words.

Musical Chat-Chat.

We always long for music in summer and in pleasant places, just when we cannot have it. How a Beethoven symphony would sound into the innermost chambers of the soul, heard in the stillness of the woods, or by the lake or river side, instead of in close, crowded concert rooms, by dazzling gas-lights, amid fluttering fans and fashions! The seasons and the places which make this curious "harp of many strings," the human soul and nerves, most sensitively alive to music, are just those in which we have to be content with nature's and the soul's unwritten melodies. Doubtless it is all as it should be. Yet artistic music, of the finest, only not on the grand scale, may be enjoyed sometimes in the choicest haunts of summer leisure, and with the cool breeze of the sea shore. How pleasant, for instance, in these dog-day evenings, for the languid prisoner of the hot city to slip down to Nahant, and listen to a concert by our sweet singer, ELISE HENSLER, such as she announces for this very evening! She will be assisted by her younger sister LOUISE, and by Mr. FRANK HOWARD, who will sing some tenor songs, and Mr. BAUMBACH as pianist. Miss Elise herself will sing the cavatina from Linda, a song by Curschmann, Cherubini's Ave Maria, and Rode's Variations; also in a duet with her sister by Campana, and the trio from Don Giovanni. Are you not tempted?

It is pleasant to find the following about an artist ever dear to Americans, (and yet who since her return to Europe has been the theme of so much ill-natured, small newspaper letter-writing,) in the Hampshire (Northampton, Ms.) Gazette of July 24th:—"We have been shown a letter from Madame JENNY LIND GOLDSCHMIDT, addressed to a gentleman in this town, dated 'Ems (Nassau) 2d July, 1855.' Private in its character, the seal of confidence must not be broken and the public may not see it. Breathing noble and lofty sentiments, pure as the soul of their gifted authoress, inculcating a truly Christian spirit, and so child-like and unstudied in the sweet simplicity of its utterance, that letter is one which the recipient may cherish forever. The slanders sometime since in circulation relative to difficulties between herself and husband, are most satisfactorily refuted by the true and womanly affection which marks all her allusions to him in the letter. They or rather her husband has been carrying out her plans for the establishment of Schools in Sweden. Walter, her first born, claims the loving eulogy of a mother, at once touching for its beauty of expression and depth of sentiment. Mr. and Mrs. Goldschmidt from a residence in this town of some months, are both remembered by our citizens with warm interest. They will spend the winter in Rome."

Scarcely had we got our remarks last week about the brass bands into type, when, walking across the Common, towards evening, our ears were greeted by unwonted sounds, fraught with the memory of good old times, when bands were not all brass.—Verily we caught the sound of reeds, of clarinets, and on closer observation we even recognized the mellow blending influence of French horns! It was a battalion parade of Col. CHICKERING's regiment, and for the occasion BOND's excellent Cornet Band had been strengthened by extra instruments to the number in all of forty-two. There were not far from a dozen reeds, and we will venture to say, what no one within hearing that time will dispute, that never for years has our city heard such satisfactory music in the open air. We speak of course only of the sound, the euphony, the blended musical quality, richness and power of tone; and not of the pieces played, which of course were chosen with a military view. It was very good, and might be still better. This looks as if our agitation of the question of reeds versus brass had not been quite in vain. And now will it be deemed impracticable to organize and support prosperously that "Civic Band", for festivals and processions not military, and for concerts on the Common, of which we have often hinted? It might draft its members more or less from all the smaller bands, and be a sort of central, model band. It would find employment, principally, as above suggested, while a military use for it was also illustrated in the parade of Friday of last week.

A Musical Convention is to be held at Williams-town in this State, for the three days commencing August 7, under the charge of Dr. LOWELL MASON and Mr. LASAR of New York. The exercises will consist of Class practice and lectures on Church Music, Choir and Congregational Singing, elementary teaching, &c., and will close with a concert.... Mr. LASAR is to succeed Mr. ROOT as organist and director at the Church in Mercer street, also as professor of Music at the Rutgers Female Institute. The approaching Convention in Boston, under the charge of Mr. A. N. JOHNSON, will give us an opportunity, we learn, to hear some of the orchestral and operatic compositions of our townsman, Mr. L. H. SOUTHARD. An efficient orchestra, of at least thirty-six instruments, and perhaps larger, will be organized for the purpose of bringing out two concert overtures, which he has been composing. Also some portions of his unfinished opera: "The Scarlet Letter" will be tried with the aid of some of our best singers, since Mr. S., a new writer, is naturally anxious to learn what may be learned by testing the effect of what he has been shaping from his own ideal. It will add not a little interest to an otherwise interesting musical week. There is rumor of a plan in furtherance for next winter for the production of Handel's "Messiah" by our three Choral societies combined, making a chorus of at least 500 voices. This suggestion has been often made and urged, and we hope that nothing any longer stands in the way of its being realized.

The seekers of cool comfort in Newport, this season, have a full share of musical material. Besides BERGMANN and the Germanians, they have OTTO DRESEL and TRENKLE, from this city, besides Italian opera singers and artists of all kinds. Surely there is opportunity for some of the most classical feasts of music, as well as for "hops" and polkas. ALFRED JAEHL is still busily concertizing in Germany. Leaving Paris in the middle of April, in company with SIVORI, the violinist, he played at Nancy and Strasbourg, and then went to Frankfort-on-the-Main, where and in the surrounding cities, Mayence, Hana, Offenbach, &c., he gave concerts, after the American fashion, almost daily. In the first weeks of July he was to play at Bad-Nauheim, at Bad-Homburg, at Weisbaden, Baden-Baden, and all the Bads and Badens. Next he proposes a concert tour in Switzerland and Italy, and then to pass the winter in Vienna, Hungary, &c. When he gets weary, we hope he will seek rest once more in America. There is a story of Mme. GEORGE SAND having presented to ROSSINI, now in Paris, the libretto for a new opera. Few persons have a better understanding of the requirements of the lyric drama than George Sand, if we may judge from one of her most interesting Art novels, Le Chateau de Desert, as well as from Consuelo, which are full of the true philosophy of lyric Art. And no one living can compose such operatic music as the veteran author of "the Barber" and of "William Tell"—if he only would!

The Princess MARCELINE CZARTORYSKA lately proposed a concert in England in aid of the funds of the Polish Association. The Princess belongs to the distinguished family of Radzivil. Her house has long been a centre of Art and Music in Paris, where she studied under the Polish composer and pianist, CHOPIN, and became his most distinguished pupil. The Marquis of Breadalbane, president of the Polish Association, hearing of her proposal, immediately placed his mansion in Park lane at her disposal, and the concert was to take place on the 15th of July.

The programme for the Birmingham Festival is issued. The committee have engaged Mesdames GRISI, CASTELLAN, BOSIO, and RUDERSDORFF as principal soprani. The tenors are to be Sig. MARIO and Mr. SIMS REEVES, Sig. GARDONI, and Herr REICHARDT; the mezzo-soprano, Miss DOLBY. The basses will be Signor LABLACHE, Mr. WEISS, and Herr FORMES. On the first morning "Elijah" will be performed; on the second, Sig. COSTA's new Oratorio, "Eli"; on the third, "The Messiah"; on the fourth, "The Mount of Olives", MOZART's "Requiem," and a selection from "Israel in Egypt". The three Evening Concerts will be chiefly miscellaneous music, including Mr. MACFARREN's Cantata, "Lenora". The Athenaeum learns on tolerable authority that a young lady of the KEMBLE family may presently attempt to continue the long career of service done to Art by those of her name, as a singer. The sixth and last concert of the New Philharmonic Society, in London, took place on the 4th, HECTOR BERLIOZ being conductor. The programme included Berlioz's Harold symphony, which the Times praises; MENDELSSOHN's first symphony, (in C minor), written when he was a boy; the overture to Fidelio, and that to Abellino, by FRAEGER, which the Times does not praise; a piano Concerto by HENSELT, played by KLINDWORTH; Mr. HOWARD GLOVER's setting of "Tam O'Shanter", a Cantata, which seems to have been admired; and vocal solos, sung by Mlle. FALCONI and Mme. AMADEI.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, JULY 28, 1855.

Our Music Table.

If all other music goes to sleep in these breezless, sultry dog-days, there is one branch of musical activity which never sleeps nor rests. The ceaseless writing, arranging, compiling, publishing, re-publishing, advertising, puffing, selling, still goes on. An examination of the pile of new publications that accumulates upon a musical reviewer's table in any month's time, shows pretty clearly how the case stands with us as to musical taste, among the many and the few. It illustrates our musical history for the season past; exhibits the complexion and materials of our various concert, choir, and private musical enjoyments. For that is published, and that only, which has excited interest in the performance, or which the army of hack composers think to be sufficiently in the vein and style and tendency that is just now appreciated. Above all, that is published, which the greatest number can and will sing or play; at the same time not a few things which demand the rarest powers of execution. Well, in the absence of more pressing topics, let us again turn over what we find upon our music table; we will snatch up one work after another at a venture, sitting in judgment as the curate and the housekeeper did upon the library of the renowned knight of La Mancha, and at least read their titles before they go to the flames, for we may find something valuable and worth preserving. But much of this will get itself forgotten fast enough without the trouble of burning, and is too weak and innocent a kind of stuff to endanger the wits of any imaginative gentleman. To begin, then:

1. What has Mr. Ditson sent us here? The "Overture to Tannhäuser, arranged for the Piano, by RICHARD WAGNER." This is romantic, and might have had a place among the good knight's chivalry books. What shall we say of this? Of the overture itself, in its original form for orchestra, we have often enough had our say. The London critics to the contrary, it is the most original, bold, rich, imaginative and interesting overture that has appeared since those by Weber and Mendelssohn, and is sure to captivate an unbiassed audience. If Wagner is as bad a composer as they say, this composition does him more than justice. But arranged for the piano! Those crowded harmonies, those cunning, rapid, figurative passages, those contrasted masses of instrumental coloring, how are they to be got under the control of two hands? how even indicated—the form only, without color—by any hands but Liszt's? Nevertheless every pianist, or even amateur, who has heard the orchestra and is interested in new music, will find it a convenient form for reference. It is as clever a reduction as perhaps could be made, by the late THEODORE UHLIG, Wagner's friend, and it suggests, recalls the whole. It speaks to the eye, and so to the mind, even if it defy the fingers, which it does not in some parts, as the noble opening pilgrim's chant. It is well worth the small price, then, to have such a reminder of all the essential ideas and features of so remarkable a work.

2. Here again comes Mr. Ditson's "Harp of Italy." It has got some new strings, since we last sounded it. In the first place the quartet: A te o cara, of GRISI and MARIO memory, from I Puritani, and the loveliest piece of writing that we know in all BELLINI's works. Then: L'usato ardir, the solemn trio from the last scene of ROSSINI's Semiramide. A sextet (La sacrilega parola) from DONIZETTI's "Martyrs"—not too much harping on that string, we pray!—S'appressan gl'istanti; Quintet from Nabucco,—a good specimen of VERDI's concerted music. Vicino a chi s'adora, the fine quartet for soprano, two tenors and bass, from MERCADANTE's Il Giuramento. Verily a string for each of the leading masters of Italian opera!

3. The one really good thing from Rigoletto, the quartet: Bella figlia dell'amore, forming No. 11 of Ditson's "Beauties" of that opera. It is perhaps VERDI's most ingenious piece of part-writing, worked up with great effect, and has contrasted, characteristic melodies: a pure, fond, maidenly, betrayed soprano; a laughing contralto; a seductive tenor; and a revengeful bass.

4. What next?—A whole batch of waltzes, polkas, redowas, mazurkas, by all sorts of writers, and from all sorts of publishers. Also sentimental songs and ballads, for lisping boarding-school misses, who are perhaps among the best patrons of the music-trade. "Sad news from home," and "Glad news from home," with full length portrait of the author, &c. &c. Out of the window with them all! quoth the housekeeper; Amen! quoth the curate. Nay,—says the niece, save a pile of them, to look them over at more leisure; some of them may do for me, to dance by. Here's a pretty mazurka now; Son premier regard, "Her first Look," charming title, dediée aux dames, by PIERRE BERTHOUD, one of the most sparkling and clever of the tribe. Ditson has it.

5. G. P. Reed & Co. continue their "Selections from Il Trovatore, by VERDI." Selected and transposed by Sig. A. BENDELARI; translated by C. J. SPRAGUE. Here we have No. 3, Ah si, ben mio, an adagio for tenor, a mixture of cantabile and those declamatory forzando passages of high notes, of which Verdi is so fond. No. 5. Another adagio for soprano: D'amor su l'ali rosee; rather a wild and touching melody, with very florid cadence. No. 8. Terzettino, the little trio in the prison scene between Leonora, Azucena and Manrico, representing one of the most harrowing moments of the play. The Trovatore has not yet fully had its run; its admirers are for the time being many. Whether they will admire the music as much, when they come to try it at their own pianos, the present publications will test. Were we to send them all out of the window, to burn with the other rubbish, they might go to the tune of the first one: Stride la rampa, which, we have already noticed.

6. From the same publishers we have "Fifty Studies for the Piano-Forte, by CARL CZERNY," issued in six Books. The two first books, now before us, contain sixteen studies, of two or three pages each in length, each enforcing attention to some one particular feature of the Art of fingering with facility, the whole forming a sequel to the author's Etude à la Vélocité. The pieces are gracefully conceived, serve their special mechanical object well, and are not uninteresting.

7. From the same, two compositions by the brilliant and accomplished young pianist, GUSTAV SATTER. The first is an Etude de Concert, called Rêve, or "Dream." It is a whirling tarantella movement, time prestissimo, quite ingenious and graceful, and must be effective when played with facility and spirit. The other is a Nocturne: Minuit, or "Midnight," of a pensive, sentimental cast, also very pleasing.

8. "Sleep in sweet Repose", a Cradle Song, by W. TAUBERT, with German and English words.

(G. P. Reed & Co.) Both words and melody are charming. Whatever our friend, the "Diarist", and others may think of Taubert's heavier compositions, no man has written such exquisitely sweet and funny songs for children. He has composed a whole Mother Goose library of such, which are among the quaintest, prettiest and most natural things that ever blossomed in the fields of song.

9. "From grave to gay, from lively to severe." Here we find quite other food for contemplation—or for fire. "The American Harp, a collection of new and original Church Music, by CHARLES ZEUNER," reprinted from the original edition by O. Ditson. What! another of the everlasting tile-shaped books of psalmody! Will men never have done multiplying, by thorough-bass square and rule, their monotonous variations of this short old homely pattern? Away with it out of the window! Hold there! says the curate, this Zeuner has done the church and choir some service in his day. This is an old book, although it looks so new, twenty years old at least, and one that did much to refresh the lovers of good psalmody at that day and since. It is well worthy to be reprinted; for no man recently has shown so much original invention in composing within the short span of a psalm-tune, as Zeuner, or has embodied so much sound musicianship in forms so plain and humble. His harmonies smack of the rich German raciness and variety, without being artificial and affected; his four parts move together with a clear individuality; his rhythmical forms are often bold and novel, in keeping with the words and spirit of the several hymns, and this was the charm which first seized upon our singers, in such tunes as "Missionary Chant", "Luther's Chant", "Cenchrea Chant", "Calvin", "Melancthon", &c. Present examination satisfies us that even better tunes than these have lain latent in the book. The Anthems and Motets, too, are of the best in vogue. Without therefore changing our conviction that it would be better for the cause of Sacred Music, if this great, multifarious mass of thousands upon thousands of psalm tunes could be winnowed down to the solid and enduring grain of a few hundreds of the best, the oldest, most familiar, venerable tunes, and if the energies expended in multiplying variations of this plain type could go into larger forms of composition, we are really glad to see revived this notable production of Charles Zeuner.

10. O Salutaris Hostia, solo for tenor voice, with accompaniment for the organ or piano, by HARRISON MILLARD, (published by Nathan Richardson, Musical Exchange.) This is an offertory piece which the author himself has sung with great acceptance in the Catholic Cathedral in Franklin street.—It is in a flowing, melodious style, showing the traces of the influence of some of Haydn's easier masses, though perhaps more in the Italian vein, in the spirit of Bellini or Donizetti. It has melody and expression and must be useful in the Catholic service.

Here we pause for the present. We have not come across anything particularly classical this time, no Beethoven Sonatas or Mendelssohn Lieder, or Chopin Etudes and Preludes. But these did not require to be rescued. They are all safely laid up on our best shelves for permanence, and could not possibly come in question, as to the feeding of our La Mancha bonfire. Let us remind our readers, however—it may do some of them a service—that Ditson has completed his edition of the SONATAS of BEETHOVEN, and offers them all bound up (the whole thirty-six or more of them) in two volumes at the low price of $7.50 a volume.

OUR SELECTIONS.—Our first pages this week are loaded with pretty solid matter, which we willingly allow to offset the editorial lightness in this hot weather. The translations from WAGNER and from MARX may be found hard reading; they have an unforbidding exterior, couched in long German sentences, bristling like fields of bearded grain. But grind them, there is wheat in them.

A Suggestion.

MR. EDITOR:—I wish very much to obtain a fine bust of BEETHOVEN, and should like to ask if it would be possible to have one modelled from CRAWFORD's statue. If no copies have already been made, and the plan is practicable, would it not be well for some resident of Boston to open subscription papers for this purpose? I fancy many of those who intend being present at the inauguration of this statue in the Music Hall, next autumn, will be very glad to take to their distant homes a more substantial souvenir of the day than its simple memory, vivid as that will probably be; and by such, an opportunity of procuring a fine bust of the "great master" would be joyfully greeted.

ORIGINAL COMPOSITIONS.

BY B. F. BAKER.

This work is intended particularly for the use of choirs in churches; but it contains a complete series of elementary studies for schools and classes, together with a variety of pieces suitable for Singing Societies and Musical Conventions.

In the arrangement of the hymn-tunes, the editor has endeavored to combine simplicity and good taste; avoiding pedantic difficulties, and yet not falling into feebleness.

The subjects of the hymn-tunes are chiefly taken from the old masters; but as they have been more or less altered to suit them to different forms of metres, it has not been deemed necessary to give the names of the authors.

The hymn-tunes and anthems contributed by professional friends, are printed in their original forms, with the authors' names. The sentences, motets, and anthems contained in this work will be found adapted to the use of different denominations, on their various occasions of worship. In the hope that this work may meet the wants of choirs and singers generally, the editor respectfully submits it to the candid consideration of the musical public.

The Life of Music,

In the completion of the life-circle just described we see again the necessity of a higher progress.

In the sense of tune (or sound modulated to the play of our own moods) the soul becomes conscious of its own tendency and of its relation to the outer world, but as yet vaguely and as it were encompassed by deep twilight, in an uncertain, wavering state, like the rudderless skiff abandoned to the play of waves and winds. Very justly, years since, has NÆGELI (in his too soon forgotten lectures upon Music) maintained that Music does not give, does not determine feelings, it dissolves them; he was right as regards the music of mere moods, the only music that he knew. For this indeed excites moods and thereby calls up definite feelings and conceptions; but it shifts and alternates, as it is the nature of moods, according to the degree of tension and direction, and its last result is that chiaro-oscuro again, which leaves all in question. In the same way HEGEL justly maintains: "The tone-realm has indeed a relation to the mind and a correspondence with its spiritual emotions; but it never really gets beyond a more and more vague sympathy." He too has had no conception of any other Tone-Art, than this which weaves continually amid moods.

Every observer must by his own reflection have gone farther, even if Art had not already made the necessary progress.

In this wavering twilight state the soul of man cannot find ultimate satisfaction; he must have turned from an Art that could not lead him farther. For all growth of consciousness is a pressing onward out of darkness and uncertainty into light and distinctness; the infant at first distinguishes only light and darkness, then it recognizes forms as a whole; first it grasps with eager little hands whatever is presented to it, then it finds some things desirable, and despises other things. The mood is the general expression of the moment; the same mood persisted in becomes a fixed desire, and rises to a passion; the return of the same mood marks a determinate state of mind, becomes a trait of character. Describe the course of your moods fully and naturally to one who understands men, and you give him a conception of your state and nature,—he will unriddle you. And upon this way, which his insight finds into your heart, the single moment itself, which at first seemed only a vague, wavering mood or vibration of the soul's chords, will gain a sharper, perhaps an entirely distinct significance.

Let us pause here upon this first point. Its traces appear early in the history of Art.

If the Oriental nations for thousands of years held firmly to their five-toned scale (f, g, a, c, d), while at the same time they knew the intermediate tones and used them in another connection (g, a, b (bb), d, e);—if the old Church scales or Modes (see my "Theory of Composition") drew around themselves such strict limits: what could have been the ground of this striking abstinence (which was not the humor of an individual, but the tendency of the whole age and of all the nations) unless it were the internal conviction, that precisely this circle of tones was the accurate expression of the enduring popular feeling, or of one of its predominant and oft-recurring moods,—in a word that its expression was characteristic? And this recognition was so certain, that even now, upon our present height of freest and all-sided command in the realm of tones, the power of that expression is preserved and frequently appears undesignedly. The Chorales of that age are still effective in their predetermined character; BEETHOVEN'S Lydian song of thanksgiving (op. 132) found its peculiar expression in that scale; I too, in my hymns for six male voices, was led into the Mixo-Lydian and Phrygian Church Mode, and in the first aria of "Moses" quite unconsciously (for the historical precedent at that time was not entirely clear to me) into the primitive tone-sequence of the East; the middle age harmonies, too, in their mystical, now vanishing and now reappearing connection and strangeness have floated about LISZT'S imagination in several of his Harmonies Religieuses.

If all this may be called mere echo of past times, we have, quite externally, and therefore all the more distinctly, a firm trace of progress even in those first works of Beethoven, in which he still moves in the path of his predecessors, HAYDN and MOZART. Compare such works, for instance, as the C major, the D major, the B flat major, the F major Symphony, the Sonatas op. 10, 53, 106, with the like works of his predecessors: you find two deviations which cannot escape the most superficial observation. In the first place, the melodies with Beethoven have become larger; outwardly regarded, they are longer, and pursue more steadfastly one subject and direction; accordingly there are fewer of them than with Mozart especially, who is fond (as in his Figaro overture, the first sentences in his Symphony in C, and his Sonata in F in the first set) of stringing together two or three different sentences. And in the second place, the working up of the motives and the sentences is richer and at the same time more persistent; from which it follows naturally enough, that Beethoven in his finales (as it seems to me) frequently arrives too late at the conclusion. Whether this last remark be right or wrong, how much is said in all this? That Beethoven lingers longer with his passages; which is as much as to say, that he continues longer in the same mood; that this mood, which is so changeable with Mozart, has become with Beethoven a fixed, determined feeling. Haydn in this stands nearer to Beethoven than to Mozart, only that his subject-matter, especially in his symphonies, is by far more uniform,—the same childlike joy, jubilant and resounding like the people's song,—the same pleasant, lively satisfaction even in his tranquil moments, like an uninterrupted thanksgiving in a life so smooth and cheerful.

Here we must resume the thread of our investigation.

So soon as our Art has passed from the sphere of fluctuating moods into that higher sphere, where moods are firmly held and psychologically unfolded into true types of life and character, then has there dawned for it the day of higher truth and higher existence, the day of creation. For truth presupposes some determined course or tenor, which we would pursue and keep; each existence must separate itself from the universal and round itself off into an individual self hood; creating is shaping, definite shaping, and not vague outpouring. The Middle Age with its ORLANDO LASSO, PALESTRINA, ALLEGRI, down to past the time of ALESSANDRO SCARLATTI into the old Italian opera, was only able to shape in respect to form; its counterpoints ran on as they were obliged to; its harmonies joined themselves to one another like crystal vessels merely to contain the consecrated word of divine service and hold it up before the congregation, like a pyx of silver sounds. Individual life, life of any peculiar and persistent tenor, only appeared in rare, brief moments,—for instance somewhat in that Benedictus of GABRIELI, cited in my "Theory of Composition". Beyond the expression of single moods or moments the old Italian Opera and its twin-brother, the Oratorio, with its echoes in England (PURCELL) and in Germany (HASSE, GRAUN, NAUMANN) never go; nor does the German national lyric drama of REINHARDT and KEYSER, nor the French opera; HANDEL is the first who gives us more fixed types of character; and even he oscillates back quite frequently into the vague, into mere musico-crystalline formalism, where tone springs after tone and motives are spun out without any deeper necessity or meaning than to give freer, wider play to tones and voices.

No sooner does the thought become definite and characteristic, than the composer has revealed to him what there is characteristic in the musical intervals. It had existed naturally from forever, indeed it often presented itself in the most naïve and striking manner in the people's songs; we meet it in the lays of the Minnesingers, in the German and Scandinavian national melodies, in the Church tunes, as that Phrygian one: Aus tiefer Noth, in Ein fester Burg, &c. Scattered everywhere, but nowhere more frequently than in those primitive Gaelic people's songs (which we owe to England) we find the tuneful vitality of the East, in which a whole family of nations have poured out their inmost experience, full of strife, of love, of sorrow and adventure. More conscious and more powerful is the striking significance of the intervals in Handel's songs, in those arias from "Semele" and "Saul", in the grand moments of his choruses, although the master in the tempest of his crowded life and in the hurry in which he composed his oratorios, often had to surrender himself to the traditional play of tones, to a conventional even if it were a grand manner. But no one, either before or since, has equalled SEBASTIAN BACH in the deep and truest apprehension of the characteristic. In the recitatives of his Matthew "Passion" there is absolutely not a tone set otherwise than in a pure and perfect truthfulness, according to the most precise and characteristic meaning of the intervals; we can almost say as much of many airs, of the Matthew choruses and of many others of his works; even in a portion of his piano and organ works we may trace this quality of truthfulness and significance, although here for the most part it is sometimes mere mood and sometimes mere tone-play that predominated.

It was under the control of this deep insight into the tone-life, it was in this master, that Harmony in all its rationality was developed in such richness, such logical consistency, and such significance as it has been the task of the theory of composition to make understood. Whatever has been discovered or created by later musicians, has necessarily—so far as it was not chance suggestion without consequences—conformed itself to that trait of profound truth and rationality, which was revealed and vouchsafed to the old master for his service to the Holy Scripture.

When the art of representing character had acquired power, it could now set up different characters, person against person, and illustrate the type of one through the countertype of another. The Middle Age had wrought in Counterpoint, because it had to do so; even PALESTRINA was unable to introduce dialogue into his lofty song otherwise than by two antiphonal choirs; nay even in secular and stage representations, instead of the acting individuals, choruses responded to one another from behind the scenes; even HEINRICH SCHUETZ required a full chorus of voices for the words of Christ, who speaks to Paul in person as an individual man (or as the departed spirit of an individual). What was here a necessity of undeveloped Art, could now shape itself into real polyphony, into the placing of one voice against another, each of peculiar character and tenor.

We freely confess, that our Art is not capable of bringing a character, an object so distinctly and perfectly before the eye, as poetry and sculpture. But by way of compensation it has the advantage over the latter of the power of progressive development, and over the former of making several different and opposite characters speak at the same time. It may not name or divine who you are; but it brings before us all the stirrings of your soul, and makes them audible, and from them we feel and can divine who and how you are. And it places you among your equals and your adversaries, and brings you all before us, as you live and breathe and sound, so that we perceive the being and the nature of the one in that of the other in its fullness. It is a progressive monologue, full of colloquial, dialectic matter, two or more-sided, like the dialogues of Plato, but artistically treated with the advantage of really dramatic contrasts and antagonisms.

New Views of Opera.

[Extracts from ROSSINI's "Opera and Drama," as translated by the London Musical World.]

V. "EMANCIPATION OF THE MASSES"—THE CHORUS.

Let us now consider in what the influence of the national element upon melody, and through the latter, upon opera, consisted.

The popular element has always been the fructifying source of all Art, as long as—free from all reflection—in its natural growth, it could raise itself to a work of Art. In society, as in Art, we have only been living on the people, without knowing it. When, at the greatest distance from the people, we held the fruit on which we existed, to be manna, falling just as it pleased Heaven, into the chops of us privileged persons, the elect of God, men of wealth, and geniuses. When we had, however, squandered away the manna, we cast a hungry look at the fruit trees upon earth, and, as robbers by the grace of God, with bold, robber-like consciousness, despoiled them of their fruit, perfectly indifferent as to whether we had planted or tended them; nay, more—we pulled up the trees themselves to the very roots, in order to see whether we could not render even the latter palatable, or, at any rate, fit to be swallowed. In this manner did we pillage the entire natural wood of the people, until, at last, now stand, like them, naked, hungry beggars.

Thus, then, has operatic music, also, when it became conscious of its complete incapability of procreation, and the drying-up of all its genius, flung itself upon the people's song, which it has sucked dry to the very roots, the fibrous remains of which it now throws to the people as their wretched unhealthy food. But even operatic melody itself has no prospect of fresh nourishment; it has swallowed up every thing it could swallow up; without the possibility of fresh fructification, it is dying unfruitful; it is now gnawing itself with the agony of a ravenous person at the point of death, while German Art-critics call this repulsive self-devouring "a striving after higher characteristic," having previously baptized the act of overthrowing the pillaged fruit-trees the "Emancipation of the Masses"!

The operatic composer was unable to comprehend the true popular element; in order to be able to do this, it would have been necessary for him to have created in the spirit and according to the peculiar views of the people; that is, to have himself formed part of the people. He could only comprehend the especial element, in which the peculiarity of the popular element manifests itself, and this is the national element. The coloring of nationality, already completely obliterated among the higher classes, only existed in those portions of the people who, bound to the soil of the field, the river bank, or the valley, were restrained from all fructifying interchanges of their peculiarities. It was, therefore, only something that had become stiff and stereotyped that fell into the hands of the plunderers before mentioned. As every peculiarity, no matter of what kind, in the fashion of the various foreign national costumes, previously unnoticed, was employed in unnatural finery, so in opera, a number of separate traits, in melody and rhythm, detached from the life of obscure nationalities, were placed upon the piebald framework of worn-out, empty forms.

This mode of proceeding, however, necessarily exercised upon the bearing of this kind of opera an influence which we have now to consider more closely, an influence which consists in the change of the relative positions of the factors of the opera, and which, as we have already said, was received as the "Emancipation of the Masses."

Every artistic tendency approaches more nearly perfection in exactly the same degree that it gains the power of more solid, clearer and surer form. The people, who, in the beginning, utter their astonishment at the wide-working wonders of nature, in exclamations of lyrical feeling, poetically raise, in order to master the object that thus excites their astonishment, the wide-branching natural phenomenon into a god, and then the god into a hero. In this hero, as their own image, they recognize themselves, and celebrate his deeds in epic poetry, while they actually represent them in the drama. Stepping from out the chorus, the tragic hero of the Greeks looked back and said to it: "See, thus does a man really Act; what you celebrate in opinions and maxims, I place before you as indisputably true and necessary." Greek tragedy comprehended, in the chorus and the hero, the public and the work of Art; the latter was directly presented in tragedy, with the opinion on itself—as the poetical view of the matter—to the people, and the drama ripened as a work of Art exactly in the same proportion that the explanatory judgment of the chorus was so irrefutably expressed in the actions of the heroes themselves, that the chorus would step completely off the stage among the people themselves, and assist as vivifying and realizing participators of the action—as such. Shakspeare's tragedy most undoubtedly stands so far above that of the Greeks, inasmuch as it has completely overcome the necessity of the chorus to the artistic technical details. In Shakspeare, the chorus is merged in individuals participating in the action, and behaving as entirely in obedience to the same individual necessity of opinion and position as the principal hero himself, while even their apparent subordination within the artistic outline is only evident from their further points of contact with the principal hero, but not at all from any fundamental technical contempt for the secondary personages; for, in every case, the most subordinate character has to take part in the principal action, and expresses himself completely in accordance with his own characteristic, free mode of thinking.

That Shakspeare's decided and well defined characters have in the subsequent course of modern dramatic Art continued to lose more and more of their plastic individuality, and sunk to mere fixed dramatic masks without any individuality at all, is to be attributed to the influence of a State system arranging everything according to a settled order of rank, and oppressing more and more the right of free individuality with fatal violence. The phantasmagoria of such character-masks as these—inwardly hollow, and destitute of all individuality—was the dramatic basis of opera. The more unsubstantial the personages behind these masks, the better adapted were they considered for singing the operatic air. "Prince and Princess"—such is the whole dramatic axis round which opera turned, and—when viewed in the light—still turns. Anything like an element of individuality could only be bestowed upon such operatic masks by outward touches, and, finally, it became necessary for the peculiar locality of the scene of action to supply the place of that which they had once for all inwardly lost. When composers had completely exhausted the productivity of their art, and been obliged to borrow local melody from the people, they ended by clutching at the entire locality itself: scenery, dresses, and that which had to fill them out, the accessories capable of movement—the operatic chorus became, at last, the principal thing—the opera itself, which was compelled to cast, from all sides, its flickering light upon "Prince and Princess" in order to preserve the unfortunate beings in their painted vocal existence.

Thus was the revolution of the drama fulfilled to its deadly disgrace; the individual characters to which the chorus of the people once raised itself by the aid of poetry, were hurried away in a stream of chequered, mass-like accessories, without a centre. We regard as such accessories the whole prodigious scenic apparatus, which cries to us, through machinery, painted linen and motley attire, as the voice of the chorus: "I am myself, and there is no opera without me!"

It is true that noble-minded artists had previously availed themselves of the national element as an ornament; but with them it could only exercise a sweet and charming spell in those cases where it was added as appropriate and requisite for a dramatic subject animated by characteristic action, and where it was introduced without any ostentation. How admirably could Mozart give a national coloring to his "Osmin," and his "Figaro," without seeking for it in Turkey or Spain, or even in books. But "Osmin" and "Figaro" were actual, individual characters, happily conceived by the poet; endowed by the musician with true expression, and not to be missed by any performer of sound feeling. The national additions of our modern operatic composers, however, are not employed upon such individualities, but intended to impart, in the first place, to something of itself completely without distinctive character a foundation in some way characteristic, for the purpose of animating and justifying an existence naturally indifferent and colorless. The point to which all sound popular element tends, the purely human characterizing principle, is, in our operas, altogether wasted, as a colorless insignificant mask for singers of airs, and this mask is only to be artificially animated by the reflection of the surrounding color, for which reason the color of the accessories is daubed on in the most glaring and conspicuous manner.

In order to animate the desolate stage around the singers of airs, the people, after having been robbed of their melody, were, at last, brought on the stage itself; of course, however, it could not be that people which discovered the melody in question, but the docile, well schooled mass, that marched up and down to the time of the operatic air. That people was not required, but the mass, that is to say, the material remains of the people, whose living spirit had been sucked dry. The mass-like chorus of our modern opera is nothing more than the scenery and machinery of the theatre endowed with the power of walking and singing—the dumb splendor of the coulisses changed into moving noise. The "Prince and Princess," with the best will in the world, had not anything else to say for themselves than their flourishing airs which had been heard a thousand times; at last, an attempt was made to vary the theme by causing the whole theatre, from the coulisses to the chorus, that had been increased a hundred fold, to sing the sad air with them, and that, too—the greater the effect to be produced—no longer in several parts, but in really tumultuous consonance. In the "Unison," at present become so celebrated, the true pith of the reason for the employment of masses is most evidently manifested, and, in the operatic sense, we hear most assuredly the masses "emancipated," when, in the most celebrated passages of the most celebrated operas, we hear them execute the old worn-out air in hundred-voiced unisonance.—Thus it is, too, that our present system of State has emancipated the masses, when it makes them, in military uniform, march in battalions, wheel to the left and to the right, and shoulder and present arms; when Meyerbeer's Huguenots rise to the greatest height, we hear in it what we see in a battalion of the Prussian Guard. German writers call this—as we have already said—the emancipation of the masses.

Memoirs of Field.

John Field was born in England, about the year 1780, and had the good fortune to become a Piano-forte pupil of the great Clementi, whom he accompanied at various times to Paris, where his first performance as a solo player so delighted all the musical judges who were present, that they did not hesitate to indulge the hope of soon seeing him the first piano-forte player in the world. After Field had by incessant practice brought his mechanical powers to the highest degree of perfection, and had published in London several of his shorter compositions for the piano-forte, he accompanied his beloved master on the grand tour which the latter made in the year 1802, through France, Germany, and Russia. It was on Field's third visit to Paris, in company with Clementi, that his playing excited the most extraordinary attention; the perfect and incomparable manner in which he performed the celebrated Fugues of John Sebastian Bach, "and which in more recent times has delighted the best judges who have heard him," excited in an especial manner the astonishment of the Parisians. He himself was accustomed to maintain, that to play one of these pieces as it ought to be played, it was necessary to study it thoroughly one month, and to devote another to the practice of it. On their arrival at Vienna, where Field's performance was also exceedingly admired, Clementi advised his pupil to place himself under the celebrated Albrechtsberger, in order that he might become better acquainted with the contrapuntal branch of his art. Field readily consented; but when the time for Clementi's departure from Vienna, arrived, Field could not make up his mind to the separation, and prayed, with tears in his eyes, to be taken with him to St. Petersburg. His request was granted, and on their arrival in the golden city of the North, Clementi introduced his pupil to all his innumerable friends, whose astonishment at his admirable performance was unbounded. On Clementi's departure for the South, Field remained at St. Petersburg, where he was found on his master's return to that city, in somewhat less than a year afterwards, so honored and so esteemed, that he might very properly have been named the ideal of musical perfection of the Russians, and he enjoyed this distinction not unjustly. All unprejudiced musicians who heard him at that period, are unanimous in the opinion that he stood quite alone and unrivalled, and that his touch and tone were the most perfect that it is possible to conceive. His mode of holding his hands on the instrument was worthy of imitation; his fingers alone played, without any unnecessary movement of the hand and arm, each finger striking the key with such mechanical power and nicety, that he was enabled to produce the loudest as well as the softest tones, the shortest as well as the longest notes, in equal perfection, without the slightest visible effort. As he never sought to excite the astonishment of the uninitiated by apparent difficulties and unparalleled rapidity of execution, it may readily be conceived that he did not like to play upon instruments whose touch was so easy that their keys would move as it were with a breath. It is true there are those who maintain that it is necessary to make use of such instruments in bravura playing: this was not Field's style; yet so charming and so successful was he in the execution of the minutest passages, that even Hummel, in his best days, could only be pronounced second to him.

It can afford little satisfaction to learn that there have been those who have idly carped at his performance; this much, however, is certain, that all who have heard him, not excepting perhaps these hypercritics, have been improved by it. But it requires perseverance, and more power than many will believe, to play in that elevated style which he has chosen—a style of which many give their opinion without in the slightest degree comprehending it. It is, therefore, not to be wondered at if his compositions do not answer the expectations of all,—at least of all piano-forte players; for his wonderful and in some degree most lovely and dream-like trifles, require throughout a perfect and beautiful touch, a singing tone, and that delicate, decided, and often piquant expression so peculiar to the composer. His style of piano-forte playing has been compared to Catalani's style of singing; those who made the comparison, adjudging to Field the advantage of a still superior taste.

Under all the circumstances we have stated, one cannot be surprised to find that instruction by him was eagerly sought and most liberally rewarded. So little, however, did he contrive to become a rich man, that he is said on the contrary to have occasionally experienced the inconveniences resulting from an opposite condition of affairs. He was always a good-tempered, and somewhat child-like man, whom, notwithstanding, it would be great injustice to accuse of any deficiency of mind. But a certain, and far from common, personal indifference, was, however, peculiar to him, which though we may pardon it in so great an artist, occasioned him many annoyances.

In the year 1822, Field determined, on what grounds has never yet been rightly ascertained, to quit St. Petersburg, and take up his residence at Moscow. He is said to have alleged as a reason for doing so, that his art was more extensively patronized in the latter city, than it was at St. Petersburg. Whether it were so or not, to Moscow he went in 1822, and by his first public concert there, netted no less a sum than 6000 rubles; while his accession of pupils of both sexes was incredibly great. It became the fashion to be a scholar of Field's; and the consequence was, that parents brought their children to him from the most remote parts of the empire, that they might have it said of them, they had been taught by Field. Until at length he gave his lessons occasionally, while lying in his bed in an adjoining chamber.* From Moscow, Field took several journeys into Courland and Livonia, occasionally residing for some time in one or other of those countries. Journeys of greater extent he did not very readily undertake. He seemed quite unwilling to visit Germany, the very land of harmony. He knew his own weakness in this branch of music. While the natural fondness which we feel to the habits which we have contracted, and his enjoyment of the social life of Moscow, which had given him a slight fondness for the wine cup, are the causes chiefly to be blamed for his keeping himself so long secluded in the regions of the North.

At length, in the year 1829, he resolved to take a trip by water to London, a resolution which he, however, did not carry into effect until the year 1832. From London he proceeded to Paris, when some disappointment was expressed that his playing was no longer distinguished by the same power and beauty, for which it had formerly been so remarkable. In 1833, we find him in the south of France, on a grand professional tour, wandering from Toulouse towards the East, gathering fresh laurels in every city that he visited. In 1834 he left Geneva for Italy, where little was heard of him except at Milan. On his arrival at Naples, he was seized with a dangerous illness, which compelled him to remain there until the summer of 1835, during which time there is reason to fear he labored under many privations. He is said to have left Naples for Russia in the company of a Russian family.

Field was married some years in Russia to a French lady, from whom, however, he had long been separated. Like her husband, she too was a piano-forte player, and exhibited publicly at Kiew, with, it is said, very indifferent success.

* Chopin is said to have been his pupil at this time, but there must be some mistake in this statement, as Chopin, ardently as he desired it, had neither seen nor heard Field up to the year 1838 or 1839.

The following are regarded as the principal of Field's compositions: Three Sonatas for the piano-forte, dedicated to his master, Muzio Clementi. These were followed by some Rondos and Romances for that instrument; 'Deux airs en Rondeaux'; 'Variat. sur un air Russe, pour piano à 4 mains'; a waltz for four hands, which may also be styled a Rondo; 'Air du bon Roi Henry IV. avec accomp. de piano, varié;' (the text added to this piece contains the words with which the Emperor Alexander was greeted at the grand Opera, on the first taking of Paris, and also the text with which he was received in the Theatre at Russia on his return.) 'Chanson Russe, varié,' (seven variations in D minor.) His most celebrated works are, however, his 'Nottornos,' of which the first three appeared in 1816, the fourth and fifth shortly afterwards, and the last, after a long interval, in 1835. He has likewise written several concertos, of which the six first were played by him in 1820, and prepared for the press. The commencement of the seventh was likewise played by him at Moscow, in 1822, although it was only published for the first time in 1835.

[The above was written during the life-time of Field. He died in Russia, January 11th, 1837. Ed.]

A DEAD ROSE.

BY ELIZABETH BARRETT BROWNING.

O rose! who dares to name thee?
No longer roseate now, nor soft nor sweet;
But pale, and hard, and dry as stubble-wheat,
Kept seven years in a drawer—thy title shame thee!

The breeze that used to blow thee,
Between the hedge-row thorns, and take away
An odor up the lane to last all day,—
If breathing now,—unsweetened would forego thee.

The sun that used to smite thee,
And mix his glory in thy gorgeous urn,
Till beam appeared to bloom, and flowers to burn,
If shining now,—with not a hue would light thee.

The dew that used to wet thee,
And, white first, grow incarnadined, because
It lay upon thee where the crimson was,—
If dropping now,—would darken where it met thee.

The fly that lit upon thee,
To stretch the tendrils of its tiny feet,
Along thy leaf's pure edges, after heat,—
If lighting now,—would coldly overrun thee.

The bee that once did suck thee,
And build thy perfumed ambers up his hive,
And swoon in thee for joy, till scarce alive,—
If passing now,—would blindly overlook thee.

The heart doth recognize thee,
Alone, alone! The heart doth smell thee sweet,
Doth view thee fair, doth judge thee most complete—
Though seeing now those changes that disguise thee.

Yes, and the heart doth owe thee
More love, dead rose! than to such roses bold
As Julia wears at dances, smiling cold!—
Lie still upon this heart,—which breaks below thee.

Everything in a Great Name.

BY F. LISZT.

When I was very young, I often amused myself with playing school-boy tricks, of which my auditors never failed to become the dupes. I would play the same piece, at one time as of Beethoven; at another as of Czerny; and lastly as my own. The occasion on which I passed myself off for the author, I received both protection and encouragement: "it really was not bad for my age." The day I played it under the name of Czerny, I was not listened to: but when I played it as being the composition of Beethoven, I made dead certain of the "bravos" of the whole assembly. The name of Beethoven brings to my recollection another incident, which confirms my notions of the artistical capacity of the dilettanti. You know that for several years, the band of the Conservatorio have undertaken to present the public with his symphonies. Now his glory is consecrated: the most ignorant among the ignorant, shelter themselves behind his colossal name; and even envy herself, in her impotence, avails herself of it, as with a club, to crush all contemporary writers who appear to elevate themselves above their fellows. Wishing to carry out the idea of the Conservatorio, (very imperfectly, for sufficient time was not allowed me,) I this winter devoted several musical performances almost exclusively to the bringing forward duets, trios, and quintets of Beethoven. I made sure of being wearisome; but I was also sure that no one dare say so. There were really brilliant displays of enthusiasm: one might have easily been deceived, and thought that the crowd were subjugated by the power of genius; but at one of the last performances, an inversion in the order of the programme completely put an end to this error. Without any explanation, a trio of Pixis was played in the place of one by Beethoven. The "bravos" were more numerous, more brilliant than ever; and when the trio of Beethoven took the place assigned to that of Pixis, it was found to be cold, mediocre, and even tiresome; so much so, indeed, that many made their escape, pronouncing that it was a piece of impertinence in Monsieur Pixis to presume to be listened to by an audience that had assembled to admire the master-pieces of the great man. I am far from inferring by what I have just related, that they were wrong in applauding Pixis' trio; but even he himself could not but have received with a smile of pity the applause of a public capable of confounding two compositions and two styles so totally different; for, most assuredly, the persons who could fall into such a mistake, are wholly unfit to appreciate the real beauties in his works.

BERLIOZ'S "HAROLD" SYMPHONY.—Of this composition, on the occasion of its recent performance at the last concert of the New Philharmonic Society, Berlioz himself conducting, the London Times speaks as follows:

The symphony of M. Berlioz, which has already been heard at the concerts of the Philharmonic Society, and at those of M. Jullien, in Drury-lane Theatre, is, with all its inequalities, one of the best works of its composer, and, in spite of some occasionally over-fantastic instrumentation, a fine musical poem, full of variety and feeling, and throughout highly imaginative. The opening of the first movement, the March of Pilgrims, and the serenade of the Abruzzian Mountaineer, are replete with exquisite fancies, and decked out (the last two especially) with a richness and delicacy of orchestral coloring that alone would render them fascinating, had they no other attractions. The finale, in which the wandering Harold (Byron's hero) recalls the scenes supposed to be illustrated in the preceding movements, contains much that is striking and picturesque, although it may be suggested that the brigands and their obstreperous revels are brought forward somewhat too obtrusively in the foreground of the picture. The symphony was, on the whole, magnificently played. The character of Harold—which, as is well known, is musically represented by an obligato viola standing out prominently from the rest of the orchestra in every movement—is admirably conceived. On the present occasion it devolved upon Herr Ernst, who not only showed himself as great a master of the viola as of the violin, but gave to every passage an expression so poetical that the design of M. Berlioz was rendered as clear as in the hands of a less gifted executant it might have been left obscure. The loudest applause was bestowed upon every part of the work by the audience, who listened to it with profound attention from beginning to end.

ORIGIN OF GOTHIC ARCHITECTURE.—I have before alluded to the strange and vain supposition, that the original conception of Gothic architecture had been derived from vegetation—from the symmetry of avenues, and the interlacing of branches. It is a supposition which never could have existed for a moment in the mind of any person acquainted with early Gothic; but, however idle as a theory, it is most valuable as a testimony to the character of the perfected style. It is precisely because the reverse of this theory is the fact, because the Gothic did not arise out of, but developed itself into, a semblance to vegetation, that this resemblance is so instructive as an indication of the temper of the builders. It was no chance suggestion of the form of an arch from the bending of a bough, but a gradual and continual discovery of a beauty in natural forms which could be more and more perfectly transferred into those of stone, that influenced at once the heart of the people, and the form of the edifice. The Gothic architecture arose in massy and mountainous strength, axe-hewn, and iron-bound, block heaved upon block, by the monk's enthusiasm and the soldier's force; and cramped and stanchioned into such weight of grisly wall, as might bury the anchorite in darkness, and beat back the utmost storm of battle, suffering but by the same narrow crosslet the passing of the sunbeam, or of the arrow. Gradually, as that monkish enthusiasm became more thoughtful, and as the sound of war became more and more intermittent beyond the gates of the convent or the keep, the stony pillar grew slender, and the vaulted roof grew light, till they had wreathed themselves into the semblance of the summer wood at their fairest; and of the dead field flowers, long trodden down in blood, sweet monumental statues were set to bloom for ever beneath the porch of the temple, or the canopy of the tomb.—Stones of Venice.

Music Abroad.

Paris.

JULY 1.—Les Vêpres Siciliennes has been performed seven times, and great is the enthusiasm about—CRUVELLI. ROGER, the best French tenor, has been re-engaged and is to take part in the new opera, Santa Chiara, by the Duke of Saxe-Coburg-Gotha (Prince Albert's brother), which will be published towards the end of August. ROSSINI'S "William Tell" is in rehearsal at the Grand Opera, in which M. CHARLES WICARD will make his début. No means probably will be spared to make the revival of this masterpiece worthy of the Academy and of the jolly veteran composer, who may be seen sunning himself on the Boulevards every pleasant afternoon. At the Théâtre Lyrique, AUBER'S Sirène has been brought out, with three new performers:—Mlle. PANNETRAIT, M. DULAURENS and M. PHILLEUX. All the theatres and operas are overflowing nightly during the World's Exposition and under favor of fine weather. M. BERLIOZ has hastened home from London to be one of the judges of the musical instruments. The Conservatoire has been performing the Armida of GLUCK; the choruses electrified the public. We extract the following from the Paris correspondence of the Philadelphia Evening Bulletin:

Next to the military, or rather as part of them, the military bands deserve notice. At least two of them play every evening, in the garden of the Palais Royal, or the Tuileries, or the Place Vendôme, before the superb Napoleon column made of the guns taken in his victories. There is always an audience of several thousands, among whom the most perfect order is observed, and every one tries to hear the music without disturbing his neighbor. Those bands that I have heard, number about fifty men each; one was entirely of brass instruments, while in the other was a proper proportion of wood.—The drums are generally in the hands of boys. The tunes are chiefly selections from popular operas, and as every Frenchman is familiar with and interested in the last new opera brought out at the Imperial Opera or Opera Comique, you are almost sure to hear extracts from Meyerbeer's or Auber's or Verdi's latest work played by the military bands.

It has required some exercise of courage to go to the theatre during the hot weather that has prevailed, but I have ventured once to the Opera Comique and twice to the Grand Opera. At the first I heard Meyerbeer's Etoile du Nord, on its 118th representation—a fine work, but rather heavy for a comic opera, and striking me as even more labored than its predecessors. It was admirably sung and acted by Mme. UGALDE, M. BATAILLÉ, M. MOCKER and others, and the ensemble, as in all French theatres, was excellent. At the Grand Opera I have heard Verdi's first French opera, Les Vêpres Siciliennes, a single hearing of which impressed me favorably, and leads me to think it the best written, though perhaps not the most interesting, of its writer's compositions. Mlle. CRUVELLI was the prima donna, a young, fine looking woman, with a fresh, exuberant voice, which she uses with great skill, but not always with equal care, depending for effect on occasional lours de force, and then relapsing into an indifference of manner in singing as well as acting. M. GUYMARD was the tenor, and the other singers I have forgotten, but they were not so good as we have often heard in America. The Prophète has been brought out at the same theatre, for the re-appearance of Mlle. ALBONI, and I heard her sing the music of Fides in an incomparably beautiful style. She is as lazy and insouciant as ever in her appearance, and, if possible, fatter. M. ROGER played the part of John of Leyden, and as it was written for him, and he has done it a couple of hundred times, he did it well. He is a handsome little fellow, with a strong and good tenor voice, but not equal to either MARIO or SALVI, though the French regard him as the best of living tenors. The perfection of the scenic effects at the Grand Opera has often been spoken of, and certainly nothing could surpass the style in which the Vêpres Siciliennes and the Prophète were brought out. The orchestra numbered about seventy, the chorus and supernumeraries over one hundred, and the corps de ballet as many as fifty at least. All of them, too, were admirable in every respect. The theatre is neither so large nor so magnificent as the New York opera house, but the performances in it are much finer.

London.

WAGNER AND BERLIOZ having departed, and Philharmonic Concerts, New and Old, being at an end, the lion of the day is MEYERBEER, who is superintending the rehearsals of his Etoile du Nord, with the coöperation of COSTA, at the Royal Italian Theatre. It is said the mise-en-scène will be on a scale of magnificence to rival that of CHARLES KEAN's "Henry VIII." at the Princess's Theatre. Mme. BOSIO (who is reported to have separated from her Greek husband) is to be Catharine, the heroine of the piece; FORMES will be Peter; and GARDONI, LABLACHE, LUCHESI and Mme. MARAT fill the other parts. Meyerbeer is delighted with the zeal of them all; and the Musical World boasts that when he comes to hear the orchestra he will say there is no need for forty rehearsals, however it may be in Paris; for "our fiddlers are better readers at sight than their confreres on the other side of the channel, and have better instruments."

The operas performed at the Royal Italian during the first week of July, were La Favorita, Les Huguenots, Lucrezia Borgia and one act of Il Barbiere (without MARIO), Don Pasquale and La Vivandière. The Trova-tore was withdrawn the week before, when Mlle. JENNY NEY made her last appearance.

Mrs. LUCY EASTCOTT recently appeared at Drury Lane in Rossini's Donna del Lago. The Daily News thus notices the debut:

Mrs. Lucy Eastcott, who performed the part of Elena, is an American lady whose recent successes at several of the principal theatres in Italy have been much spoken of. Her appearance is youthful and pleasing. Her figure is small and somewhat slight, but very elegant; her features are very delicate and feminine, and her voice, a high soprano, is remarkably clear and flexible, with that vibrating quality which conduces greatly to expression. Her intonation is beautifully true, and her execution and style are those of a highly accomplished artist. The manner in which she sang her first air, O matutini albori, charmed the audience at once; and her whole performance, full of refinement, spirit and sensibility, was a continued triumph.

CONCERTS. Mrs. ANDERSON, pianist to Her Majesty, gave a concert at the Royal Italian Opera, assisted by the whole vocal and instrumental force of the establishment, including GRISI and MARIO, CLARA NOVELLO, BOSIO, VIARDOT, TAMBERLIK, LABLACHE, &c. &c.; BERLIOZ conducting. Mr. ALFRED MELLON's Orchestral Union gave their third and last concert, assisted by Mlle. KRALL, and Signor BIANCHI, vocalists; M. ALEXANDER BILLET, pianist, SAINTON, violinist, and BOTTESINI. Symphonies by Haydn and Mendelssohn, and a concerto by Mozart, were among the selections. Two youthful prodigies, pianists, have been giving concerts, namely, Master WERNER, and Master ARTHUR NAPOLEON, styled "the celebrated Portuguese pianist." Both were much admired. The latter played Mendelssohn's Avants and Rondo Capriccioso, Thalberg's Muse fantasia, Beethoven's Pastoral Sonata, Schumann's "Carnival," and other difficult pieces.

The one hundred and thirty-second meeting of the three choirs of Hereford, Gloucester, and Worcester, for the benefit of the Widows and Orphans of Clergymen in the three dioceses, will be held in Hereford, on Tuesday, August the 21st.

The principal vocal performers are to be Madame Grisi, Madame Clara Novello, Mrs. Weiss, Miss Dolby, Miss Moss, Mr. Sims Reeves, Signor Mario, Mr. Montem Smith, Mr. H. Barnby, and Mr. Weiss.

The solo instrumentalists are Mr. Amott (organ), Mr. Done and Master Napoleon (pianoforte), and Mr. H. Blagrove (concertina). Mr. Townshend Smith, as usual, at Hereford is to be the conductor. A numerous orchestra has been provided, and the chorus has been selected from the three cathedral choirs and from the choral societies of Hereford, Gloucester, Worcester, and Liverpool.

The Festival begins as usual with full musical service in the cathedral, including Spohr's overture to The Last Judgment, followed by Preces, Responses and Chant to "Venite," by Tallis, and Psalms by Mr. Townsend Smith. The Dettingen "Te Deum" of Händel will then be sung, as well as a "Jubilate," composed for this festival by Mr. G. Townsend Smith. Haydn's chorus, "The Heavens are telling," is to follow the third collect. Before the sermon, Mendelssohn's 98th Psalm, for eight voices, and after it, Beethoven's "Hallelujah Chorus," from The Mount of Olives.

The morning of Wednesday is devoted to Mendelssohn's Elijah. On Thursday, the same composer's Hymn of Praise will form the first part, and the second part consist of an overture by the Rev. Sir F. A. Gore Ouseley, Bart., The Christian's Prayer of Spohr, Luther's Hymn, sung by Mme. Clara Novello and Chorus, Händel's air, "Sound an alarm" (Judas Macabæus), by Mr. Sims Reeves and Chorus, and Mozart's Twelfth Mass. On Friday, The Messiah, in accordance with ancient conventionality.

Every evening, as usual, a miscellaneous concert is to take place at the Shire Hall; and after the concert on Wednesday evening, there will be a ball, which will no doubt add considerably to the funds.

UNIVERSITY OF DUBLIN CHORAL SOCIETY.—On Saturday, the 30th June, a performance of sacred music was given by this association, in order to celebrate the completion of the new Bell Tower, which has been erected at the cost of £3,000 by the Primate of Ireland. Notices and sketches of this edifice have appeared in the Builder and Illustrated London News; it is of granite and Portland stone, and is about ninety feet in height. The first part of the concert consisted of various selections, some having reference to the bell and its offices, in summoning to prayer or study, or tolling the knell of the dead. The second part consisted of a cantata written by J. F. Waller, Doctor of Laws in the College, and set to music by Dr. Steward, the conductor of the Society; this, which occupied forty minutes in performance, is a composition of considerable pretension, including tenors, solos, with chorus, symphonies for instruments, a soprano solo, and two choral fugues, one of which, that at the conclusion, is very elaborately wrought and effective. At one part of the cantata, at the lines—

"To Jehovah's praise,
Be the first notes rung,
From its iron tongue."

The bell was tolled eight times; the communication between the new tower and the hall where the music was performed being effected through the agency of an electric apparatus placed in the orchestra, and connected with wires of some hundred yards in length, which were carried across two of the quadrangles, the windows of the hall being opened to admit of the sounds being heard. The whole performance was most satisfactory, and the poet and composer of the cantata were complimented by the persons of distinction connected with the College.

Musical Chat-Chat.

We trust the interesting sketch of the life of JOHN FIELD, the pianist and composer, which we have copied this week, will lead some of our students of the piano to seek acquaintance with his six beautiful Nocturnes, of which Mr. RICHARDSON, at his Musical Exchange, has recently published a very neat edition. When it is known that these first set the model of that form of composition, afterwards followed by CHOPIN, KALKBRENNER and others of the new pianists, they will be studied with peculiar interest. ROBERT SCHUMANN speaks of the Nocturnes of Field and Chopin as "ideals of their kind;" and in noticing the appearance of the three last of the six here referred to, says: "One feels as if, after an adventurous tour through the world, and after a thousand perils by sea and land, he had at last got back to the ancestral house; everything looks so safe and in the old spot, and the tears might almost start into one's eyes." In another place, speaking of Field's seventh Concerto, he writes: "I am all full of him, and know of nothing rational to say of him, except infinite praise."

We see it stated that Mr. G. A. MACFARREN has been engaged by the Birmingham Festival Committee, to write, in the Birmingham Journal, analyses of the chief classical works to be performed, "with the purpose of strengthening the idea, in all intelligent minds, of the great artistic, moral and national value of this very important musical occasion." Such analyses by competent persons, we should think, would add much to the interest and efficacy of all occasions at which great musical compositions are preformed. Another novelty promised for the Birmingham Festival is a finale, composed by PRINCE ALBERT, called, 'L'Invocazioni dell' Armonia.' The Prince Consort figured as a composer at the same festival in 1852.

The Musical World seems to be made as happy by the presence of MEYERBEER in London, as it was cross by that of WAGNER. For instance: "Judging from the manner in which he is fêted and received in all quarters, the composer of the Huguenots will not find cause to regret his visit to the metropolis of Great Britain, after an interval of three-and-twenty years. In all places, high and low, wherever music is loved, Meyerbeer is honored and fêted. From the palaces of Princes, Ministers, and Ambassadors, to the concert rooms of Exeter and St. Martin's Halls, there is a general demand for his society. He must eat everyone's dinner, and hear everyone's concert. So that, what with his daily occupations at the theatre during rehearsals, and his numerous engagements, morning and evening, Meyerbeer must have his hands full, and very few minutes to spare. Nevertheless, at 7 A.M., day after day—those who get up soon enough, and have the wish, may see the celebrated musician taking his "constitutional" walk in Hyde Park, some hours before breakfast. It is at this early period of the day that he composes—like Auber, on horseback, in the Champs-Élysées, and Spohr, in his garden, at Hesse-Cassel."

Miss ELISE HENSLEY's concert at Nahant, last Saturday evening, is said to have been eminently successful. All the summer residents were present, as well as a large representation from the city, filling the large dining hall of Mr. Stevens's hotel. Every body was delighted with the singing of the two sisters, and there seems to have been quite a rivalry of opinions between the finished art of the older and the freshness of the younger voice. Much is said of the beauty of the steamer trip by moonlight, though to our grosser apprehension here an east wind fog and even rain prevailed. Perhaps those who had faith and went, saw otherwise; Diana deigned to smile on them; and if not Diana, at all events the Muse of Song rewarded them. Mr. HARRISON MILLARD gave a Matinée of vocal and instrumental music at Newport, on Tuesday, assisted by OTTO DRESEL, and Mr. TRENKLE, pianists, and by Messrs. BERGMANN and MEISEL, of the Germanians. All the artists were warmly applauded. Among the listeners were Mme. LAGRANGE, Signor MORELLI, AMODIO, &c.

Our Worcester friends have had another treat in the shape of a Soirée of choice and classical music, by their townsman Mr. B. D. ALLEN. The programme included Beethoven's overture to Egmont, for four hands, played by Miss BACON and Mr. ALLEN; "If with all your hearts," from "Elijah," sung by Mr. STOCKING; Beethoven's Sonata in C, op. 2, by Miss Bacon; Duet: La ci darem, Miss FISKE and Mr. Stocking; Andante and Variations by Schumann, for two pianos, Miss Bacon and Mr. Allen; "I know that my Redeemer liveth," Miss Fiske; a string of piano solos, namely, a prelude and waltz by Chopin, and song without words by Mendelssohn, played by Mr. Allen; and finally selections from Haydn's "Creation," On mighty pens, and, On thee each living soul, sung by Miss Fiske, and Messrs. Stocking and A. S. Allen. A very admirable programme that for the "rural districts!" They deserve praise who inculcate such lessons of sound musical taste in "the heart of our old Commonwealth." We are told, too, upon good authority, that the performances were worthy of the high character of the music.

Amid the triumphs of our HENSLEY and our other native prime donne and tenori, who have been studying in Italy, we have wondered (as have many of our readers, doubtless) at the silence of the press about our fair Boston contralto, ADELAIDE PHILLIPS. It is a long time since we have heard even of her whereabouts. In Milan for some time she had to contend against intrigues of rivals and the clamorous Verdi passion of "young Italy," demanding everywhere high voices. This interfered with prosperous engagements; yet wherever she was heard, her voice, style and dramatic talent won decided favor. We have just received from a friend some cuttings from Italian newspapers, which show that she is still winning laurels in that land of song, despite the tyranny of new fashions. The first is dated Rovereto, May 4, and tells how a large audience in spite of bad weather, attended "the benefit of the primo contralto assoluto, Signorina A. Phillips." She introduced into her part in the first act of Il Crociato, "which was executed throughout with the greatest precision," the scena and cavatina of Arsace from Semiramide, and in the last act of Romeo and Gialietta, some variations on the theme: La Biondina in gondola. "The perfect intonation, the robustness and extent of voice, united to a rare sweetness, with which she executed these pieces, leave all encomium behind, and the reiterated plaudits and callings before the curtain, from the beginning to the end of the play, were a serious proof of the ample satisfaction of the public." The same article expresses great hopes of her performance in Il Giuramento, in which she was to appear with Signora DONATI. The same paper, La Fama, of June 4, alludes again to the benefit as the most successful night of the season, and speaks of the flowers and poetic tributes thrown to her; among the latter was the following sonnet in her praise, which we will not attempt to translate, but offer in the original for those who read the Italian:

ALL' ESIMIA CANTANTE, ADELAIDE PHILLIPS, PRIMA DONNA CONTRALTO AL TEATRO SOCIALE DI ROVERETO, NELLA SUA SERATA DI BENEFICIO.

Sonetto.

Adelaide, tu canti!—E i mesti detti,
Che l'angoscia d'amor strappa a Elmireno,
Eco destan gentile in ogni seno,
Ricordo forse dei perduti affetti.

Adelaide, deh canta!—Benedetti

Sono i soavi tuoi concenti... Meno
Non verrà bella fama, e ognor sereno
Tu a te stessa così avvenir prometti.

Canta, Adelaide!—Chè un' ebbrezza pia
La grazia dell'accento al cor apprende...
E son gemelle, il sai, beltà e armonia.

Canta!—Chè il canto più sentiti rende
Gioia, amore, dolor, malinconia
In chi del canto la virtù comprende.

La Presidenza del Teatro.

OULIBICHEFF, the Russian biographer of Mozart, whose admirable writings about that master and about music generally were first introduced to English readers through our columns, is about to publish a work entitled "Beethoven and his Commentators". He was too completely swallowed up in Mozart, when he wrote of him, to be able to appreciate the Symphonies and Quartets of Beethoven. But no one who has read the former work can doubt the deeply appreciative musical nature of the man; and now that he has been concentrating his attention upon Beethoven, we shall be much disappointed if he does not show some signs of progress and do more justice to the great modern master.

Miss LOUISA PRNE is still warbling to delighted crowds at Niblo's Garden. Fra Diavolo was among the last operas announced. . . . It is rumored that BALFE, the English, or rather Irish opera composer, is to preside over a series of operas at the Academy in October.

Our Music Table.

There still remains a fearful pile of new or recent musical publications before us, to be disposed of. To review them all, in any true sense of the word, were quite impossible; and so they grow and grow, a frowning night-mare wall about the poor reviewer, if he own the obligation to speak either well or ill of every thing that he has sent to him. Verily it was not a bad device, into which we were forced by sheer necessity last week, for extricating ourselves from such a quandary. The gentlest animal, when fairly cornered, turns upon his pursuers and shows fight. So we, dropping the apologetic, assume the opposite tone. Instead of offering excuses to the publishers for not helping to immortalize their works, we think it wiser to assume, (what there can be no reasonable doubt of), that the main mass of musical publications in this country is as surely doomed to oblivion, as was Don Quixote's library to the flames, and it is enough for us, as for the curate and the barber then, to call upon each, as it goes out of the window, to show cause, if it can, why it should be saved. We generously interpose this our net or sieve to catch whatever pearls there may be, lest they run through with the sand.—But dropping metaphor, let us to our task again for an hour or two and see what we can rescue.

1. Here, at the outset, we have something really worthy of the attention of our amateur pianists: "25 Etudes, introductory to the art of Phrasing, by STEPHEN HELLER. Op. 45. (G. P. Reed & Co., publishers). The first Book, or half of these is now before us. The two Books form the third number in the "Complete Series of Studies by Stephen Heller," to be issued by the same publishers, classed in the order of their difficulty, as follows: No. 1, Op. 47. "25 Studies for improving the sense of Rhythm and Expression;" No. 2, Op. 46. "30 Progressive Studies;" No. 4, "The Art of Phrasing." The fourteen little pieces now before us are marked by the elegance, geniality, poetic feeling, and clearness of form, characteristic of all Heller's compositions. They are less difficult than the generality of his "Preludes," which we have noticed during the year past. Each is a complete expression of a simple musical thought, in which the idea and form, the melody and harmony seem to have had birth at once, in one act of inspiration. There is great variety among them, while the same quiet, delicate artistic spirit pervades them all. Some of them fasten themselves upon the memory like "Songs without Words."

2. From the same publishers we have a third Book of the "Fifty Studies, by CARL CZERNY," mentioned in our last. These are technical, working studies, in the literal sense of the word, and not tone-poems, like the above by Heller. Yet, as we said before, they are by no means uninteresting. There is some beauty in the drill. This set affords exercises in "Rapid minor scales"; in "crossing hands, quietly and softly"; in "extensions"; in "double octaves"; in "equal movement of both hands"; in "the Trill"; in "light touch with the fingers of the left hand"; and in placing "the thumb on the black keys with a perfectly quiet position of the hand."

3. "Tone-Blossoms", six characteristic pieces for the piano, by F. SPINDLER. Op. 43. (G. P. Reed & Co.) We have here No. 2. "Forget me Not", and No. 3, "Nosegay of Violets", both very pleasing, naive little pieces, graceful in form and refined in sentiment, and not at all difficult.

4. "Musical Flowers—Six Rondos and Variations upon favorite themes, by C. T. BRUNNER, Op. 70. If the last-named "blossoms" were wild-flowers (which we dare not affirm), these are flowers transplanted and artificially developed. They are themes from operas, treated after the conventional pattern, with introductions and variations; but very simple of their kind. We have before us No. 2, from Lucrezia Borgia, and No. 4, from Belisario. The variations are clever and afford good finger exercise.

5. "The Vocalist's Companion", by EDWARD B. OLIVER; pp. 17. (Oliver Ditson). Here are "exercises for developing, strengthening and equalizing the voice, designed as introductory to and to be used in connection with the solfeggio exercises of Panzeron, Crivelli, Lablache and others." The author or editor has shown his intelligent comprehension of a music-teacher's task in a little book, to which we sometime since called attention: "The Practical Text-Book for the Piano." The exercises and instructions here bear the same marks of thoughtful experience and sound judgment.

6. Here we have a gay pictorial crew; the colored vignettes on the outside are so dazzling that it is enough to look at them, without examining the music. These are pieces (says the curate) got up for the glorification of publishers and of the glorious system of "reduced prices," which has been trying to make such a stir in the newspapers, and not for any really musical end. Here for instance is the "Sparkling Polka," by THOMAS BAKER; sparkling enough, no doubt, for he is a clever musician; but the main thing about it is the splendid view upon the title page of the interior of the publisher's great piano and music establishment, (Horace Waters, New York), where you can see all the fashionable butterfly dresses of Broadway eagerly swarming around the polished squares and grands, and waited on by the politest clerks. Here is another, that counts upon large sales by flattering political party feelings. It is a song called "Sam," and the likeness of the individual meets you in the frontpiece; a dashing, fancy boy, with curling hair and smooth, aristocratic face who looks as if he never did any work, but made it a business to sit there looking fiercely patriotic, with a very Noli me tangere expression about the eyes, more in harmony with the stripes and stars and guns above his head, than with his own soft rosy face and dandy air. It matters little what the music is, since "Sam" is anything but musical; yet if he would follow the advice of Putnam's Magazine, and, learning a lesson from the German Song Unions, resolve his numerous clubs and lodges into singing societies, he might possibly be the source of some good to his country. Here is another of the same sort, called "Our Boys," a Ballad, for solo and chorus; and "Our Girls" is promised. Away with such trash to the ——— Know-Nothings! "Or rather," interposes the barber, "let me have them for the pictures; they will do well to ornament my shop, where they will both entertain my customers and advertise and glorify the publishers."

7. But here are more sober and substantial looking things from the same house, (Horace Waters, 333 Broadway). 1. "Gems of Sacred Song", selected and arranged by T. BAKER, including in numbers: "Come unto me", by DAVIS; "Angels ever bright and fair", by HANDEL, &c., &c. 2. A clever ballad by J. L. HATTON who always writes cleverly: "Good bye, sweet heart". 3. "Le Sourire" (The Smile), a graceful, flowing, placid Reverie for the piano, by CHARLES VOSS, one of the cleverer Dii minores of modern German pianism. 4. "Etude Mazurke", by TALEXY, a pretty enough Mazurka, with prestissimo introduction, and wrought up with considerable bravura. These can do no harm. But BALFE's woful ballad: "The Heart bowed down" (as if everybody did not know it well enough already to their cost!) belongs plainly to the mechanical-sentimental school:—one of those melodies, which always seem as if they had been ground out of a hand organ in the first instance. And as for "Let us alone", a ballad by H. C. WATSON, shall we not take it at its word? (We forgot to say that Messrs. Fetridge & Co. are agents in this city for the numerous cheap publications of Horace Waters). Here endeth the second lesson.

Schumann and Rubinstein—Alfred Jaell in Frankfort.

From the Journal of Frankfort we translate the following account of one of JAEEL's concerts in that city. From the comparison it draws between the compositions of SCHUMANN and the new virtuoso RUBINSTEIN, it should interest those who watch the tendencies of modern German music, while their interpreter on that occasion has many friends here who will be pleased to read all that is said of his performance.

"The Concert began with ROBERT SCHUMANN's great D minor Sonata (op. 121) for violin and piano. We do not belong to the especial admirers of this composer. From the most of his works there speaks more or less a sickness or unnaturalness, which is not quickening, since it runs decidedly counter to the chief end of all true music, which is to elevate, to make glad the soul. Nevertheless Schumann is a great talent, a highly cultivated musician, and could not fail to achieve something excellent in his way. This excellence we have to seek, to be sure, less in the total effect of his pieces, than in their details; for his works, especially his larger ones, are wanting above all things in internal harmony (?). And so it is too with this Sonata, of which the first and last movements sound partly tedious, partly ungracious, whereas almost the entire Andante and the Scherzo are not only very interesting, but very pleasing. A frequent and unbiassed listener to such music, finds more and more in it that is valuable; there are in fact no readily digestible common-places. If any one has the power to make the most of Schumann's piano works, it is Herr JAEEL, with the fullness of his artistic means; and their genial application in this instance left nothing to be desired. Herr ELIASON (violin) seconded him with fervor and with taste.

"Let us turn now from the alpha to the omega of the Concert: to the G minor Trio, for piano, violin and violoncello (op. 15), by RUBINSTEIN. Schumann and Rubinstein follow pretty much the same direction: both seek out new paths; and yet their music is as different as their ages. Schumann is ripe, Rubinstein is yet budding. With Schumann there is more of gloom and misery, with Rubinstein more of vivacity and cheerfulness; with the one it is a deep, dull glow, with the other a bright fire; with the one a sickly excitement, with the other a gushing overfulness of health; the former paints in autumnal grey, the latter in fresh spring green. But enough of such always lame comparison! In this Trio the young virtuoso and composer shows himself in a very advantageous light. Talent and knowledge go hand in hand. To be sure the full cup foams over here and there; but the new, fermenting firewine will at length grow clear and quiet and refresh even those who have been partial to the moss of centuries. The brilliant work is grandly laid out and carried through ingeniously; only too much is sacrificed to effect. The first movement, as the most important, ought to stand at the end; the Andante is graceful and original; the Scherzo a perfect master piece, so full of life and inspiration, as if it came at one gush, that it takes both artists and laity by storm. The work reaped rich applause, but unfortunately it can only become familiar in a few places, since the very predominating piano-forte part can only be mastered by a pianist of the first ability. Yet JAEEL rose above its gigantic difficulties, and presented his part as calmly and clearly as if it had been a Sonata of Mozart. Herr ELIASON and Herr SIEDENTOFF also made themselves easily at home in the strange style.

"Among the ensemble pieces we may mention an Andante and Variations, for two pianos, by Schumann, which are distinguished by a beautiful principle theme. Messrs. ROSENHAIN and JAEEL played with excellent mutual understanding on two fine Mozart flûgels. Fräulein ELISE SCHMITT shone in the singing of Schubert's "Wanderer" and Lindblad's Auf dem Berge, tastefully accompanied by Jaell.

"All the rest were solo pieces for the piano, in which Herr Jaell found opportunity to show his eminent virtuosity on all sides, especially in his extremely clever and brilliantly wrought paraphrase on themes from Lohengrin and Tannhäuser, which was followed by applause and callings out, as if they would have no end, which moved him to volunteer a transcription of his own upon an English ballad. If the audience were carried away by the grandeur of his bravura in the paraphrase, they were quite as much so this time by his unsurpassable trill, which hovered for ten minutes long, in every possible shading, without interruption, over the whole charming piece. Quite original seemed the coupling of a very worthy Prelude of Chopin with Bach's precious C minor Fugue. The rendering was as noble as the effect was satisfactory. Great applause also followed his transcription of 'Lohengrin's reproof to Elsa,' and his 'Italian Serenade,' which breathes a southern charm and glow."

The piece ends quite rhapsodically, pronouncing Jaell's execution above all praise. Does it not recall many a scene in our own concert rooms?

WORKS OF ART.—We cheerfully call attention to the advertisement, below, of Messrs. CHANDLER & CLAPP. Every opening of a new home for Art is to be hailed as a blessing to our city. In these utilitarian times when the enterprising genius of trade is levelling every old tree and building over every old garden, that once made the heart of the brick wilderness to smile, the least it can do in return is to give us beautiful shops and depots of the works of Art. And every lover of the Beautiful must have been glad to notice recently the multiplication of elegant picture shops in our city. The last and most attractive of these is the establishment just opened in Winter street, where may be found the most extensive, choice, and tastefully arranged collection of drawings, engravings, casts, &c., that is anywhere offered to the public in this country. The proprietors are gentlemen of taste and experience in their line, and their plan is somewhat unique, aiming at nothing less than a true Art exchange, and making it their business to procure whatever rarest and best works of Art, of every kind, may come within their reach. Their rooms have an æsthetic, as well as hospitable aspect, in what was a spacious dwelling house; the neat sign over the door, the bas-reliefs by Thorwaldsen over the windows, and the head of the Phidian Jove greeting you at the threshold, awaken a souper in the passer-by of something tasteful and recherche, which is fully confirmed when you enter.

NEW COURSE OF HARMONY, BY L. H. SOUTHARD.

The Publishers call the attention of the musical profession to this work, as one eminently calculated to lighten the labors of the teacher, and rapidly advance the pupil. It is emphatically a PRACTICAL work, serving both as a Manual of instruction on the one hand, and a Text-book on the other; and it is believed that the peculiar arrangement of the work, together with the very large number of exercises and examples, presents great advantages, to both scholar and teacher, over any similar work of the kind. Teachers highly commend the work. Mr. WILLIAM MASON says it is a work unsurpassed in the language. Mr. GEORGE J. WASS says that it is a work perspicuous in diction, methodical in arrangement, and sufficiently copious to embrace all the essentials of the general doctrine of accord. It can be ordered through any respectable Music-seller, and will be sent through the mail on the receipt of the price, ($1.75,) postage prepaid.

NEW AESTHETIC JOURNAL. THE CRAYON,

A Weekly Paper devoted to ART, offers itself to the attention of all who are interested in the elevating and refining influences of Beauty. Among the contributors to THE CRAYON already are BRYANT, LOWELL, STREET, REMBRANDT PEALE, A. B. DURAND, President of the National Academy of Design, DANIEL HUNTINGTON, HENRY K. BROWN, and amongst those engaged are LONGFELLOW, BAYARD TAYLOR, GEO. W. CURTIS, REV. H. W. BEECHER, REV. SAMUEL OSOOD, REV. H. W. BELLows, Hon. CHARLES SUMNER, and others of our most eminent writers. A series of papers by RUSKIN, and essays left by the eminent sculptor, HORATIO GREENOUGH, add to the interest of The Crayon.

From the Cincinnati Gazette.

We have already strongly recommended THE CRAYON, and every succeeding number proves it to be more and more worthy of all we have said in its praise. No journal, devoted to Art, has ever been so ably conducted, in this country; and if it meets with the support it so richly deserves, we have no doubt that it will exert a most wholesome influence upon the taste of the country.

The Life of Music.

From this point musical Art develops its dramatic nature and energy. Those two old heroes head the column: HANDEL, in whose choruses each part, according to its range and distribution of tones, unfolds a peculiar character; BACH, in whose choruses the dramatic genius wakes with the power of his subject, and every voice with and beside all the others or contrasted with them is full of most striking expression, such as was alone vouchsafed to him out of the fulness of the Holy Scripture quickened to new life within him. You must have before your mind his 'Passion' according to St. Matthew, his "Come, Jesus, come", his "Be not afraid", his Incarnatus, Crucifixus, Resurrexit in his high Mass—why need I name them all!—you must strive to enter into the spirit of these works, if you would (in times so full of hypocritical Christianity in words and works and ways as ours, and in view of the dissolute and sickly autocracy and Voltaire-ism of the century in which Bach lived) hold any firm conception of the mighty inspiration of faith, which here, like a voice from the tombs of prophets and apostles and revivalists, called out to a world too narrow and beset with care to apprehend and cherish what was high.

This same dramatic quality—which differs from the tone-intricacies of mere Counterpoint, as the life of conscious creatures differs from coral structures or from that "frozen music" to which SCHLEGEL likens architecture,—we often meet in Bach in his accompaniments to the voices, and often in his pure instrumental passages. * * *

The same thing appears in Handel, and, on quite another field, in their immediate successor, the dramatic composer, GLUCK.

Contrapuntal art and power do not appear in this more intellectual than purely musical great man; compared with his great predecessors and followers, one might boldly say of him, he was not capable, or rather was not willing (such a mind can do what it wills, and wills what is suited to its nature and its mission) to write a duet or a trio. Before his mind there stood another goal, and he has reached it. Out of the play of tones and phrases and the old wooden operatic forms, all based on that, the Genius of the Drama rose before him; impatiently he flung the trumpery aside; he had dragged his weary weight about with it long enough; truth of expression, character, the dramatic moment, these only would he serve, these should reign supreme. Turn to the work, in which his idea is pronounced most strongly, to his "Iphigenia in Aulis"; we find that understanding of the tone-relations—so far as the livelier scenic movement as contrasted with the repose and depth of Bach allowed it—applied to the most faithful expression of the words. (Of course we must go back to the language of the original, the French). To the most striking cadence he adds such rich, elastic strength of rhythm, as we find in no one except Æschylus, whose rhythmical power was certainly not known to Gluck. How readily upon the instant anapæsts spring up to him, as if for a lively war dance! How thoughtfully he measures time and quantity in every sound! How truly and strikingly, according to measure and cadence, he declaims every word even in the arias and choruses, and how musical, how melodious the declamation! The songs of Agamemnon: Brillant auteur, of Clytemnestra: Que j'aime and Armez vous, of Iphigenia: Les veuz, the choruses: C'est trop faire and Non jamais,—and who knows how much more—may be played with satisfaction as pure music pieces; and then you may sing them acceptably, before you become aware, that through and through, syllable for syllable, they are moulded to the weight and meaning of the words, nay, to the spoken sound, wherever it is significant, just as the body is moulded to the spirit that created it and uses it, or the bride in fidelity and tenderness to the chosen of her heart, as Hafiz-Goethe beautifully has it:

Let the Word be called the bride,
The bridegroom is the Soul!

If his great predecessors had already melted words and tones into a most intimate union, more significant and more taking than either by itself; so in Gluck also the poetic form of speech, or verse, was married in its highest power to the language of tones; and this he accomplished in the

in itself utterly unrhythmical French language, since in his Fatherland, at those rude or un-German and stiff princely courts, which alone could afford it, he found neither understanding nor the room to work. It is proverbial in Germany, that mediocrity finds favor, while the great get but a beggarly pittance; so it was with HAYDN, with MOZART, with BEETHOVEN, SCHILLER, and how many more! * * *

The picture of the great man, and of what Music has gained through him, would remain too incomplete, were we to leave unmentioned how much he has done for the delineation of characters and situations; only we must honestly confess, that he saw his Greeks in an old French light;—a different stand-point was hardly possible after Racine and during his whole time. His Achilles is a French chivalric prince; his Iphigenia is a princesse somewhat after the idolized pattern of Marie Antoinette, the patroness of Gluck; they are character-masks inherited from Corneille and Racine, which the French only outgrew when the nation was regenerated by the Revolution. But, that admitted, it is impossible to exchange a song of Iphigenia for one of Clytemnestra, or of a chorus leader; each has its rights respected in its own way. Indeed the characters do not stand, they unfold; the two first arias of Agamemnon, the four of Clytemnestra are, scenically and psychologically, real progressions. Finally, we have to mention that with Gluck the orchestra frequently comes forward in the most striking manner for the completion of the sketch of character.

But here—in this participation of the orchestra in the spiritual purport of the tone-poem, already noticeable in Bach and Handel—we have that further stage of progress which was destined to complete itself in BEETHOVEN. The persons of the drama are partly men, partly personified beings,—as the genius of hatred in Armida, the ghost in Don Juan. Still other wholly different beings hover round the fancy of the composer, incomprehensible, formless voices of Nature, sounds from higher regions. These are the voices of the orchestra. To the mere musician they are sonorous tools, lifeless machinery, one for this use and another for that. But to the tone-poet there is revealed in each of them a peculiar nature, filled with its own life and characteristic tendency. "To the Vandals they are stone"; to us they are alive, mysterious, many-sided, not easily described children of the wide realm of sound—and yet full of individual meaning. They entice us, they let us summon them and banish them, they serve us, each in its own way. If we love them and understand them (as no one has done better than the divine musician HAYDN), they offer us a loving service. We may also without love force them to what is alien and abhorrent, we may abuse them; then they torment in turn, as they have been tormented, or they sink away exhausted and powerless. It is a peculiar world, born out of our own spirit, but governed by its own unalterable laws.

This progress into the realm of the most unfettered fancy was pre-indicated with firm hand. So soon as the tone-play gains significance and intellectually determined tenor, it cannot remain indifferent who takes up the word in it. As surely as the human voices—the young, rejoicing Discant and the stern Bass, the mild Alto and the fiery Tenor—announce a character of their own: just so surely must the mind, directed to what is characteristic, recognize differently organized beings in violins and flutes, in horns and trumpets, and choose among them according to each momentary impulse. But these beings are present to the inner sense. Henceforth wherever the element of sound stirs, they step up to you, and, like the pre-appointed spirits, offer you their service as their right, whisper and breathe to you what they specifically may and can do, attach themselves like shadows to the human voice, to strengthen it or veil it, relieve it when exhausted, carry it on, step into the place of it—and anon like sprites and cobolds in the fairy tales they read you the strange riddle of Nature, entice you and bear you away into another world full of strange but seemingly familiar beings.

Long ago pre-indications of this other side of life were visible. But the lord and master before all was "Father HAYDN". He had from youth up as a musician practised instruments; he had served them; until both natures had become spiritually blended as it were in long marriage, and they now served him and did what he desired, because he never did desire what they could not and might not do. How many merry games have they enjoyed with him! It is a fact full of meaning, that his first larger tone-picture was "the Chaos", the shapeless shaped, the anxious waiting for the Let there be! for Light! It was a day of creation; the world of extra-human voices had received life, life of its own. In Beethoven's symphonies, in the Heroic, the Pastoral, the fifth, the seventh, the ninth symphony, that life expanded into lyric, epic breadth; who would not long ago have felt and recognized it? Who of those ignorant of the language could resist the written testimony: that at least to the poet this shaped world, which he had created and to which he had partly given names, had stood really and bodily before his mind's eye? And is not the series of these creations continued in his Quartets and piano pieces, in that C# minor and F minor Sonata, in "Les Adieux", in the works marked 110 and 111, in the Trio in D major, in the romance-like andante of the great C major Quartet, in so many other works of the same and other composers? Is it not mainly this life-crowded world of instruments, to which C. M. von WEBER and, following his pattern, MEYERBEER and WAGNER owe those local tones, which lend to their dramatic pictures a coloring so specific, so suited to nothing else but just this precise moment?

The Charity Children's Anniversary at St. Paul's Cathedral.

(Translated from HECTOR BRALLON'S "Soirées de l'Orchestre.")

I was in London at the beginning of June 1851, when a piece of newspaper, which fell by accident into my hands, informed me that the anniversary meeting of the charity children would take place in St. Paul's Church. I immediately sought for a ticket, which, after many letters and applications, I at length obtained through the kindness of Mr. Goss, principal organist of this cathedral. At 10 o'clock in the morning, the aisles of the church were filled by crowds, which I traversed with some difficulty. On arriving at the organ loft destined for the choir, men and boys numbering 70, I was given a bass-part, which I was begged to sing with them, and also a surplice, which I had to don in order not to destroy, by my black coat, the harmony of white costume worn by the whole choir. Thus disguised as a churchman, I awaited that which I was to hear with a certain vague emotion, excited by what I saw. Nine nearly vertical amphitheatres, each containing 16 stages, were raised in the centre of the edifice, beneath the cupola, and under the eastern aisle before the organ, to receive the children. The six beneath the cupola formed a kind of hexagon circle, open only at east and west; from the last opening, commenced an inclined plane, ending above the principal door of entrance, and already crowded by an immense audience, who from these benches, even the most distant, could see and hear everything with ease. To the left of the tribune before the organ, occupied by ourselves, a platform held seven or eight trumpet and drum players. On this platform a large mirror was placed, so as to reflect, for the musicians, the movements of the choir-master, beating time in the distance, in an angle beneath the cupola, and directing the choral mass; this mirror also served to guide the organist, who turned his back towards the chorus. The sixth stage of the vast amphitheatre reached nearly to the capitals of the colonnade; and banners planted all around, indicated the places occupied by different schools, and displayed the name of their parish, or the part of London to which they belonged. At the entrance of groups of children, the compartments of the amphitheatres, successively peopled from above, formed a singular spectacle, recalling that offered by the phenomenon of crystallization microscopically viewed. The points of this crystallization of human molecules, constantly directed from the circumference towards the centre, was bi-colored—the dark blue of the little boys' coats on the upper stages, and the white of the little girls' frocks and caps occupying the lower ranks. Besides this, as the boys wore either a polished brass badge or silver medal, their movements caused the light reflected by these metal ornaments to flash and produce the effect of a thousand sparks kindling and dying out every minute upon the sombre background of the picture. The aspect of the platforms crowded by the girls was still more curious; the green and pink ribbons which adorned the heads and necks of these white little virgins, caused this part of the amphitheatres exactly to resemble a mountain covered with snow, through which peep here and there sprigs of grass and flowers. Add to this, the varied hues which lost themselves in the half-light of the inclined plane occupied by spectators—the scarlet-covered pulpit of the Archbishop of Canterbury—the richly ornamented seats of the Lord Mayor and English aristocracy, placed beneath the cupola—and, on the other side, and above all the gilded pipes of the grand organ; imagine to yourselves the magnificent church of St. Paul's, the largest in the world, after St. Peter's, as a framework to the whole,—and even then, you will have but a faint sketch of this incomparable spectacle: and, throughout, such order—a collectedness, a serenity, which doubles its magic.

No theatrical decorations, however admirable we suppose them, could ever approach this reality, which, even at the present moment, I seem to have beheld in a dream. Gradually, and while the children, dressed in their new clothes, took their places with a serious joy, exempt from turbulence, but tinged with some pride, I heard my English neighbors say to each other: "What a scene—what a scene;" and my emotion was profound when the six thousand five hundred little singers being at length seated, the ceremony commenced. After a chord from the organ, arose in gigantic unison the first Psalm chanted by this wonderful chorus—"All people that on Earth do dwell." It is useless to endeavor to give you an idea of such an effect in music. It was, as compared to the power and beauty of the most excellent vocal masses you may have heard, as St. Paul's of London is to a village church—and a hundred times beyond that difference. I should add that this chorale, of weighty notes and grand character, is sustained by superb harmonies, with which the organ surrounds it, without overwhelming it. I was agreeably surprised to learn that the music of this Psalm, for a length of time attributed to Luther, is by Claude Goudimel, chapel master at Lyons in the 16th century. Notwithstanding the oppression and tremor I felt, I mastered myself sufficiently to take a part in chaunting the Psalms, which the chorus of musicians next executed. The Te Deum of Boyce (written in 1760), a composition without character, sung by the same, completely restored my calmness. At the Coronation Anthem, when the children joined the small chorus and organ at times, but only to utter solemn exclamations, such as, God save the King! Long live the King! May the King live for ever! Amen! Hallelujah!—the electrical feeling recommenced. I began to count a great many rests, notwithstanding the cares of my neighbor, who, every moment, shewed me on his copy whereabouts we were, thinking that I had lost my place. But during the Psalm in triple time, by J. Gauthauby, an ancient English composer (1774), sung by all the voices, with trumpets, drums, and the organ,—during this overwhelming explosion of a hymn, truly ardent with inspiration of grandiose harmony, of an expression as noble as touching, Nature claimed her right to be weak, and I was obliged to use my copy of music, as Agamemnon did his toga, to veil my face.

After this sublime piece, and while the Lord Archbishop of Canterbury pronounced his sermon, which distance rendered inaudible to me, one of the masters of the ceremonies came to fetch me, and conducted me, thus "all tears," to different parts of the church, where I might contemplate, under all its aspects, a spectacle which the eye could not, from one point, comprehend in its complete grandeur. He ultimately left me below, near the pulpit, among the fashionable world—that is to say, in the lowest crater of the vocal volcano; and when, for the last Psalm, the eruption recommenced, I was forced to own, that for the auditors thus placed, its power was doubly discernable. In going out, I met the venerable Cramer, who, in his ecstasy, forgetting that he spoke French perfectly, began calling out to me in Italian—"Cosa stupenda! stupenda! la gloria dell' Inghilterra." Then Duprez—ah! the great artiste who, during his brilliant career, affected so many persons—received on that day the payment of his long credits, and these debts of France were paid by English children. I have never seen Duprez in such a state; he stammered, he wept, he wandered—at the same time that the Turkish Ambassador and a handsome young Indian passed near us, as unmoved and melancholy as if they had just come from hearing their dancing dervishes howl in a mosque. Oh! sons of the East, one sense is wanting in you; will you ever acquire it?—Now for some technical details.

This institution of Charity Children was founded in 1764, by King George III. It is supported by voluntary donations or subscriptions, which are furnished by the rich or middle classes of the metropolis. The products of the annual meeting in St. Paul's, tickets for which are sold at half-a-crown and half-a-guinea, are also given to it. Although all the places reserved for the public on this occasion are purchased long beforehand, the space occupied by the children, and the necessary sacrifice of a great part of the church for the admirable dispositions I have mentioned, naturally detract much from the pecuniary result of the ceremony. The expenses also are very great. Thus, the placing of the nine amphitheatres and inclined plane costs alone £450. The receipts usually amount to £800; so there remains but £350, at most, for the 6,500 poor little creatures who give this splendid festival of their City-mother;—but voluntary donations always form a considerable sum. The children are not acquainted with music, and have never seen a note in all their lives. It is necessary to din into their ears, on a violin, and for three whole months, the hymns and anthems they will have to sing at the meeting. They thus learn them by heart, and therefore bring to church neither book nor anything else to guide them during the performance; for this reason, they merely sing unison. Their voices are beautiful, but of small compass; in general, they are required to sing but phrases contained within an interval of an eleventh, from B below to the E fourth space (key of G). All these notes, which are equally common to soprano, mezzo-soprano, and contralto, and are therefore found in all voices, possess a wonderful sonorousness. It is doubtful whether they could have been trained to sing in different parts. Notwithstanding the extreme simplicity and breadth of the melodies entrusted to them, there is not, to the ear of a musician, an irreproachable simultaneousness in the entry of voices after silence. This occurs because the children do not know the duration of bars, and do not think of counting them. Besides this, their only director, raised much above the chorus, can only be easily seen by the higher rows of the three amphitheatres opposite to him, and only indicates the commencement of each piece, as the majority of the singers cannot see him, and the rest seldom deign to look at him. The prodigious effect of this unison may be attributed, in my opinion, to two causes; firstly, to the quality and enormous number of voices—secondly, to the disposition of the singers in greatly raised amphitheatres. The production and reflection of tone stand in good relative proportion—the atmosphere of the church, attacked at once from so many points, at its surface and depth, is entirely set into vibration, and its resonance acquires a majesty and force of action on human organization, which the most scientific efforts of musical art, under usual circumstances, have not been able even faintly to produce.

I will add, but only as a matter of conjecture, that, on an exceptional occasion like the present, many inexplicable phenomena must occur, which are governed by the mysterious laws of electricity.

I now ask myself, if the notable difference which exists between the voices of children brought up by charity in London, and of our poor children in Paris, may not be caused by the nourishment, good and abundant for the former, and insufficient and of bad quality for the latter. This is very probable. These English children are strong and muscular, and bear none of the suffering and weakly aspect presented by the Parisian youthful working population, exhausted by a bad alimentary system—by toil and privation. It is quite natural that the vocal organs of our children should participate in the debility of general health, and that even their intellect should suffer. At any rate, it is not merely voices which are wanting at the present time in Paris, to reveal, in such wondrous wise, the sublimity of monumental music. The first requirement would be a cathedral of gigantic proportions (the church of Notre Dame itself would not be adapted for such performances); then, alas! is wanting faith in Art—a direct and ardent tendency towards it—calmness, patience, subordination of pupils and artistes—a strong will, if not of Government, at least of the rich classes, to attain the end, after having appreciated its beauty—and consequently and lastly, money would be wanting, and the enterprise would fall to ruins from its foundations. We have but to recall—to compare a small to an immense thing—the melancholy end of Choron, who, with slight resources, had already obtained such important results in his Institution for Choral music, and who died of grief when, out of economy, the Government of July suppressed the establishment. And yet, by means of three or four societies, which it would be easy for us to form, what should prevent us, in a certain number of years, from giving, in Paris, a small but perfected sample of the English musical festival? We have no St. Paul's Church, it is true; but we have the Pantheon, which offers, if not dimensions, at least interior capabilities of a similar nature. The number of performers and hearers would be less colossal; but, the edifice also being less vast, the effect might still be extraordinary. With French resources only, this festival might be possible in about 10 years; Paris has only to desire. In the meantime, with the aid of the first rudiments of music, the English desire and obtain. A great people who possess the instinct of great things!!! The soul of Shakespeare is in them!

The day I was present, for the first time, at this ceremony, on leaving St. Paul's, in a state of semi-inebriation, which you may now conceive, I caused myself (without knowing wherefore) to be rowed in a Thames boat, and received, during twenty minutes, a drenching rain. Returning on foot, and wet through, from Chelsea, where I had nothing to do, I had the presumption to intend to sleep; but nights which follow such days are not for sleep. I heard unceasingly rumbling through my head the harmonious clamor, "All people that on earth do dwell;" and I saw the church of St. Paul's spinning round. I fond myself within its precincts; it was, by a strange transformation, changed to a pandemonium—it was the decoration of Martin's celebrated picture;—instead of the Archbishop in his pulpit, I saw Satan on his throne—instead of thousands of believers and children grouped around him, nations of demons and condemned souls darted their flaming glances from out the visible darkness, and the iron amphitheatre on which these millions were seated, vibrated throughout in a terrible manner, producing direful harmonies. At length, wearied with the recurrence of such hallucinations, I resolved, although it was scarcely day, to go out and walk towards the Palace of the Exhibition, where my duties of juryman would call me in some hours. London was still asleep;—none of the Sarahs, Marys, or Kates, who daily wash the thresholds, had yet appeared, mop in hand. An old beginner Irish woman sat smoking her pipe, huddled up all alone, in a corner of Manchester Square. Indifferent-looking cows ruminated as they lay on the thick grass of Hyde Park. A little three-masted plaything of a navigating nation, floated drowsily on the river Serpentine. Already some luminous gleams appeared on the highest glass panes of the palace opened to "all people that on earth do dwell." The guard who watches the barriers of this Louvre, accustomed to see me at all sorts of undue hours, let me pass, and I entered. Here again was an original spectacle of grandeur, presented by the deserted interior of the Exhibition Palace at 7 o'clock in the morning; the vast solitude—the silence—the softened lights falling through the transparent roof—all the dry fountains—the dumb organs—the motionless trees—the harmonious display of rich produce brought thither from all corners of the world by a hundred rival nations. The ingenious inventors, born of peace—the destructive instruments, recalling war,—all these causes of movement and noise seemed then to converse mysteriously with each other, during the absence of man, in that unknown language which may be heard by the mental ear. I prepared myself to listen to their secret dialogue, thinking myself alone in the palace; but we were three—a Chinese, a sparrow, and myself. The long eyes of the Asiatic had opened before the proper hour, it appeared—or perhaps, like mine, they had never closed. By means of a little feather broom, he dusted carefully his splendid porcelain vases—his hideous images—his lackered and silken goods. Then I saw him take a watering-pot, fetch water from the basin of the glass fountain, and tenderly water a poor flower, doubtless from China, which was fading in an ignoble European vase. After which, he sat down, near his stall, looked at the tamtams which hung from it, made a movement as though he would strike them,—but, remembering that he had neither brothers nor friends to arouse, he dropped his hand, which already held the gong-hammer, and sighed. Dulces reminiscitur Argos, I said to myself. Then, putting on my most gracious mien, I approached him, and, supposing him to understand English, addressed him with a "Good morning, sir,"—full of benevolent interest not to be misinterpreted. For all answer, my man gets up, turns his back, goes and opens a cupboard, and takes out some sandwiches, which he begins to eat, without looking towards me, and with an air somewhat contemptuous for this food of Barbarians. Then he sighed again,—he is evidently thinking of those succulent shark-fins, fried in castor-oil, which he feasted on in his own country—of the soup of swallow-nests—and of the famous wood-louse jam, which they make so well in Canton. Ugh! the reveries of this impolite gastronomer gives me the nausea, and I hasten away.

A noise, like that produced by rain, spread throughout the spacious galleries;—it was the fountains and jets d'eau, which had just been set in motion by the keepers. Crystal castles, and artificial rocks, trembled under the rushing of liquid pearls; the policemen—those good gendarmes without arms, whom every one respects with justice—took their stations; the young apprentice of Mr. Ducroquet approached his master's organ, meditating the new polka with which he intended to regale us; the ingenious manufacturers of Lyons came to finish their admirable displays; diamonds, prudently hidden during nighttime, re-appeared dazzling beneath their glass cases; the large Irish bell, in D flat minor, which commands the eastern gallery, obstinately struck 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8 blows, quite proud not to resemble its fellow in Albany Street, which gives out a resounding major third. Silence had kept me awake—these noises made me drowsy; desire for sleep became irresistible—I came and sat down before Erard's grand piano, the musical wonder of the Exhibition—I leant against its rich cover, and was falling asleep, when Thalberg, tapping me on the shoulder, said, "Ah! brother colleague the jury are assembling. Allons! rouse yourself. We have to examine 32 musical snuff-boxes, 24 accordions, and 18 bombardons to-day."

New Views of Opera.

VI. MEYERBEER.

If the poet, in the case of La Muette and Tell, still retained the reins, because neither WEBER nor ROSSINI thought of anything but making themselves very musically-comfortable and melodiously-easy in the splendid operatic coach—quite indifferent as to how or whither the coachman drove them—MEYERBEER, who was not possessed of such voluptuous melodic ease, felt impelled to snatch the reins from the coachman's hands, in order, by the zig-zag direction in which he drove, to create the necessary sensation, that he could not succeed in directing towards himself as long as he sat in the carriage with his own musical person alone.

It is only from detached anecdotes that we have learned what a painfully tormenting influence Meyerbeer exercised upon his poet, SCRIBE, when the latter was plotting out operatic subjects for him. If we were not to pay any attention to these anecdotes, and knew nothing of the secrets of the operatic consultations between Scribe and Meyerbeer, we yet could not avoid clearly seeing, from the poems produced, what burdensome and embarrassing constraint must have pressed on Scribe, generally so quick, and light, and working so skilfully, when he botched up the bombastic, baroque texts for Meyerbeer. While Scribe continued to write, for other operatic composers, lightly-flowing dramatic poems, frequently conceived in an interesting manner, and, at any rate, carried out with a great deal of natural skill, besides, at least, always possessing a decided action at the bottom, and containing easily intelligible situations suited to it—this selfsame uncommonly experienced poet manufactured for Meyerbeer the most unhealthy bombast, the most stunted nonsense—separate acts without combined action, most absurdly confused situations, and most laughably grotesque characters. This could not occur in the natural order of things; a sober understanding, like Scribe's, does not lend itself so easily to the experiments of madness. Scribe must first have been rendered crazy himself before he could have produced a Robert le Diable; he must have been robbed of all healthy feeling for dramatic action before he exhibited himself, in Les Huguenots, as a mere compiler of scenic shades and contrasts; he must have been initiated into the mysteries of historical roguery before he could have been prevailed on to produce a Prophète of swindlers.

We here recognize a determining influence of the composer upon the poet, like that exercised by Weber on the poetess of his Euryanthe, but from what fundamentally different motives! Weber wanted to produce a drama that could, in all instances, be resolved, with every shade of scenic effect, into his noble, deeply-feeling melody:—Meyerbeer on the contrary, wanted to have a monstrous, motley, historico-romantic, diabolico-religious, bigoted-voluptuous, frivolous-sacred, mysterious-brazen, sentimental-swindling, dramatic hodge-podge, in order to obtain matter for the invention of a monstrously clever style of music—but he could never succeed in really carrying out this wish, on account of the invincible stupidity of his peculiar musical nature. He felt that something never accomplished before was to be done with all the stores of the means of musical effect which he had hoarded up, supposing they were collected from every hole and corner, heaped up in irretrievable confusion, mixed with stage powder and colophony, and then blown into the air with a tremendous explosion. What he, therefore, required of his poet was, to a certain extent, the mise-en-scène of Berlioz's orchestra, only—we must particularly remember—with its most humiliating abasement to the shallow basis of Rossini's vocal shakes and general stops—for the sake of the "dramatic" opera. The idea of working up, through the drama, all the musical elements of effect to anything like harmonic unity, must have struck him as being most faulty for his purpose, for Meyerbeer was no ideal enthusiast, but a man who regarded the modern operatic public with a practical eye, and saw that he would not have gained a single person to his cause by harmonic unity, while, by a loose hodge-podge he could not avoid pleasing all; each, namely, in his own peculiar way. Nothing, therefore, struck him as so important as a confused motley, and motley confusion; and the merry Scribe was compelled to sweat blood, and, with the most profound calculation, put together the dramatic jumble, before which the musician stood with cold-blooded care, turning over in his mind on what piece of unnaturalness some shred or other from his musical store-room might be fitted as glaringly and conspicuously as possible, in order to appear completely unusual—and, therefore, "characteristic."

It was thus that he developed in the eyes of our art-critics the capability of music for historical characteristic, and brought things to such a pitch, that it was said, as the most delicate flattery which could be paid him, that the texts of his operas were wretched and pitiable, "but then what did his music make of the wretched stuff!"—Thus was the greatest triumph of music attained; the composer had completely ruined the poet, and the musician was crowned as the actually real poet upon the ruins of operatic poetry!

Hummel and Field.

[We extract the following interesting anecdote of Hummel's visit to Field, at Moscow, pretending to be an amateur requiring instruction, from a work entitled "Gallery of Living Composers."]

In the year 1823, Hummel visited St. Petersburg, whither his reputation had already preceded him, and gave several concerts there, which were very numerous attended. In the course of these entertainments, he composed extemporaneous variations upon themes suggested to him by his audience in which he displayed such talent and readiness of invention, as to waken up a perfect enthusiasm among his hearers. From St. Petersburg he proceeded to Moscow, where Field was at that time residing. These two great artists had never seen each other, and were only known to one another by their works and reputation.

On the morning after his arrival, Hummel, whose appearance was somewhat heavy and somewhat slovenly, paid Field a visit, at the hotel garni which that artist then inhabited. He found him in his dressing-gown, smoking and giving instruction to a pupil.

"I wish to speak with Mr. Field," said Hummel.

"I am he," said Field, "What is your pleasure?"

"I was anxious to make your acquaintance; I am a great lover of music; but I see you are engaged, so don't let me disturb you. I can wait."

Field begged him to sit down, without any ceremony, merely asking him whether the smell of tobacco was offensive to him. "Not at all," said Hummel, "I smoke too!"

The presence of a stranger so disconcerted Field's pupil, that he very speedily took his departure. During this time, Field had been scrutinizing his visitor, whose general bearing struck him as being something remarkable; at length he asked him, "What is your business in Moscow?"

Hummel said he had visited Moscow in a mercantile capacity, and that being a devoted lover of music, and having long heard of Field's extraordinary talents, he could not think of leaving the city without having heard him.

Field was civil enough to gratify the wish of his visitor. And although he perhaps considered him as little better than a Midas, he sat down to the piano, and played one of his Capricci in his own surprising manner. Hummel thanked him repeatedly for his kindness, and assured him that he had never heard the piano played with so much lightness and precision.

Field answered in a sportive tone, "Since you are so very fond of music, you certainly must play something yourself?"

Hummel made some excuses, saying that when at home it was true he played the organ occasionally, but that it was impossible to touch the piano after Field.

"That is all very well," said Field, "but such an amateur as you are, always knows something to play," and he smiled in anticipation of the performance he was doomed to listen to.

Without farther parley, Hummel now sat down to the piano, and taking the very theme which Field had just played, he began to vary it extemporaneously, in a manner worthy of his genius, and as if inspired by the occasion, and, indeed, altogether in a style so powerful and overwhelming, that Field stood transfixed with astonishment. Dropping his pipe from his mouth, and drying his tears, he seized Hummel, exclaiming, "You are Hummel, you are Hummel! There is nobody but Hummel in the whole world who is capable of such inspiration!" and it was with no little difficulty that Hummel released himself from the powerful grasp of his admirer.

Songs.

FROM ALFRED TENNYSON'S "MAUD".

I.

Go not, happy day,
From the shining fields,
Go not, happy day,
Till the maiden yields.
Rosy is the West,
Rosy is the South,
Roses are her cheeks,
And a rose her mouth.
When the happy Yes
Falters from her lips,
Pass and blush the news
O'er the blowing ships.

Over blowing seas,
Over seas at rest,
Pass the happy news,
Blush it thro' the West;
Till the red man dance
By his red cedar tree,
And the red man's babe
Leap, beyond the sea.
Blush from West to East,
Blush from East to West,
Till the West is East,
Blush it thro' the West.
Rosy is the West,
Rosy is the South,
Roses are her cheeks,
And a rose her mouth.

II.

Come into the garden, Maud,
For the black bat, night, has flown,
Come into the garden, Maud,
I am here at the gate alone;
And the woodbine spices are wafted abroad,
And the musk of the roses blown.

For a breeze of morning moves,
And the planet of Love is on high,
Beginning to faint in the light that she loves
On a bed of daffodil sky,
To faint in the light of the sun she loves,
To faint in his light, and to die.

All night have the roses heard
The flute, violin, bassoon;
All night has the casement jessamine stirr'd
To the dancers dancing in tune;
Till a silence fell with the waking bird,
And a hush with the setting moon.

I said to the lily, "There is but one
With whom she has heart to be gay.
When will the dancers leave her alone?
She is weary of dance and play".
Now half to the setting moon are gone,
And half to the rising day;
Low on the sand and load on the stone
The last wheel echoes away.

I said to the rose, "The brief night goes
In babble and revel and wine.
O young lord-lover, what sighs are those,
For one that will never be thine?
But mine, but mine", so I sware to the rose,
"For ever and ever mine".

And the soul of the rose went into my blood,
As the music clashed in the hall;
And long by the garden lake I stood,
For I heard your rivulet fall
From the lake to the meadow and on to the wood,
Our wood, that is dearer than all;

From the meadow your walks have left so sweet
That whenever a March-wind sighs
He sets the jewel-print of your feet
In violets blue as your eyes,
To the woody hollows in which we meet,
And the valleys of Paradise.

The slender acacia would not shake
One long milk-bloom on the tree;
The white lake blossom fell into the lake,
As the pimpernel dozed on the lea;
But the rose was awake all night for your sake,
Knowing your promise to me;
The lilies and roses were all awake,
They sighed for the dawn and thee.

Queen rose of the rose-bud garden of girls,
Come hither, the dances are done,
In gloss of satin and glimmer of pearls,
Queen lily and rose in one;
Shine out, little head, sunning over with curls,
To the flowers, and be their sun.

There has fallen a splendid tear
From the passion-flower at the gate,
She is coming, my dove, my dear;
She is coming, my life, my fate;

The red rose cries, "She is near, she is near";
The white rose weeps, "She is late;"
The larkspur listens, "I hear, I hear";
And the lily whispers, "I wait".

She is coming, my own, my sweet;
Were it ever so airy a tread,
My heart would hear her and beat,
Were it earth in an earthy bed;
My dust would hear her and beat,
Had I lain for a century dead;
Would start and tremble under her feet,
And blossom in purple and red.

Cinderella at Niblo's.

[From the N. Y. Tribune, August 7.]

The sweetest of fairy legends is Cinderella. With what complete hold does it seize upon the youthful imagination! How the young bosom swells with indignation at the injustice and cruelty of the heartless old father and unnatural sisters! How tenderly it sympathizes with the gentle and forgiving, if not uncomplaining, victim of oppression! How it glories in the power of the fairy to reward and punish in accordance with the strictest requirements of poetical justice; and with what infinite delight it contemplates the exercise of that power in the transformation of the rats, and mice, and pumpkin, and lizards, and of the heroine herself; and her final triumph through the possession of that most lady-like attribute, the tiniest little foot in all the world! Cinderella without the fairy and her works is Hamlet without Hamlet. Yet such is the Italian story as it appears in the opera of Cenerentola, where human agencies accomplish everything; and hence that opera, beautiful as it is, and comprising some of ROSSINI's best inspirations, has never been a remarkable favorite with English or American audiences.

The cleverest Englishman that ever translated and adapted foreign operas to our language is ROPHINO LACY. A poet and musician combined, he possesses the rare gift of knowing how to choose the most melodious words and how to put them in their proper places "so that they will sing;" a task of infinite difficulty, considering the abounding consonants and monosyllabic nouns of the English language, but one which Lacy proves can be accomplished. Perceiving that a translation of Rossini's work would not be acceptable to our taste, Lacy has reconstructed the plot according to the accepted English story, and retaining most of the music of Cenerentola has added some brilliant and beautiful pieces from the same composer's Armida, Maometto Secondo and Guillaume Tell, and has thus produced the charming pasticcio, Cinderella, which has proved more successful than any other opera ever presented in England or America.

Lacy's version of Cinderella was first performed in America by Mrs. AUSTIN, a charming singer and beautiful woman, at the Park Theatre in 1830—when New York was a village in comparison with its present limits—and even then had a run of sixty nights. In subsequent seasons Mrs. WOOD, Madame CARADORI, Miss SHERRIFF and many other English vocalists have so often appeared in it that the total number of its representations in this City has probably reached five hundred. About the time Cinderella was produced in New-York, Robert le Diable was first presented at the Grand Opera in Paris. No work was ever more successful there or up to this time oftener played; yet the number of representations of Robert le Diable in Paris has not equalled that of Cinderella in New-York; a fact which speaks volumes of the desire and ability of the people here to support opera presented in the language they understand. * * * * *

Nearly the whole weight of the performance last night fell upon Miss LOUISA PYNE, who gave the brilliant, sparkling music of the part of Cinderella most exquisitely, and acted too with much spirit. In the duet, "Whence this soft and pleasing flame," she displayed her wonderful facility of execution, and was generously applauded. Her sister, Miss PYNE, acted and sang the part of Clorinda very acceptably, and Mrs. HOLMAN was a fair Thisbe. Mr. HARRISON began well, and through the first act sang in tune; but subsequently, and especially in the song—we believe from Gustavus—which he introduced in the third act, his intonation was painfully false. Of the other characters, we can only say that Mr. HORNCASTLE acted the Baron with becoming pomposity, and sang the music as conscientiously as his limited vocal powers would allow. Compared with others who have usually appeared in the part, he was quite up to the average, but a great singer would make of Pompolino a great part. We like neither Mr. BORRANI's mouthing method nor his vulgar style. Mr. HOLLAND as Pedro was exceedingly amusing. The extensive array of names of scene painters, costumers, carpenters, etc., on the play-bills claimed special consideration for Cinderella as a show piece, but the promise was greater than the performance. * * *

But notwithstanding the incomplete manner in which Cinderella was presented last night—probably for the five-hundredth time in New-York—it drew an overflowing house, some hundreds being obliged to stand; and will continue for a time to attract large audiences. What, then, might we not predict for the success of new operas presented with the ablest singers in all the principal parts, and with the splendor and force of the great lyrical theatres of Europe? English Opera has never yet been so represented in this City, and the manager, with intelligence and capital adequate to the business, who would undertake the organization of an English company, equal in every respect to the best Italian, would be sure of a success which no manager of Italian opera can hope for.

London.

ITALIAN OPERA.—M. MEYERBEER's long-expected opera, L'Etoile du Nord, was represented last night, for the first time at this theatre, and for the first time in the Italian language, with a highly effective cast, and a magnificence of scenery, costume, and detail never surpassed in London, much less in any other city. The dialogue, spoken at the Opera Comique, has been turned by the composer into accompanied recitative, which thus gives to the new work the style and proportions of what is technically denominated "grand opera," and fits it for the exigencies of the Italian stage. A more brilliant success could not have been achieved. Nor was ever success more amply merited. The general execution was admirable—marvellous, indeed, when it is considered that this was the first performance of one of the most difficult operas ever written,—an opera which took the Parisians, so much more experienced than ourselves in the production of entertainments on a vast scale, upwards of six months to prepare. Long as was the performance (and it was nearly a quarter to 1 before it terminated), we never remember to have seen a densely crowded audience more thoroughly delighted. To say nothing of the well-deserved compliments paid to Mme. Bosto, Herr FOKME, Sig. LABLACHE, and the other principal singers, M. Meyerbeer was twice brought before the curtain at the end of the second act, amid enthusiastic cheering, and again at the conclusion of the opera, when he came on with all the performers, and the stage was literally covered with wreaths and bouquets. Another call—and one as richly deserved as that awarded to the celebrated composer himself—was for Mr. COSTA, whose exertions in getting up the opera so quickly, and at the same time so efficiently, must have been unparalleled. Notwithstanding the varied and elaborate choruses, the unusual number of supernumeraries, the complicated stage accessories, and the highly wrought concerted music, in which the Etoile du Nord abounds, there was scarcely a weak point in the whole performance. The orchestra of the Royal Italian Opera has accustomed the public to such travaux de force; but on the present occasion the chorus, and, indeed, everything else, was just as perfect as the orchestra. Besides the singers we have mentioned, Mlle. MARAI, Mlle. JENNY BAUER, Mine. RUDERSDORFF, Signori GARDONI, LUCCHESI, TAGLIAFICO, ZELGER, POLONINI, &c., had parts in the opera; and a more earnest desire on all hands to give every possible effect to a great work has seldom been exhibited in a public theatre.—Times, July 20.

THE PRINCESS CZARTORYSKA'S MATINEE.—A morning performance of vocal and instrumental music was given yesterday, at the residence of the Marquis and Marchioness of Breadalbane, under the name and auspices of her Highness the Princess MARCELLINE CZARTORYSKA, in aid of the benevolent fund of the Literary Association of the Friends of Poland. The Princess was assisted in her undertaking by many distinguished members of the aristocracy, who, as 'ladies patronesses,' actively exerted themselves in advancing the object for which the concert was projected. The performances took place in the magnificent ballroom, which, in spite of the unprecedentedly high price of tickets (2*l.*), was filled by a numerous audience. As the entertainment was got up for a charitable purpose, and as several of the performers were amateurs, we are not called upon to offer a detailed criticism. At the same time we are happy to afford our tribute of sincere admiration to the Princess CZARTORYSKA, one of the most accomplished pianists we have heard. To judge from her choice of pieces, moreover,—including, among others, Beethoven's early trio in C minor, for pianoforte, violin, and violoncello, and Mozart's sonata in A for piano and violin (one of the best), she may be regarded not merely as a clever amateur, but as a connoisseur, whose predilections are in favor of really good music. Her most artistic performance was in the sonata of Mozart, where close and correct execution and style pure and legitimate are indispensable, and to which her light and feminine touch, added to a quality of tone always delightful when not forced, and a remarkable fluency of execution, gave especial charm. In both compositions the Princess CZARTORYSKA was applauded with the utmost warmth; but that which produced the most favorable impression on ourselves was the last. In the trio and sonata Herr LOUIS ELLER took the violin, the violoncello part in the former being supported by the admirable talent of Signor PIATTI. Herr Eller also introduced three solos of his own: Minuet Sentimentale, Valse Diabolique (!), and Corrente—his execution of which showed him to be a violinist of the very first order. More genuine "fiddling"—to employ a vulgar but appropriate term—has not been heard for many years from a new aspirant to fame. It was Herr Eller's debut in this country, and we are greatly mistaken if he has not already sown the seeds of his future reputation. The Nocturne and Mazurka of Chopin—which the Princess CZARTORYSKA selected from among the large catalogue of pianoforte pieces composed by that very original virtuoso, of whom we believe she was a favorite pupil—were played in the true spirit, with much of the dreamy quaintness and capricious rubato that characterized Chopin's own manner as a performer. The audience were so enchanted that they called for another; when the Princess, who seemed to delight in her task, returned to the instrument and played an unpublished work, understood to be the last effort of the celebrated Polish musician. Between the parts M. LEVASSOR gave two of his lyric-dramatic burlesques (Bon Homme and Robert le Diable), with the humor and vivacity for which he is renowned. A solo on the violoncello by Sig. Piatti, and a number of vocal morceaux by Mme. RUDERSDORFF, Mme. ANICHINI, Mlle. MARIA DE VILLAR (amateur), Sigs. CIABATTA and BELLETTI, the Hon. W. ASHLEY and Sir JOHN HARINGTON (amateurs), completed the programme, which gave unqualified satisfaction. Mr. LINDSAY SLOPER presided at the pianoforte, as accompanist.—Times, 18*th*.

JULLIEN'S CONCERTS AT THE SURREY ZOOLOGICAL GARDENS.—Last night M. Jullien gave the first of another series of grand concerts previous to his departure for America; this time on the borders of the lake fronting the impregnable fortress of Sebastopol—in Manor place. M. Jullien received a most hearty welcome. The orchestra, which is a very numerous one, includes several artists of distinction; among them M. Guerin (of the French Guides), M. Loup (of the Belgian Guides), Herr Reichart (of the Conservatoire of Brussels), Herr Nabich (of the Royal Chapel of the King of Saxony), Sig. Martini (of Milan), and Herr Koenig. The repertory of music contained several of M. Jullien's well-known compositions, of which the "Zonaves Pas de Course," "La Rose et la Violette," and "The Allied Armies Quadrille," received much applause. The entertainment concluded with the siege of Sebastopol, which, at the date of our departure, was "progressing satisfactorily."—News, July 18.

NEW PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY.—The following are among the most important works which have been performed this season:—

SYMPHONIES.

In A. No. 7, Beethoven Choral, Beethoven. In C. minor, No. 5, Beethoven. In B flat, No. 4, Beethoven. In G minor, Mozart. In C minor, Mendelssohn.

OVERTURES.

Coriolanus, Beethoven. Medea, Cherubini. Midsummer Night's Dream, Mendelssohn. Melusine, Mendelssohn. Ruy Blas, Mendelssohn. Egmont, Beethoven. Euryanthe, Weber. Freyschütz, Weber. Zauberflöte, Mozart.

CONCERTOS.

In E flat, Beethoven. In D minor, Mendelssohn. In G minor, Mendelssohn. Rondo, B minor, Mendelssohn.

A Selection from the Ruins of Athens, Beethoven. Ditto, from Lorely, Mendelssohn. Grand Mass in C (first time in this country), Cherubini.

COMPOSITIONS BY LIVING COMPOSERS.

Symphony, Romeo and Juliet, Berlioz. Childs Horold, Berlioz. Cantata, Tam o'Shanter (first time), Glover. Selection from Comus, Horley. Overture, Templiers, Leslie. Selection from Paradise Lost, Wyde. Overture, Abellino, Praeger. Concerto, Pianoforte (first time in England), Henselt.

Italy.

The theatres are rapidly closing their doors in most of the principal towns of Italy, at least the larger houses, leaving a chance to the minor places of amusement. At Florence, a new opera by Sig. EMILIO CIANCRI, entitled Salvator Rovi, was produced on the 16th of June, with considerable success, at the Pagliano. The composer is a young man, and the musical journals are unanimous in his praise, and attribute to him the rare merit of original and striking conceptions united to a thorough knowledge of orchestral and scenic effects. The opera was executed by Mad. Gianfredi, and Signori Pardini and Bencich, who, as well as the composer, were recalled several times during the evening. At Parma, the new opera by Sig. Rossi, Giovane Ginevra, has also been successful, the principal parts by Mad. Angelini, and Signori Ronconi, Pagnoni, and Contadini. At Naples, La Sonnambula has been played at the Fondo for the first appearance of Mad. Parepa, who turned out almost a failure. Her method is described as being indifferent, and her phrasing too much of the ad libitum school. A new Mass by Sig. Beaupuis was executed on the 18th of June, at the church of St. Lorenzo Maggiore. This work is described as being too theatrical.

BOSTON, AUG. 11, 1855.

MUSICAL CONVENTIONS.—The season for these annual gatherings, at this the cradle and head-quarters of the institution, has come round again. That is, it has come round to the said cradle and starting place in Boston. For in one part or another of the country we read of musical Conventions going on continually. Since the original Convention, twenty years ago or more, was held in Boston under Messrs. MASON and WEBB, it has become a business with various teachers, hailing from Boston or New York, to travel through the country holding everywhere these musical three or four days' meetings; each makes the circuit of his diocese, during a whole Spring or Autumn, rekindling the sacred flame in county after county, reconfirming his own influence among his followers, and forestalling, it may be, the market for his last new Psalm book, each of which, even if there be ten of them, is sure to be "the book of the season". These country gatherings are secondary vortices of psalmodic excitement sent whirling off in all directions from the parent vortex, which, as we have said, is a genuine twenty-year old "Boston notion". The fathers of the movement seem for some years to have left it to go on of itself in the old spot, under the management of younger men, full of enterprise and—rivalry; for we have often two or three Conventions whirling side by side, with centres absolutely distinct, although the outer circumferences sometimes touch and coincide for a space, so that the same individual atoms take part more or less in either movement; the same volunteer singers swell both choirs. Dr. LOWELL MASON, who first galvanized the whole system into such reproductive life, seems to have ceased to preside over it here; yet, veteran as he is, we hear of him ceaselessly traversing the length and breadth of the land, lecturing and holding Conventions to the great joy of "much people". He is too wise, we believe, to assume the title of "Professor", which every greenhorn, who has taught a country singing school a season or two, does not scruple to adopt, till we have in music more "Professors" probably, than all the literatures and sciences in all the Universities can muster. Of the propriety and good taste thereof we will not stop to speak at present.

We have often enough expressed our views both of the good and of the evil of these Conventions; but we see no cause to change our conviction that the balance is on the side of the good. There is a great deal of crudity, of the mere ad captandum, of charlatanism, of flattering of low and idle tastes, mixed up in the simmering cauldron. Yet the interest which it excites in music, modified by so many minds and influences, becomes its own corrective. The tone and character of the thing rises year by year; artistic stimulus also is imparted, artistic aspirations are carried home. The interchange of ideas about modes of teaching, styles and methods, enforced by daily lessons and illustrations from the more experienced; the chances offered to people from the country to hear such music as they cannot hear at home; the chances also to participate in the performance on a grand scale of some of the noblest works, as Handel's choruses:—all cannot be without their influence. And we rejoice that while the hacknied ears of the city opera-and-concert-goers, are at the sea-shore listening to old Ocean for a tonic, the choirs and singing classes of the country make a pilgrimage to town to learn a higher sense of Music.

Next week there will commence two Conventions. Of the particulars of one we are not informed. The other under the direction of A. N. JOHNSON, and other able teachers, will begin on Wednesday, at the Tremont Temple, and puts forth a formidable programme of operations, the principal features of which are announced below. The mornings (for nine days) will be spent in practical lectures on Thorough Bass and Harmony; on the mode of teaching the "Elementary Principles" of Music; on the culture of the Voice; and on the practice of Church Music, the members of the Convention forming a choir to illustrate. The afternoons will be devoted to the practice of Glee, Opera and Oratorio choruses, and other music of a high character. An hour also is set apart to the lovers of old church music, meaning old New England psalmody, preparatory to one of those rococo notions, an "Old Folk's Concert". The evenings will be occupied with concerts, in which various choirs, societies, organists, professional singers, and (once at least) an orchestra will be employed. We notice with pleasure symptoms of the realization of two ideas which we have long hoped would grow out of these Conventions.

The first is the creating of opportunities to hear good Organ-playing, of which the mass of us are doomed to hear so very little. It will be seen that one half of the two first concerts is set apart to the organ. Mr. MORGAN is said to be one of the thoroughly trained English organists, who has a wonderful command of the pedals. The skill and taste of Mr. WILLCOX are well known. The organ, that chef-d'œuvre of the Messrs. HOOK, will give ample sphere for all their powers. In Mozart's 12th Mass, too, the organ accompaniment will be not the least interesting element.

The other hopeful symptom we find in the announcement that Saturday evening is to be given to the bringing out of portions of Mr. SOUTHARD's new opera, and his two overtures. We have had occasion heretofore to speak of the right and the wrong times and places for bringing out new works. We think these Conventions offer decidedly one of the right occasions. And we hope they will get into the way of offering annually, like the Conservatoires abroad, opportunities for the first trial of the efforts of our young composers.

We could wish further, since an orchestra will be assembled, that some good classical Symphonies might also be produced. Doubtless the Convention will attract some persons who have never heard one of Beethoven's symphonies.

Our Music Table.

A te o Cara, from I Puritani, transcribed for the Piano by G. A. OSBORNE, pp. 7. (G. P. Reed & Co.)

We have here another transcription of the beautiful Quartet, Bellini's best concerted piece. It is a reprint from a London copy, and the arrangement is very much less difficult than that by Thalberg, which we lately noticed as forming a number of his Art du Chant. Mr. Osborne's is in the main clear and satisfactory. The only objection we find to it is, that it does not preserve the original distinction of the voices, but commences the melody in the treble, instead of in the tenor. The other plan, however, would have involved some of the Thalbergian difficulties.

Il Trovatore, by VERDI, arranged for piano by ADOLPH BAUMBACH. No. 1. Coro di Zingari, &c. No. 2. Tacea la notte, &c. (G. P. Reed & Co.)

Our readers know we are not partial to the Trovatore. But some things, detached from the whole, which as a lyric whole is morbid, manneristic, forced, unpleasing, and taking their places among miscellaneous, clever bagatelles, (as Beethoven called things of his own which had enough meat in them for modern "Songs without Words"), show ingenuity and are not without a certain charm. A pretty conceit enough in its way is that Coro di Zingari, or "Anvil Chorus," (which so far is only issued separately, without the other pieces promised to fill out No. 1.) To be sure it is dragged in neck and shoulders into the opera, in defiance of historic probability and without much regard to dramatic development or unity, upon the Meyerbeer principle of introducing independent situations for effect, so well described by Wagner in another column. But in itself it is a pretty invention, composed of several happy melodic ideas, which succeed each other naturally. The way in which the livelier opening movement swings off into the graver measured unisons accompanied by clink of anvils (real anvils!), is quite felicitous. Altogether it is a taking thing with the many. Have we not heard it at a brass band evening concert on the Common, anvils and all, and did not "young America" show vast delight? This piece, however, being an episode that stands by itself, needs the scenic effect, the mountains and the gipsy groups. In other instances, we like better the selections "done into" instrumental pieces, than the same things in the lurid coloring of the entire opera.

No. 2 we have complete. It contains, nicely arranged and strung into a whole by simple modulations and transitions by Mr. Baumbach, the opening song of Leonora: Tacea la notte; the dream song of the Gipsy, remembering her youth: Fra il Sonno; the wild and terror-fraught: Di quella pira; the famous Miserere and prison scene; and an Allegro finale.

Diary Abroad.—No. 18.

"The day is far spent, the evening is nigh."

BERLIN, June 18.—I love music not alone for its own sake, but because it is such a bond of union with others. To it I am indebted for many of my warmest friendships both at home and abroad. Nay, more. I have an affectionate remembrance even of the faces of persons with whom I never spoke, just because I have seen in them, in that pandemonium, a New York Philharmonic rehearsal, the evidence of feeling and appreciation. A casual remark, a flitting expression in the features, relating to, or caused by music, is sometimes sufficient—at least it seems so—to prove that that stranger has soul and heart, and you feel drawn to him by an instinctive attraction, the strength of which surprises you.

Just at the close of August, two years since, I took refuge from the chilliness of the fresh, cool evening air of Lake Superior, in the parlor of Atwood's Inn, at Eagle Harbor. Some half a dozen persons, tired with their day's walk through those grand forests, were sitting around the huge box stove; a couple of gentlemen, three or four young women, perhaps some others. I cannot recall how, but a conversation sprang up between me and a young lady from Illinois, which turned upon music. I cannot say that the musical knowledge and taste of my partner in the talk was very impressive, but I was struck by the interest exhibited in the subject by a tall, elegant girl, with a noble head, very intellectual face and a pair of glorious black eyes full of soul, who sat in the shade on the other side of the stove. The conversation grew general and partook of the hearty freedom of the West and of the woods. She was there with her father and sister. They had come up from the dust and heat and enervating air of Detroit to refresh themselves on the cool waters, in the everlasting forests and the life-giving atmosphere of that magnificent region. They had formerly lived in Boston; she had been a pupil of Rosa Garcia.—We had many mutual friends, and on parting with them for the night, the acquaintance with the Rev. Mr. C. and daughters seemed already like one of long standing.

The next day was Sunday and there was preaching in the long dining room of the other hotel. Be the cause what it may, I have always found in my journeys at the West that a sermon on the Sabbath is sure to draw a respectful and attentive audience. People of all opinions and confessions come together, and I am never more impressed with the feeling of the sincerity of worshippers than on such occasions.

Here were representatives from most of our Northern states; and voices which had formerly joined in the hymn in the New England village choir, or had sung the verses of Wesley in the dissenting chapels of the Cornish miners, mingled in the sweet strains of "Arlington" or old "York". I think I shall never lose my love for our good old Psalm tunes. They are too intimately interwoven with all the recollections of my childhood and youth. A mere sentiment doubtless, but the gorgeous ritual of the Romish cathedral always fills me, for the moment, with a deep longing—eine solche Sehnsucht—for the simplicity and sincerity, the peace and quietness of a "meeting" where the chant of the priests is exchanged for the earnest extemporaneous prayer; the overpowering music of Haydn's or Mozart's masses for the simple tune which my mother taught me, or which years ago I heard or sang in the village church.

But I am wandering.

We and many others had met at Eagle Harbor to take the Baltimore on her return trip below. The place to ripen an acquaintance into intimacy and friendship is a steamboat on the Great Lakes. The purity of the air acts upon one like a tonic draught, the mind is clear as the sparkling waters beneath us, and the grandeur of nature in those sublime solitudes offers ever new topics of mutual interest. Nearly five days were spent in reaching Detroit. How well I remember the evening at the Mission at the Sault Ste. Marie; the ramble at Mackinaw, and the walk at the place where we were forced to stop by the thick fog on the St. Clair Flats! But who could recall the volumes that were spoken upon music?

I spent the Sabbath in Detroit. In the absence of the organist Miss C. officiated, and her simple, unaffected style was as pleasant to hear as it was creditable to her former teacher. And so I returned to the East with new cause of gratitude to the divine Art for having introduced me into that pleasant and true-hearted family circle.

A year ago to-day I was once more in Detroit.—I had come thus far the day before, returning from the great Expedition to the Falls of St. Anthony, and would spend the Sabbath again there. Of course the acquaintance of the year before was renewed. The conversation turned at one time upon the expressiveness of Music and the communications of H. T.

in Dwight's Journal were discussed. An old copy of the Handel and Haydn Collection was hunted up and the fine arrangements from Beethoven, Mozart, Haydn and others, the credit of which I believe Mr. Mason has recently given to William Gardner, were played and sung. Before the afternoon service we had gone over many of these again. One piece, whether an original psalm tune or an arrangement I do not know, made a remarkable impression upon Miss C. It is called "Hamilton," and the text is this:

"The day is far spent, the evening is nigh
When we must lay down this body—and die.
Great God! we surrender our dust to thy care,
But oh, for the summons our spirits prepare!"

I have always thought the adaptation exquisite. Sad and solemn and pleading in its expression, to my mind, the music is penetrated with the very spirit which gave utterance to the poetry. She played it over and over again; and as the organ was again in her charge she made this plaintive expression of resignation and entreaty the subject of her opening voluntary in the afternoon. How sweetly it flowed from the soft stops of the instrument. Was there a presentiment, or was it only a coincidence? Though I took tea with the family, I do not recollect that we had music. My last remembrance of her at an instrument, save in accompanying the hymns, is as she lingered upon her voluntary, as if unwilling to close, her fine intellectual features lighted up and varying in their expression with each change in her treatment of the theme.

I returned to New York. A month later I sailed for Europe; and before I sailed, her summons had come!

Again, was it presentiment or only coincidence that made her so dwell upon that theme? Was there any shadow fore-cast of the evening that was so nigh?

"Blessed are the pure in heart."

JULY 17.—Half a century ago yesterday, two brothers, still boys, joined the Berlin Sing Academie, as altos. Their names were MEYER and HANS BEER. Meyer studied music with ZELTER, and Sept. 7, 1807, an eight-voiced psalm, (Ps. 23) "The Lord is my Shepherd," by him, was sung by the Academy. This afternoon I was invited to attend the regular weekly meeting of the Academy. About eighty members were in the seats, and perhaps a hundred persons were there as auditors. After a Choral, partly plain, partly figured, by Zelter, which occupied some ten minutes, Mr. GRELL, the Conductor, rose and stated the above facts, and spoke of the fame one of those boys has gained under the name of MEYERBEER. Although just now the sea divides him from us, he added in effect, we will commemorate his first appearance in our Society as a member, by singing the psalm above mentioned, and the two pieces which were sung upon that day. They are a Gloria, by JOSEPH HAYDN, arranged for eight voices by Zelter, and the Utrecht Te Deum, by HANDEL.

The psalm, besides the historic, had a good deal of artistic merit. It is constructed after the old models, just as Zelter would teach, but some of the chorus and concerted music was very pleasing. The fugues smelt most of the lamp. But was it not an interesting thing to hear, and upon an interesting occasion? Differ as we may as to the real value of that boy-alto's later works, he has gained a conspicuous place in the history of music, and one of his is among the three operas, which have been performed more times in twenty-five years than any other—and now after so long—an age generally in musical matters, "Robert the Devil" (though I never liked it,) is as popular as ever.

Haydn's Gloria sung alla capella with double choir, sounded just so fresh and clear as does all his music. How much old Zelter's arrangement improved it, I am unable to decide.

Glorious old Handel! He is the greatest of them all, after all! I have never heard either of his Te Deum before, and the style, so true to the style of the church, and so very different from his Dramatic Oratorio music, took me by surprise. He is certainly the most majestic of composers. MOZART may have been the greater musician, Handel was altogether the greater man. No wonder that both Mozart and BEETHOVEN studied Handel with such delight, and bore such decided testimony to his power. When will the time come that these things may be heard at home?

MORE SEA-SHORE MUSIC.—We have already alluded to Miss HENSLEY's Concert at Nahant and Mr. MILLARD's Matinée at Newport. Mr. SATTEN followed in a piano concert at Nahant. Next Monday evening the sisters HENSLEY are to sing at Newport; and on Saturday evening the 26th inst., our charming singer, Mrs. J. H. LONG, will give a Concert at Nahant, assisted by Messrs. ARTHURSON and SOUTHAIRD.

DONNA VALERY GOMEZ.—We have barely room to ask attention to the concert of this Spanish prima donna, late of Maretzek's troupe, to be given at the Messrs. Chickering's Saloon, on Monday evening. We have not heard her, but have seen her described as a sure, conscientious, tasteful singer of the PRÉSNIANI school, and even compared to Mme. BOSIO.

NEW AESTHETIC JOURNAL.

THE CRAYON,

A Weekly Paper devoted to ART, offers itself to the attention of all who are interested in the elevating and refining influences of Beauty. Among the contributors to THE CRAYON already are BAYANT, LOWELL STREET, REMBRANDT PAUL, A. B. DURAND, President of the National Academy of Design, DANIEL HUNTINGTON, HENRY K. BROWN, and amongst those engaged are LONGFELLOW, BAYARD TAYLOR, GEO. W. CURTIS, REV. H. W. BEECHER, REV. SAMUEL OSGOOD, REV. H. W. BELLows, Hon. CHARLES SUMNER, and others of our most eminent writers. A series of papers by RUSKIN, and essays left by the eminent sculptor, HORATIO GREENOUGH, add to the interest of The Crayon.

From the Cincinnati Gazette.

We have already strongly recommended THE CRAYON, and every succeeding number proves it to be more and more worthy of all we have said in its praise. No Journal, devoted to Art, has ever been so ably conducted, in this country; and if it meets with the support it so richly deserves, we have no doubt that it will exert a most wholesome influence upon the taste of the country.

Translated for this Journal.

The Life of Music.

In the preceding I have simply sought with a few hurried lines and indicative points to sketch the elementary or sensual, the abstract or intellectual, and the soulful or inspired phase of the tone-life, without requiring or aiming at completeness. If the moments, names and works referred to are significant, my object is achieved and the omitting to mention other names and work is of no consequence. Still less may historical completeness and consecutiveness be demanded of these sketches; they aim simply to portray that spiritual life, which we call Music, and to remind us of its richness and its many-sidedness.

On the one side we have found this life so deeply absorbed in the elementary sensual, that one might doubt whether the spirit of Art reigned here at all as yet. On the other side this tone-life has become blended with speech, with the Drama, has become refined and elevated into a body for free and pure ideas and trains of thought,—has ventured, in the deeply thoughtful developments which it has entrusted to the piano, to surrender a portion of its own fulness of life, of its own warmth and inspiration, to remain a mere shadow of itself and thus essay spiritual tasks for which the full use of its powers seemed scarce sufficient. For the piano is but the shadow of that warm life of the instrumental world, which murmurs and exults around us; it has only the shadow of a truly living, flowing melody, only the dim outline of that vocal dialogue full of inexhaustible variety and wrestling energy; it is monotonous in its tone-color and deathly pale in contrast with the sonorous richness of the full instrumental choir.

On this side also has the domain of Art been called in question. And not without reason. Can then music, with the outlay of all its means and appliances, ever reproduce an outward object, a situation in which we are, and which operates upon our feeling and our resolution? can it render merely our conceptions and desires completely cognizable? When it softly soothes, I may feel perhaps that it is warmed by tenderness; is this tenderness love? and of what nature? When it grows vehement, is the excitement merely inward, subjective, or has it reference to something without? When BEETHOVEN in the Pastoral Symphony conceives the "Scene by the Brook", or "the Adieux" in that Sonata, what is it precisely that is going on? who is taking leave, and how? If no one can help imagining in the last A flat major Sonata (Op. 110), and in the A major Symphony something more than a mere interweaving of tones and moods, something like definite conceptions, how can I unriddle these with certainty? Am I, in listening to that chivalric (heroic?) symphony, with the Moorish romance, which has so much to complain of to us and so much to tell out of a breast welling over with sighs,—am I, with one of the more recent interpreters, to think of the heavy-beeled merriment of boors? Is not the striking contradiction of these interpreters in itself proof enough, that Music oversteps its bounds, so soon as it goes beyond the vague and general mood into the regions of more definite conceptions?

* * * * The question is mainly one of more or less. Some degree of capacity for definite representations, is certainly recognized by every one,—at least by every musician; every one must have found this piece of music cheerful and that one sad; the smallest composer would feel insulted, if one were to find his dirge merry, or have his drinking song or love song sung at a funeral. But the slightest admission opens the path on which we find ourselves; the only question is how far it can lead us, or how far we are capable and willing to go in it. That on the other hand Music is not capable of representing forms and thoughts as sharply and distinctly as Poetry and Sculpture, has already been admitted. It has to do with sympathies, with more obscure and evanescent mutual relations; out of a thousand such connections and emotions it weaves a psychological enigma; it gives us the internal becoming (Werden), so that we may divine what will proceed from it, what will become thereof. So Sculpture on the other hand gives us the outward thing that has become, not for its own sake, but that through it we may discern the inner sense and impulse.

To ask for the most perfect distinctness in a work of Art, and value it in the degree that it has that, is to set up a claim of extremely doubtful justice. Why, if it comes to that, do they not paint statues in flesh colors and give them moveable eyes? Why has not Beethoven in his Pastoral Symphony employed the well-known theatrical machines, to depict thunder and lightning, the murmuring and whispering of streams and thickets in a right palpable and drastic manner? Why does not BACH in the Cantata: "Dearest God, when shall I die", cause a real death bell to be sounded, instead of in that extremely mystical and "indeed unnatural" manner "boring its marrow-consuming tinkle into our nerves upon the flute"? The reason is, because allusion, allegory, enigmatical twilight stand nearer to the poet, whether in tones, words or forms; since he has not the thing he would represent; it but grows, becomes to him; he enters into its life and awaits with it the crisis of its being. The reason is, that allusion and allegory serve him and avail him more; for they draw the listener or spectator into kindred life with them in their own circle, excite him to cooperation and to living sympathy, make him a party with them, whereas full reality and certainty would soon satiate and make him weary. Thou must dream with the poet, must doubt and err, must hope and hesitate with him: that is the way to live over and enjoy his work with him.

The decisive point for us lies not in the how far, but in the fact: that Music is continually struggling upward from the sensual into the domain of the spirit, where the main matter is not the pleasure of the senses but the spiritual purpose rising out of that. This corresponds with the inward necessity of man's nature, which first manifests itself as submerged in the corporeal, and finally as a spiritual entirely predominating over the corporeal. Every Art takes the same way and arrives at a point, where you find its limits, and the overstepping of its limits; even the clearest and most definite of the Arts, the Art of Poetry must reach this questionable point:—DANTE's "Divine Comedy", GOETHE's "Faust" in the second part are obvious examples. Here too it is, where Art fitly and justly requires certain allowances and presuppositions. The most Art-appreciative Greek would not have comprehended RAPHAEL's "Transfiguration" or MICHEL ANGELO's "Last Judgment", since he would have been ignorant of the Christian tradition. * * * *

In the preceding disquisition I have not sought to exhibit the fulness and breadth of the whole life of Art,—that is the problem of the history and literature of Art,—but simply to recall the essential vital moments, in which Music has gained new development, new paths, in order thereby to give a complete and tangible view of the essential nature of Music. * * * * *

A different point of view has been maintained by one of the most distinguished artists of recent times, MENDELSSOHN,—if I may trust the report given by the author of the Fliegende Blätter. The conversation turned upon the assertion often made by our young Art contemporaries, that here or there "a new path has been entered." Mendelssohn exclaimed:

What is the real meaning of this phrase? To open a way that no one has ever trod before you? In the first place, it is indispensable that this new way should conduct to much more beautiful and charming regions of Art than those with which we are already acquainted. Everyone is capable of simply cutting out a new road, provided he can handle a shovel and use his legs. But, in every higher acceptance of the phrase, I deny point blank that there are any new paths, because there are no more new provinces of Art. They were all discovered long since. New paths! What a mischievous demon is this notion for every artist who delivers himself up to it! No artist has ever really entered upon a new path. At the very best, he only did his work an almost imperceptible shade better than his predecessor. Who is to open these new paths? Only the greatest geniuses, I suppose! But tell me, now—did Beethoven open a new road totally different from that followed by Mozart? Do Beethoven's symphonies pursue completely new paths? I say that they do not. I can't perceive between Beethoven's first symphony and Mozart's last any superiority in the way of unusual artistic worth or extraordinary effect. The former pleases me, and the latter pleases me. If I hear Beethoven's in D major to-day, I feel happy; and if, to-morrow I hear that of Mozart in C major, with the fugue at the end, I feel happy too. I do not think of any new path, when I hear Beethoven, nor does he remind me of one. What an opera is Fidelio! I do not pretend that every thought in it pleases me completely, but I should like to know what other opera can produce a deeper effect or more charming artistic enjoyment. Can you find a single piece in it with which Beethoven struck out a new path? I cannot. I see in the score, and hear everywhere in the performance, Cherubini's dramatic style of melody. It is true Beethoven did not copy it servilely, but it was always floating before him as his most favorite model.

"And Beethoven's last period," I inquired, "his last quartets—his ninth symphony—his mass? Here there can be no comparison either between him and Mozart, or any other artist, before or after?"

"That may be true in a certain sense," continued Mendelssohn, warmly. "His forms are broader, his style is more polyphonic and artificial, the thoughts, as a rule, more gloomy and melancholy, even when intended to be merry, the instrumentation more full—he has gone a little further on the old road, but he has not opened a new one. Now let us be frank—whither has he conducted us?—to really more beautiful regions? Do we, as artists, experience delight of an absolutely higher order, on hearing the ninth symphony, than on hearing most of his others? As far as I am concerned, I frankly say: I do not! If I hear it, I pass a happy hour, but the symphony in C minor affords me quite as great delight—my pleasure at hearing the former being, perhaps, really not quite so undisturbed and pure as it is when listening to the latter."

If it were not the convenient wont of many to give in their adhesion to the word of a distinguished man without more ado, this dictum and its repetition might be left at rest. And if in Art it all depended on an everlastingly vague "being pleased", or "enjoying oneself", or "feeling happy", on a progress to "more beautiful and charming regions" (what is beautiful, and what more beautiful?): why then we should have to agree with Mendelssohn. In the indefinite regions of enjoyment, taste, pleasure, of happy feelings, of the charming and the—without deeper definition so-called beautiful, there is no progress, but only enjoyment, reveling and rioting from one charm to another, where, as chance, inclination, habit or excitement prompts, now this and now another wins the preference; nay where the deeper thought, through its estranging influence, or it may be through the awkwardness and constraint of the first steps on an unwonted path, to those who seek enjoyment in habitual and level paths, offers possibly a less undisturbed and easy course, than the more travelled one. No one can deny the violences done to the voice parts in the Ninth Symphony and in the last Mass, to name no other instances. But high over all the details soars the new and deep idea, which has excited and compelled the artist to such conflict with the otherwise more mildly managed elements of his Art. Not in the details,—be they failures or successes, confused or clear—but in the whole and its idea lies the decision! Not enjoyment or feeling happy, but knowledge is the warrant for that progress, which is an everlasting condition in all the higher interests of the soul.

New Views of Opera.

VII. MEYERBEER.

The secret of MEYERBEER'S operatic music is—effect.* * * To convey more exactly the meaning we affix to the word, we must translate "effect" by "result without a motive."

Meyerbeer's music does, in fact, produce on those who are able to enjoy it a result without a motive. This result was only possible for the most external kind of music, that is to say, for a power of expression which (in opera) has, from the earliest period, been endeavoring to render itself more and more independent of anything worthy of expression, and proved that it had fully attained this independence by debasing the subject of the expression, which subject alone imparted to the latter being, proportion and justification, to such a depth of moral as well as artistic nothingness, that the subject itself could only obtain being, proportion and justification from an act of musical caprice, which act had thus itself become denuded of all real expression. The act itself could again only be realized in connection with other moments producing absolute results. In the most extreme specimens of instrumental music an appeal was made to the justifying power of the imagination, which found matter for outward musical support in a programme, or even only a title: in opera, however, this matter for support ought to be realized, that is to say, the imagination should be spared every laborious effort. What, in the former case, was introduced programmatically from the phenomena of natural or human life, should, in the latter, be actually represented with most material reality, so as to produce a phantastic result without the least co-operation of the phantasy itself. The composer now borrowed this matter for material support from scenic mechanism itself, inasmuch as he took the results, which the latter was able to produce, purely for themselves, that is to say, he separated them from the subject, which, beyond the limits of mechanism, and standing upon the ground of life-representing poetry, would have been able to fix and justify them. We will make ourselves perfectly intelligible by an instance which characterizes Meyerbeer's art generally in the most exhaustive manner.

Let us assume a poet to be inspired by a hero, a combatant for light and freedom, in whose breast there burns a powerful feeling of love for his dishonored brethren, insulted in their most sacred rights. The poet wants to represent this hero at the height of his career, and in the midst of active glory. For this purpose, he selects the following decisive moment of history. Accompanied by the multitude who, leaving house and home, wife and child, have followed his inspiring summons, in order to conquer or to die in the struggle with powerful oppressors, the hero has arrived before a fortified city, which the crowd, inexperienced in war, must carry by storm, if the work of delivery is to progress victoriously. From previous misfortunes, a feeling of dejection has arisen; bad passions, dissension and confusion rage in the host; all is lost if all is not won this very day. Such a position is one in which heroes attain their fullest height. The poet makes the hero, who has just consulted, in nightly solitude, the god within him, the spirit of the purest love of man, and sanctified himself by his breath, appear, in the grey morning-light, among the crowd, who are already divided among themselves as to whether they shall be cowardly brutes or god-like heroes. The people assemble at his mighty voice, which penetrates into their very heart's core; and now, become aware of the god within them, they feel elevated and ennobled, while their enthusiasm raises the hero still higher—from enthusiasm he pushes on to action. He seizes the flag and waves it high against the terrible walls of the city, the bulwark of the foe, who, as long as they remain safe behind their ramparts, render a better future impossible for mankind. "Up, then! death or victory! The city must be ours!" The poet has now exhausted himself; he wants, at present, to see expressed upon the stage the one moment when the highly excited state of mind of every person concerned shall appear before us with the most convincing reality; the stage must become the theatre of the world; nature must display herself as allied with our own elevated sentiments; she must no longer surround us with coldness and indifference. Behold! sacred necessity irresistibly impels the poet: he dissipates the morning mist, and, at his command, the rising sun darts its illuminating rays over the city, which is now consecrated to the victory of the enthusiasts.

Here we have the triumph of almighty Art, and such miracles can dramatic Art alone perform.

But such a miracle—that can only spring from the enthusiasm of the dramatic poet, and only be rendered possible by a lovely occurrence borrowed from life itself—is not desired by the operatic composer: he wants the result and not the motive, simply because it does not lie in his power. In a principal scene of Meyerbeer's Prophète, which externally resembles the one just described; we obtain, for the ear, the purely sensual result of a hymn-like melody, stolen from the people's song, and carried to a degree of intoxicating fullness; and, for the eye, that of a sun in which all we recognize is absolutely nought but a masterpiece of mechanism. The object that should merely be warmed by the melody and illuminated by the sun—the highly inspired hero,* who ought to pour out his soul, with the most fervid rapture, into the music, and who, in obedience to the bidding of the pressing necessity of his situa-

* Some persons may answer me: "We did not want your glorious popular hero, who, by the way, is merely a later product of your own private revolutionary imagination. On the contrary, we wished to represent an unfortunate young man, who, embittered by sad experience and seduced by treacherous demagogues, allows himself to be spurred on to commit crimes, which he subsequently expiates by sincere repentance." I now inquire the meaning of the effect of sunlight, and shall perhaps receive the following reply: "That is in strict accordance with nature; why should not the sun rise early in the morning?" This would certainly be a very practical excuse for an involuntary sunrise, but still I should feel compelled to maintain: "This sun would not have struck you so unexpectedly, if a situation, like that which I have sketched out above, had not really floated before your mind; the situation itself did not please you, but you certainly intended to produce a result from it."

* Herr Wagner here uses the word "Effect," as opposed to "Wirkung." Both, however, are generally employed for the English effect, so that the difference Herr Wagner makes in German is somewhat difficult of translation. We think, however, we have overcome it by rendering "Effect," effect, and "Wirkung," result.

tion, called forth the appearance of the sun—the justifying, conditional kernel of all the luscious dramatic fruit—is not present at all; in his place we have a tenor singer, characteristically dressed, whom Meyerbeer has charged, through his poetical private secretary, Scribe, to sing as well as he can, and, at the same time, to adopt something of a communistic bearing, so that people should, also, have something piquant to reflect on. The hero, of whom we previously spoke, is a poor devil, who has undertaken from weakness the part of an impostor, and, finally, in the most pitiable manner, repents—not any error, or fanatical infatuation, for which a sun might have arisen in case of necessity, but—his weakness and lying conduct.

We will not here investigate what considerations could have co-operated to bring forth such an unworthy object under the title of a "Prophet;" let a contemplation of the result, which is really instructive, suffice us. In the first place, we see, in this example, the complete moral and artistic degradation of the poet; whoever is best intentioned towards the composer must no longer see the slightest good quality in the poet; in other words—the poetic intention must not attract us, in the least, any more; on the contrary, it must disgust us. The performer must not interest us as anything more than a singer in costume, and this he can only do, in the scene mentioned, by singing the above melody, which, accordingly, entirely of itself—as melody—produces a result. In the same manner and for the same reason, the sun must work for itself alone, namely, as an imitation of the true sun realized upon the stage: the reason of the result it effects is referable, consequently, not to the drama, but to pure mechanism, which, at the moment the sun appears, alone furnishes matter for thought; how alarmed the composer would be, if people were to look upon its appearance as in any way intended to represent the transfiguration of the hero as the champion of mankind! On the contrary, both for him and his public, the main thing must be to direct all attention from such ideas entirely to the masterpiece of mechanism. Thus, in this single scene, so applauded by the public, all Art is resolved into its component parts; the externalities of Art are made its essence, and as this essence we acknowledge—effect, absolute effect, that is to say, the charm of artificially producing amorous tickling, without the activity of real amorous enjoyment.

It is not my intention to write a criticism of Meyerbeer's operas, but simply to represent in them the constitution of modern opera in connection with this entire branch of Art generally. Although obliged, by the nature of the subject, frequently to give my statement an historical character, I could not allow myself to be so far led away as to deliver myself up to a system of historical details properly so speaking. Had I especially to characterize Meyerbeer's capability and vocation for dramatic composition, I should, out of regard for truth, which I exert myself completely to discover, bring forward most prominently a remarkable circumstance in his works. There is such frightful hollowiness, shallowness, and nullity, displayed in Meyerbeer's music, that we feel inclined to set down his specifically musical competency at zero—especially in comparison with that of far the greater majority of contemporary composers. The fact that, in spite of this, he has achieved such great success with the operatic public of Europe, must not fill us with astonishment, for this marvel is very easily explained by a glance at the said public, but purely artistic observation shall enchain and teach us. We observe that, with the most palpable incapability of giving the least sign of artistic life, from his own musical powers, the celebrated composer rises, nevertheless, in some passages of his operatic music, to the pinnacle of the most undeniable and greatest artistic power. Such passages are the creations of real inspiration, and, on looking more nearly, we see, also, by what this inspiration was produced—namely, by really poetic situation. Wherever the poet forgets his constrained consideration for the musician; wherever, in his course of dramatic compilation, he involuntarily comes upon a moment, when he can breathe in and again send forth the free, refreshing, human air of life—he suddenly wafts it as a source of inspiration to the musician as well, and the latter, who, after exhausting all the musical riches of his predecessors, cannot give a single gasp more of real invention, is now enabled, all at once, to discover the richest, most noble, and most soul-moving musical expression. I would especially call the reader's attention to several detached passages in the well-known and painful love-scene in the fourth act of the Huguenots, and above all, to the invention of the wonderful and moving melody in G flat major, with which, springing as it does, like a fragrant blossom from a situation that seizes on every fibre of the human heart with delicious pain, only very few, and only the most perfect portions of musical works can be compared. I mention this with the most sincere joy and real enthusiasm, because in this very fact the true constitution of Art is displayed so clearly and irrefutably, that we cannot help perceiving, with rapture, that the capability of true artistic creation must fall to the lot even of the most corrupt maker of music immediately he enters the sphere of a necessity stronger than his own selfish caprice, and suddenly effects his own salvation by turning his perverse endeavors into the true path of real Art.

But the fact of our being able to notice only detached passages, and not one entire great passage—not, for instance, the whole love-scene to which I referred, but only separate moments in it, compels us, above all things, to reflect upon the horrible nature of the madness, that nips in the bud the development of the musician's noblest qualities, and stamps his muse with the insipid smile of a repulsive desire to please, or the distorted simper of an insane rage for command. This madness is the anxiety of the musician to defray, himself and out of his own property, that which neither he nor his property can defray, and in the common production of which he can only participate, when it is presented him from out of the particular property of another. Through this unnatural anxiety, by which the musician wished to satisfy his vanity—namely, to represent his capability in the light of boundless power, he has reduced the said power, which is, in truth, most rich, to the most beggarly poverty, in which Meyerbeer's operatic music now appears to us. In the selfish endeavor to force its narrow forms, as the only valid ones, upon the drama, this operatic music has proved, until it was insupportable, the poverty-stricken, oppressive stiffness and unprofitableness of the forms in question. In the mania for appearing rich and varied, it has sunk, as a musical Art, to a state of the most complete mental want, and been compelled to borrow of the most material mechanism. In the egotistical pretence of exhausting dramatic characteristic by mere musical means, it has, lastly, lost all natural power of expression, and degraded itself to the level of the most grotesque buffoonery.

PLAYING PEOPLE OUT.—At the Panopticon, in Leicester Square, is one of the finest organs in the world. But, from a correspondence which has been published, it would appear, that whatever stops the instrument may have, the vox humana of the proprietary emits very objectionable noises. Mr. Best, who had been acting as organist, and who has certainly made the organ discourse most eloquent music, complains of having been treated, by those who engaged his services, as an artist ought not to be treated; and, the first time the owners of the instrument send their bellows to mend, they had better send their manners to undergo a similar reparatory operation. Not satisfied with Mr. Best's scholarly exhibition of the varied powers of the grand organ, by the performance of a series of compositions to visitors who listen, the directors of the establishment call upon a gentleman and a musician to "play the people out." He is to accompany the shuffling of feet, the racing down stairs, the calls of parties "to keep together," the requests "not to shove," the squabble for canes, parasols, and umbrellas, and the recitative in which cabs are summoned to the door. And when the last lounge is out, the gentleman and musician may leave off. But this is not all. The direction is good enough to select a composition fit to be applied to this noble Art-purpose—and they select Mendelssohn's "Bridal March," which, as every body knows, is just the thing to be trampled to pieces by a crowd of wearied sight-seers, anxious to escape. If the directors could get a Raphael, they would, in the same spirit, lay it down as a door-mat, for the greater luxury of their departing patrons. Mr. Best, having in vain remonstrated against the vulgarity, very properly resigns. He will not desecrate Mendelssohn, and "play the people out." If the Panopticon people conduct all their arrangements in this fashion, and without regard to what is due to Art, the public, which soon comprehends such things, will discover it, and then the next organists will have a very much harder task to attempt than "playing people out," namely that of "playing them in." The directors have got a Novum Organum, and a noble one, but they need not therefore behave like fat Bacons.

TOUCH: AS APPLIED TO THE INSTRUMENT AND THE FINGER.—The term "Touch" is applied as well to the instrument as to the performer. When it is said that a pianoforte has "a good touch," it is intended to express that each key replies with ease to every degree of lightness or power with which the finger presses or strikes it; that it possesses the just amount of resistance to the touch of the finger; that its slow or rapid reiteration produces tones of equal value respectively, and that in these various particulars there exists no perceptible inequality throughout the entire range of the instrument. By the "touch" of the performer we mean the action of the finger on the key. By the majority of pianists, professional as well as amateur, this quality is not sufficiently cultivated; and now that we fortunately possess actions so perfect in their mechanism as to enable us to draw from the string any amount, and almost any quality of tone we may desire, we must attribute a hard unvocal tone, if I may be allowed the expression, to a want of musical feeling on the part of the performer. I would counsel all students of the pianoforte closely to imitate the voice; and, by frequent experiments, strive to produce from the point of the finger every gradation of tone of which the voice is capable. Between forte and fortissimo, piano and pianissimo, there are gradations of tones to be drawn forth, analogous, in the sister art of painting, to the middle tints of a picture; by the production of which, an expression is given to music which excites, both in the player and the auditor, emotions, almost as varied as our sensibilities. An attention to pianos and fortes, just time, and a firm clear articulation, are considered, by pianists in general, sufficient requisites to constitute a "good player." We have myriads of "good" players; but of "great" players, how few! The aim of manufacturers, besides producing a greater volume of tone, a more sustained quality, and a more equal touch has been to bring, by means of the most perfect mechanism, the peculiar sensitiveness of the finger into a more immediate association with the string, so that every variety of touch shall produce a corresponding variety of tone from the instrument. Dr. Lardner, in his "Handbook of Philosophy" instances the mechanism which in the pianoforte connects the key with the hammer as a "beautiful example of complex leverage." He says "the object of it is to convey, from the point where the finger acts upon the key, to that at which the hammer acts upon the string, all the delicacy of action of the finger; so that the piano may participate to a certain extent in the sensibility of touch which is observable in the harp; and which is the consequence of the finger acting immediately on the string in that instrument without the intervention of any other mechanism." The whole range of mechanical art, I believe, does not furnish a more astonishing result; and, when the distance from the keys to the wires is considered, I think it will be conceded that to produce, through the medium of wood and leather, that marvellous sympathy which exists between the finger and the strings, a great triumph of mechanical skill has been achieved. We are of late, however, so accustomed to perfection in the numerous inventions of art that it not only ceases to excite our wonder, but is not even appreciated. Charles Salaman's Fourth Lecture.

[The following beautiful little poem from TENNYSON's new volume—"Maud, and other poems"—(in press by Messrs. Ticknor & Fields, Boston), is said to be a true passage from the poet's own experience.]

THE LETTERS.

Still on the tower stood the vane,
A black yew gloom'd the stagnant air.
I peer'd athwart the chancel pane
And saw the altar cold and bare.
A clog of lead was round my feet,
A band of pain across my brow;
'Cold altar, heaven and earth shall meet
Before you hear my marriage vow.'

I turn'd and humm'd a bitter song
That mock'd the wholesome human heart,
And then we met in wrath and wrong,
We met, but only meant to part.
Full cold my greeting was and dry;
She faintly smiled, she hardly moved;
I saw with half unconscious eye
She wore the colors I approved.

She took the little ivory chest,
With half a sigh she turned the key,
And raised her head with lips compress'd,
And gave my letters back to me.
And gave the trinkets and the rings,
My gifts when gifts of mine could please;
As looks the father on the things
Of his dead son, I looked on these.

She told me all her friends had said:
I rag'd against the public liar;
She talked as if her love were dead,
But in my words were seeds of fire.
'No more of love; your sex is known;
I never will be twice deceived,
Henceforth I trust the man alone,
The woman cannot be believed.

Thro' slander, meanest spawn of hell
(And woman's slander is the worst),
And you, whom once I loved so well,
Thro' you, my life will be accurst.'
I spoke with heart, and heat and force,
I shock her breast with vague alarms;
Like torrents from a mountain's source
We rushed into each other's arms.

We parted: sweetly gleamed the stars,
And sweet the vapor-braided blue,
Low breezes fann'd the belfry bars,
As homeward by the church I drew.
The very graves appear'd to smile,
So fresh they rose in shadow'd swells;
'Dark porch,' I said, 'and silent aisle,
There comes a sound of marriage bells.'

SOUND DOCTRINE.—In a sermon, delivered by Rev. Dr. Bellows, of New York, before the Western Unitarian Conference, is the following paragraph:

"For my own part, I say it in all solemnity, I have lived to become sincerely suspicious of the piety of those who do not love pleasure in any form. I cannot trust the man that never laughs; that is always sedate; that has no apparent outlets for those natural springs of sportiveness and gayety that are perennial in the human soul. I know that nature takes her revenge on such violence. I expect to find secret vices, malignant sins, or horrid crimes springing up in this hot-bed of confined air and imprisoned space; and, therefore, it gives me a sincere moral gratification anywhere, and in any community, to see innocent pleasures and popular amusements resisting the religious bigotry that frowns so unwisely upon them. Anything is better than dark, dead, unhappy social life—a prey to ennui and morbid excitement, which results from unmitigated puritanism, whose second crop is usually unbridled license and infamous folly."

Music Abroad.

Germany.

MUNICH.—A correspondent of the Philadelphia Bulletin writes:

The opera at Munich is one of the best in Germany, and I was glad of the opportunity of hearing a true German opera performed in a German theatre. KREUTZER's Nachtlager in Granada was announced—an opera with the music of which I was familiar, although it has never been played in America. The theatre is a large and very handsome one, with five tiers of boxes and a very spacious comfortable parquet. The performance commenced at half past 6 o'clock, and a little before that, on entering, I found a large audience assembled. There were no famous artists among the singers, but all were respectable, and the barytone, Herr KINDERMANN, is the best I have heard in Europe, but not equal to BADIALLI, whose equal I have not seen either in Paris or London. Madame DIETZ was the prima donna—she has a good voice and method and acts quite well, but is neither young nor pretty. The orchestra numbered over sixty first rate performers, and I observed that the harpist was a woman. They played most admirably, and the capital overture to the opera could scarcely have been better performed. The Nachtlager in Granada, though somewhat deficient in dramatic interest, is very well written. Its melodies are graceful, without being strikingly original, and some of the concerted music is most admirable. The burden of the work rests upon the soprano and the first barytone; the tenor has not a great deal to do.—Herr Kindermann delighted me by his acting and singing, especially in a scene where he is shut up and goes to rest in a ruined apartment of the Alhambra, and is disturbed by a band of outlaws, with whom he has a conflict, in which, of course, he is victorious. The soprano has a good duet with the tenor, a better with the barytone, and sings in a very fine trio with both at the close of the opera. A quintet—soprano, four barytones and basses, was also very effective. The chorus numbered between sixty and seventy singers, and they did their part extremely well. The scenery, too, was extremely beautiful, and every scene was painted expressly for its special purpose, so that there were no violations of propriety and none of the absurd anachronisms that are constantly to be seen on the American stage. For one of the best seats in the theatre, secured in advance, to see such an excellent performance as this, I had to pay only a single florin. The audience seemed to enjoy the opera exceedingly, were very attentive, and liberal, but not boisterous or indiscriminating in their applause. The whole performance was over a quarter before 9 o'clock, so that a valuable part of the evening remained for private entertainments or for visits to the gardens, where there is music every evening. All must agree that this is much more rational than staying till midnight, as they do at Paris or London, to hear one of MEYERBEER's enormous works, or parts of two or three of other composers.

KÖNIGSBERG.—Mlle. Johanna Wagner has appeared with great success in Iphigenia in Aulis and Euryanthe. The operatic company will shortly proceed to Elbing, to give a series of eight representations. Mlle. Johanna Wagner will accompany them.

BERLIN.—The season at the Royal Opera-house was brought to a close with M. Auber's Luc des Fées. Owing to the fine weather and the various attractions out of doors, the house was very thinly attended. It will remain closed for a month. The concert given by the bands of the various regiments, for the benefit of the Fund for Military Musicians, their Wives, and Children, went off, last week, with great éclat.

STETTIN.—Mlle. Johanna Wagner has appeared in Tannhäuser and I Montecchi e Copuletti with success. A new romantic comic opera, entitled Das Wirthshaus am Kyffhäuser, has been produced, and tolerably well received. The music is by a young composer of the name of Ludwig Hoffmann, chorus-master at the theatre.

LEIPZIG.—At the re-opening of the theatre, in the beginning of September, Herr A. Riccius, who has, for many years, directed the "Euterpe" concerts, will fulfil the duties of conductor.

GENEVA.—Two concerts are given every week on the Lake. The orchestra, consisting entirely of Germans, is placed in a large barque, which the audience follow about in small boats.

VIENNA.—The Italian operatic season was brought to a close on the 30th ult., with selections from the following operas:—Rigoletto, Lucrezia Borgia, La Cenerentola, Il Trovatore, and Norma.

Paris.

GRAND OPERA.—(Correspondence London Musical World, July 21.)

ROGER and ALBONI appeared ten days ago in the Prophète, Roger filling the part of Jean of Leyden, Alboni representing his much-tried and afflicted mother. To those who are not familiar with the simple, dignified, and touching conception of MARIO, or with the more impassioned, vigorous, and manly representation of TAMBERLIK, Roger may pass for a good representative of the peasant-prophet-king. To my taste he overacts the part, and, in his constant desire to be doing something, misses the effect produced by the calm dignity of Mario, or the quiet but resolute bearing of Tamberlik.

But, although Roger has yet to learn the ars celare artem, he is an accomplished singer with a fine voice and good style, a thorough musician and a conscientious artist. What can I say of Alboni which has not been repeated a thousand times? To what purpose should I speak of that marvellous voice, limpid, sonorous, of unprecedented compass, ever fresh, ever charming, ever touching? * * * Her conception of the part is admirable, her execution of the music perfectly marvellous. With her, Fides is a poor peasant woman, whose whole soul is absorbed in one overpowering sensation—love for her son. She is no enthusiast, no high-souled matron; she is a loving, trusting, tender-hearted, devoted mother, ready to yield up her life for her child, but resolutely refusing to sanction an impostor; willing to forget the past and forgive the present, if her son will but return to his humble home, and remain with that mother who is so fondly devoted to him. This conception seems to be more true than that which makes of Fides an austere devotee, cursing the impiety committed by the Prophet, and bowed down by the weight of his wickedness and profanity. Alboni has evidently studied her part with the greatest care and attention, and nothing could exceed the manner in which from beginning to end she portrayed in action the conception she had formed. Her first air, Ah! mon fils, sois béni, was sung with a tenderness, grace, and amplitude, of which words can afford no idea; and the exquisite tones of her most lovely voice produced an instantaneous thrill of pleasure through the whole house. She was called for again and again both during and after the opera, and the performance was one continued triumph. Mlle. POINSON makes a pleasing Bertha, and the orchestra and chorus, though inferior to those of Covent Garden, are yet deserving of praise for the manner in which they acquitted themselves.

Here, then, is the Grand-Opéra well provided until the close of the season. Les Vêpres Siciliennes promises its career of success, and Mlle. CRAVELLI has won all hearts in her last and one of her most effective impersonations. Such receipts have rarely been known in the history of the establishment as those of Les Vêpres Siciliennes, and the capabilities of the house would be taxed were there even accommodation for twice the number it now contains. The Duke of Saxe Coburg's opera, Santa Chiara, is in constant rehearsal, in order that it may be produced to do honor to your Queen's visit in August; and, at the end of this year, alas! Mlle. Cravelli bids farewell to the stage for ever.

THE OPERA COMIQUE is full to the roof each night, and gives alternate representations of L'Étoile du Nord and Jenny Bell. The Théâtre-Lyrique is closed until September, when it opens with Marie Cabel in Jaguarita, L'Indienne.

The Exhibition has been a source of enormous profit to the operas and theatres, for the weather has been so uncertain that the balls and concerts al fresco—for which Paris is so famous—have been comparatively deserted, while the theatres and operas overflowed. The receipts during the month of June amounted to no less a sum than 1,309,307 francs being, I believe, the largest receipt on record, and 377,035 francs more than in the corresponding month last year.

Musical Chat.

Concerts at the sea-shore are quite the fashion. Miss HENSLEY's at Newport, on Monday evening, is glowingly reported. She was assisted by her sister LOUISE, by Sig. BRIGNOLI, the tenor, and Messrs. DRESEL, SCHULTZE, &c. On the previous Monday, Mme. LA GRANGE, Sig. BRIGNOLI, Baron DE TROBRIAND, Miss VAN ZANDT and Mrs. RIGGS, (the last three amateurs) sang at a "religious concert" given at the church of the "Lady of Our Isle", to raise funds for the purchase of an organ for the church. The selections were principally from Verdi, Bellini and Rossini—pretty well for a "religious" concert! But as the letter-writer well says: "Everything in Newport is governed by fashion." We see it also stated that the concert was opened by a blind pupil of the South Boston Institute, "who executed Rossini's Stabat Mater on the piano (!) with wonderful accuracy." It is further stated that: "The performance lasted nearly two hours, and it was the most fashionable gathering I have seen this season. Thus far, it has been the event. For more than an hour before the appointed time, carriages were rolling down the hill and through the various thoroughfares to the church; and after the concert was over, the streets on three sides of the church were filled for some distance with a line of vehicles on each side. The sun was still an hour and a half high and as there was ample time, the greater number started for the beach, to drive on the hard sand at low tide." Mr. MILLARD gives another matinee next Monday.

The concert at Nahant a week hence by Mrs. J. H. LONG, one of the very best of our native cantatrici, must not be forgotten. Mr. ARTHURSON, tenor, and Mr. L. H. SOUTHARD, as pianist, will lend valuable aid. By notice in another column it will be seen that the steamer will make an extra trip to Nahant in season for the concert and return when it is over.

Mlle. VESTVALI has made an engagement with the manager of the opera in Mexico, and will leave the States on the first of September. She will pass the interim at Niagara Falls, Saratoga and Newport. . . . STRAKOSCH and PARODI have been concertizing as far as Galena on the Mississippi. . . . PAUL JULLIEN is in Canada; CAMILLE URSO in New York, with no engagement, and "really in want," according to the Review. . . . GOTTSCHALK, the Pianist, has gone South, in "a very precarious state of health."

The Philharmonic Society in Munich has enrolled among its honorary members a young female composer, Fraulein EMILIE MAYER, in recognition of her high musical aspirations and excellent achievements in the Art. A Trio of her composition was performed in the hall of the society on the 17th of June, before an overflowing audience. . . . The authorities of the Evangelical Churches in Berlin are threatening to forbid any further musical performances in the churches, lest the dignity of the church should suffer thereby.

The Musical Review circulates the following:

"All GERMAN MUSICAL SOCIETIES, in their own land or abroad, are requested by the editor of the Neue Berliner Musik-Zeitung to assist in the collection of materials for a forthcoming musical statistical work, by forwarding information in regard to the conductor of their societies, the numbers, time of formation, whether they are state or private institutions, or any thing of interest in regard to them, to the Neue Berliner Musik-Zeitung, Berlin, Prussia, as soon as possible. German singing-societies are very numerous in America, and it is hoped that accurate information in regard to them will be forwarded to Berlin. German papers in America will do a service by giving the above notice a place in their columns."

It is now stated that there is no probability that BALFE, author of the "Bohemian Girl," &c., will come to New York to direct Italian Opera at the Academy. He was willing to conduct three performances of a new opera of his own for the modest sum of $5,000 and expenses to and fro; the copyright to remain his own. . . . Sig. FREDERICO BADIALI, brother of the popular baritone, and manager here of Sig. Marti's Havana opera troupes, died last week in New York.

The great pianist, THALBERG, since the failure of his opera at Vienna, is reported to have left for Brazil. . . . The Horne Journal gives the "census" of Madame ALBONI, (whose recent Parisian triumphs may be read under our head of Music Abroad) thus:

"The gradual wax of this great moon among the operatic stars, is regularly chronicled by the French critics. The census of her increase of pounds latterly is startling—but we forbear to particularize. The last paragraph on the subject thus concludes:—

Madame Alboni is the same as to voice and talent, but she has increased, out of all personal acquaintance, in size. It is appalling. What will contain her, at this rate of progress? New characters will be necessary in operas—heroines borne in palanquins or on sledges—or she must sing from a cloud, as a Juno, or from the side-scenes, as a concealed object of adoration. Happily, as yet, Nature persists in leaving her voice unobstructed. It pervades, as yet, the entire globe which she inhabits."

At the court theatre in Vienna, a Hungarian opera, Hunyady Laszlo, by ERKEL, was among the next things to be produced; it has produced a great sensation at the national theatre in Pesth. . . . ROSSINI has left the noise of Paris for the sea-shore. Some of his worshippers improvised a little concert in his dwelling, at which Mme. UCCELLI, and Signori NERI-BARALDI and ZUCHELLI sang some numbers of his Soirées Musicales and two of the romances of GORDIGIANI. . . . VERDI has received the order of the Legion of Honor from Louis Napoleon.

We are glad to see that Novello is about to give us in English, as the next number of his valuable "Library for the Diffusion of Musical Knowledge," the famous treatise by HECTOR BERLIOZ on "Instrumentation."

Italian papers speak in raptures of the playing of the English pianist, Miss ARABELLA GODDARD, who has been concertizing in Florence. . . . A glance back over the repertoire of the Royal Opera in Berlin for the season past, from September 1854 to the end of June 1855, shows, that out of 152 representations 77 have been devoted to the works of German composers. C. M. von WEBER has the majority in 17 performances; his Oberon was given 11 times, his Freyshütz 4, his Euryanthe twice. Next to him came GLUCK and MOZART, each with 10 performances. Gluck's Orpheus was newly studied and given 6 times, his Ifigenia in Tauris and in Aulis twice each. Of Mozart the Don Juan appeared 6 times, the Nozze di Figaro 4 times. BEETHOVEN was represented 3 times by Fidelio, SPOHR once by Jessonda. Of the modern Germans, MEYERBEER has figured oftener, 6 times in the Huguenots and 5 times in the Prophète; after him comes FLITOW with 4 repetitions of Stradella and 3 of Martha; then LORTZING, whose Czar and Zimmermann was given 4 times and his Wildschütz twice. DORN with his Niebelungen figures 6 times. GLASER's Adler's Horst appears 5 times, KREUTZER's Nachlager once. Of not German masters, CHERUBINI in his Wasserträger came 3 times on the stage; BOIELDIEU 8 times, (La Dame Blanche 4, "John of Paris" 4); AUER's Masaniello was given 10 times, his Lac des Fées 10 times, Fra Diavolo 5, Le Macon 3, "Crown Diamonds" 1. HALEVY's Juive appeared 3 times; ROSSINI's Tancredi 7 times and "Siege of Corinth" 3 times; DONIZETTI's Lucrezia Borgia 4 times, Fille du Regiment 2, Lucia 2 and Favorita once; BELLINI's Capuletti 4 times and Sonnambula once. Of smaller operas were given MEHUL's Je t'oler, je besser twice, ISOUARD's Rendezvous twice, and GRISAR's Bon soir M. Pantalon 4 times. When will Boston and New York "Academies" tell such a story as that?

VIEUXTEMPS, (whom all artists and cultivated dilettanti regard as the first of violinists, unless JOACHIM may compete with him, and who in his visit to this country in the days of our musical infancy was overshadowed by the showy qualities of OLE BULL), has been passing the summer (says the Signale) in his charming villa at Dreieichenhain, near Frankfurt, a place famous for the yet remaining ruins of a hunting castle of the Emperor Charles the Great. Vieuxtemps' estate borders immediately upon these ruins, and by its romantic situation and wild prospect is well calculated to inspire the artist to new compositions, to which his retirement is continually devoted.

THE GERMAN FESTIVAL.—Several societies of the "Turnverein" of different New England cities arrived in the city during the day yesterday and were received by the "Turnverein" of Boston. Others from Rhode Island, Connecticut and Western Massachusetts arrived in the late night trains. During the evening the German Glee Club met at Pfaff's hotel, and under the direction of AUG. KREISSMAN sang several German national songs and glees in preparation for the festivities at Florence Grove to-day.—Advertiser.

The Musical Conventions.

The Boston Music Hall and Tremont Temple are now swarming at all hours, since Wednesday morning, with rival crowds of music teachers, choristers and singers from the country, far and wide, besides multitudes of resident musicians, critics, amateurs, &c., who are curious to see and hear what is going on. We have not found time to be present at any of the regular sessions of the Conventions proper; but we are told that the numbers in attendance upon both corps of teachers are quite large. The event of the opening day (Wednesday) was the "Organ Concert" given in the evening at the Tremont Temple, where a large audience thronged eager to hear the renowned organ-playing of Mr. GEORGE W. MORGAN, on the largest and in many respects the finest organ in this country. This we did attend and felt rewarded.

Much has been said (during the week) of Mr. Morgan, as one of the most distinguished of the younger organists in London, and of his extraordinary skill in pedal-playing. For the year past he has resided in New York, very quietly it would seem, and without much blowing of the trumpet in the high ways. The programme was certainly inviting, especially the first part, which embraced purely classical and solid pieces, three of them of the kind which can strictly be called organ music. The first was a Prelude and Fugue (in C Minor) by MENDELSSOHN, a very elaborate and beautiful work, and was rendered with the utmost clearness and effectiveness throughout. The long and interesting theme of the Fugue was kept perfectly distinct through all the answers, involutions and inversions. Next he played the Andante from BEETHOVEN's C minor symphony. Organ versions of orchestral music must of course, however happy, leave much to be desired. The great organ with its fifty or more stops, its five keyboards, and means of coupling and mixing qualities of tone ad libitum, is to be sure a sort of orchestra. But its many instruments in one must lack the individual vitality which each has in the orchestra of many men, and the distracting work of constantly recombining or isolating the stops must involve some dallying with time, some humoring of the movement of the composition. Yet we confess we were astonished to hear so much of the orchestral character and coloring of that lovely work reproduced under the player's hands—and feet. The stops were blended with rare tact, so as to imitate (more than we had thought possible), the contrasted tone colors of the original. It was a performance of great skill and beauty.

The next piece was BACH's famous St. Ann's Fugue, with the three subjects. This was from the deepest, purest springs of real organ music. It was played in a simple, solid, clear, masterly manner, so that the thought, the essential music of the work, lay clearly and simply before the mind. It was not musical effect, but musical essence; the rich full organ tone seemed the music's voice, not something added from without, and the player gave it conscientiously free course. Our only doubt was, whether the rapidity of the movement was not a little too great for the most distinct and telling effect of all parts of an instrument so vast and so distributed over wide space. The Fugue and Chorus from HANDEL's "Israel in Egypt," was another solid, satisfying "fill" of glorious music.

Here, in the higher view of an Art feast, one would gladly have left off. Here one could have gone home and slept, as if among the mountains or by the sea-shore, at peace with all the world. Other fine things, pleasing things, curious and wonderful things followed, but they were lighter things, distracting by their promiscuity, and fatiguing to the mind both by their promiscuity and length. It is only the comment one is forced to make upon nine out of ten of all concerts, by whomsoever given: too heterogeneous and too much. But here were fresh and eager auditors from the country, who do not hear these things every day, and the wish was natural to crowd as much as possible into their week. We proceed then to

Part II. Selections from ROSSINI's Stabat Mater. This was given under the direction of Mr. A. N. JOHNSON, the head and father of the Convention, by the Choir of Park Street Church, numbering from fifty to sixty voices, with the quartet of solo singers: Miss S. E. WHITEHOUSE, soprano; Miss H. BRIGGS, second soprano; Mr. E. H. FROST, tenor; Mr. W. GARRETT, basso. Mr. WILLCOX supplied accompaniments from the organ, adapting its various stops (among which he is lovingly at home) with graceful and expressive tact. The choruses (in the opening movement and the Inflamatus) were sung with a purity and well blended, musical quality of voice, which we have supposed very rare in large church choirs, also with a careful regard to points of expression, to light and shade, pianissimo, &c., as well as to correct Italian pronunciation of the Latin words, which showed patient, conscientious drill. The swelling fortissimos were quite grand. One fault however was the carrying of a mechanical virtue to excess; that sharp, short cutting off of the last note of a phrase, while better than the drawing, straggling wont of many choirs, gave the feeling of mechanical precision more than of expression. Some of the solos also showed too much of the bran-new edge of the same drill. The quartets: Sancta mater, and Quando corpus suffered from the indisposition of the tenor, for whom indulgence had to be asked beforehand. These were ambitious efforts, especially the latter, so chromatic, and naked as it is without the least accompaniment. Even the Italians, (who always sing us this Stabat Mater and nothing else, when they give "sacred" concerts), generally contrive to have a violin or two near by, sotto-voce, by which they may feel their pitch from time to time; but these young persons sang it and kept mainly true without such aid, making allowance, of course, for the disabled tenor. The soprano of Miss Whitehouse is singularly pure, fresh, even, flexible and telling; in execution and in style she must take place among the foremost of our young native singers. The contralto was true and of pleasing quality, though hardly powerful enough. Mr. Garrett has a rich, well-developed voice, and sings conscientiously; only in some passages of his solo, as the opening of Pro peccatis, the voice had a dry and constrained sound, which gave way when the singer seemed to feel more free. On the whole it was a highly creditable performance; though something less hacknied than that music, something in which we have not heard all the great prime donne &c., who have ever visited our city, would, we think, have been a better subject for such ambitious effort.

Part III. was composed again of organ pieces, of a lighter and more fantastical character—show pieces, less in the range of strictly legitimate organ music. These were: 1, the overture to Der Freyschütz, which of course we call a show piece only as transferred to the organ, and which was played very skilfully and effectively, especially in the more spirited passages, towards the end; it was less so in the opening, where we suppose the contrast of the horn quartet with the tremolo of strings admits in any case of but faint imitation on the organ. 2, "Auld Robin Grey," with introduction and variations, fantasia-like, quasi impromptu, in which he produced a great many wonderfully curious and sometimes beautiful effects. 3. Lastly "God save the Queen," as played by Mr. Morgan before their Majesties in the Crystal Palace, London. Another piece of marvellously florid and fantastic variation-work, showing an unlimited command of that sort of thing, and bringing out the separate and blended beauties of the many organ stops to great advantage. Skilful as it all was, we must confess it wearisome; we had wandered too long in those wilfully perplexed mazes of melody to receive any definite and lasting impression. One's ears had got too full, with listening to so much, and hence had grown indifferent to all they heard. Perhaps a good honest Bach fugue or Handel chorus might have proved a restorative, like the cool of evening and sea-shore after a roving, idle, hot, distracting day.

On Thursday evening was the second concert, consisting of two parts of organ music again by Mr. Morgan,—one part classical, the other light and popular, and a third part of selections sang from NEUKOMM's hacknied oratorio of "David." We had only time to hear a portion of the first, which was undoubtedly the best. The organist seemed this time to exert himself particularly in the field of great and true organ music, playing fugue after fugue, in admirable style, and stimulated and encouraged, we were happy to see, by the rapturous applause of the entire promiscuous audience. Do not say, then, that the organ must be made a play-thing, that Bach and Mendelssohn must be avoided, in order to interest the people in the music of that noble instrument. Mr. Morgan is certainly by far the ablest organist who has yet been heard in Boston. His command of the pedals is even amusingly complete; how grandly he made the sub-bass roll and toss in that billowy chorus from "Israel in Egypt." Every thing is artistically finished, with no break of melodious connection anywhere, in his wandering over all those banks of keys; he uses the swell to perfection, and in changing the stops (which is like the painter's mixing his colors on his pallet, only that the organist must do it while his picture goes on, losing not a breath of time), he has the happiest way of a humoring the stream of improvisation during the transition from one combination of tone-colors to another, so that it seems all perfectly natural and in the intention of the piece; the interest is not suspended. He seems as much at home with that Tremont Temple organ, to have grown as sympathetically to it, as if there, and there only, at that precise organ, he had wooed music from the first. In tasteful skill we have not known his equal; whether there be so much of the poetry of the Art, so much depth of sentiment, of the religion of Music in his playing, as we read of in some of the great German organists, we cannot say.

Yesterday afternoon the Convention continued its series of daily concerts with a performance of MOZART's Twelfth Mass, and organ pieces as before. This evening they bring a full orchestra into the field, for the first public trial of two MSS. overtures by Mr. L. H. SOUTHARD, and of two scenes from his unfinished opera, "The Scarlet Letter", in which the principal parts will be sustained by Mrs. J. H. LONG, Mr. ARTHURSON and Mr. MOZART; to be followed by Grand Choruses by the whole Convention. This will be an occasion of peculiar interest.

There is a very large class also in attendance at the Convention in the Boston Music Hall, under the direction of Mr. B. F. BAKER, who has had some fourteen years' experience in these matters. This assemblage styles itself "THE BOSTON MUSICAL CONVENTION AND PHILHARMONIC INSTITUTE". The hourly exercises, lessons, chorus practice, &c., are essentially of the same character as those at the Temple. Mr. Baker has the able assistance of Prof. H. S. MAY, from London, and Messrs. ADAMS, BALL, CUTLER, WHEATON and WERNER, of this city.—Their first public demonstration is announced for to-morrow (Sunday evening) when HAYDN's "Creation" will be performed with orchestral accompaniment, and Mr. CUTLER at the organ. With such solo singers as Miss BOTHAMLY, Miss TWICHELL, Mr. BALL, Mr. MOZART, and the others named, it cannot fail to please.

Our Music Table.

Song from Milton's Comus, by OTTO DRESEL.
(Published by Nathan Richardson.)

Here we have something refreshingly pure and true in the way of song. The composition is worthy of its subject, which is the invocation of the Lady to "Sweet Echo, sweetest nymph, that liv'st unseen", &c. The musician has caught the tone and spirit of the poem; that crystal purity and spirituality of Milton's Comus is found in the chaste and un-common-place melody, the delicately sympathetic accompaniment, and even in the happy choice of key, C \sharp minor. The song is for a mezzo-soprano voice, and not mechanically difficult, but must be sung with soul and feeling. The "resounding grace" of the music to the last two lines, so truly Miltonic and sonorous, ought to inspire a singer who has any soul. And the whole is true to the character of the Lady, a song of virgin innocence in danger and distress calling with the trust of a pure soul upon the good unseen powers to help her. "Sure something holy lodges in that breast." The composition, we understand, was occasional. It was made to help out a parlor performance of the "Mask" by some young people in one of our cultivated families.

Judith: Beneath the ramparts of Bethesda.—
Scene and air written by BELANGER; music by J. CONCONE. Translated and adapted by T. B. B. Pp. 9; price 50 cts. (O. Ditson).

This is a very musical and effective dramatic oratorio scene, by the author, we suppose, of the well-known vocal exercises, who is certainly a master of the best style of Italian melody. Everything is clear, melodious and singable. Both recitative and melody are expressive, the compass for the most part moderate, and we should think it must become a favorite in concert-rooms and parlors.

Souvenir de Vienne, by JULES SCHULHOFF, pp. 7. (Oliver Ditson).

This is a long-flowing, rather ornate and difficult Nocturne for the piano, which, though it has neither the simplicity and purity of Field, nor the delicious reverie and spirituality of Chopin, being a much more artificial kind of product, is yet not without interest and beauty.

The Evening Rose, (La Rosée du Soir), Pensée Musicale pour Piano, par G. A. OSBORNE. pp. 9. (Oliver Ditson).

A short harp-like prelude is followed by a gentle, limpid little melody, which flows gracefully along, running into variations (arpeggio, chromatic triplets, &c., sometimes in the air, sometimes in the bass), making quite a pleasing and by no means a very easy little fantasia. But why is the French title: La Rosée du Soir, or the Dew of Evening, translated into "The Evening Rose"?

Diary Abroad.—No. 19.

BERLIN, July 19.—In the church out at Charlottenburg, MOZART's Requiem! CHERUBINI's makes one tremble, Mozart's makes one cry.

Sulca me fons pietatis!

JULY 21.—Our LIEBIG is a glorious fellow. Last Spring he gave us the four Leonore and Fidelio overtures at one concert in the order of their composition—to-night this is the programme out at Hennig's:

Part I. Three overtures to Faust.
SCHULZ, LINDPAINTNER, SPOHR.
Part II. Overture, Abencerragen. CHERUBINI.
Symphony D. (No. 10). HAYDN.
Part III. Symphony F. (No. 8). BEETHOVEN.

This will make up for his having inflicted SPOHR's "weight" of Tones upon us three times lately. Not upon me though, for I was one of a large number who stayed away after the first time. Still the Weike der Tone has a large class of admirers. I find that the members of the orchestra like to play it greatly. I know no piece of music of such pretensions, and played so much, which I detest so heartily.

In 1842 a sort of charity foundation was established at Dresden called the "Tiedge Stiftung", in honor of the author of the Urania, the object of which seems to be the encouragement of sacred poetry. From the recent report of the treasurer we learn that HELMIG VON CHEZY, authoress of the text to WEBER's Euryanthe, is living in Switzerland still, now very old, very poor, and blind, and that the committee of the "Stiftung" has granted her a pension of 60 Thaler (about $48) for life. The income of the foundation is about $250 per annum, and that of the year past was expended, besides the pension to Frau v. Chezy, in a prize of 200 Thaler to Dr. JULIUS HAMMER, for a collection of religious poetry which has just reached its 11th edition. Hammer, who is one of the committee, has refused the money, and it is to be expended in purchasing and adorning a piece of land on the exquisitely beautiful banks of the Elbe, near the Bastei, in the so-called Saxon Switzerland, to be called by Tiedge's name.

MADAME VIARDOT GARCIA has recently purchased of Streicher, son-in-law of André, Mozart's original autograph score of "Don Juan" for £160. Another lot of Mozart autographs, which belonged to the younger of the André's, is for sale. They have however so little value other than as mere autographs, that they have been refused two or three times at the Royal Library in Berlin when offered there.

The King of Prussia has placed in the hands of the Architekten-verein of Berlin two annual prizes of 300

Thaler each, to be awarded, one for the most successful plan for an edifice, the subject to be given out by the society; the other for some plan in the departments of waterworks, railroads or machinery. The prize is to be used by the successful candidates in traveling. This is no more than has already been done in painting and music.

The subjects for the coming year are, first, a plan for a Lutheran church, with 2000 seats, to be built of brick, in the round arch style, with parsonage attached, and so on. The second is, a plan for a moveable bridge for a canal 78 feet wide. The plans are to be handed in in December, decided upon in January, and the prizes given in March, so that the student can immediately leave upon his travels. Could we only have something of the kind!

Pianos—Another Improvement.

The "Swell Mute" is the name of a new "Attachment" to the Piano, which has recently been patented, and which the proprietor, Mr. E. B. ROBINSON, of Portland, invites all persons who are interested to examine at Room No. 17, Tremont Temple. Generally hitherto the very name of an "attachment" to the piano has caused us half to sympathize with our friend the Reverend Doctor Blank, who, pestered all day by the jingle of polkas and scale-exercises, and loving books better than he loved music, on over-hearing some one call the "Aeolian Attachment" a humbug, volunteered his own private opinion that "all attachments to pianos were a humbug, if not worse." Commonly the thing attached has been something alien to the very nature of the piano, something uncongenial with its quality of tone. The combination of metallic reeds with strings, for instance, results in a mongrel, bastard mixture, which is neither one thing nor the other; neither organ nor piano, but rather a forced, unnatural marriage of the weaker sides of both. For certain effects, for certain musical economies, they are sometimes useful, but pianists, who are artists, shun them.

But here we have a modification, an improvement which is legitimate, which proceeds from the nature of the piano-forte itself; which seeks no new quality or holding out of tone, no new expression, or increase of power, which does not reside in the vibration of the string itself. It is the principle of the mute used in violins applied to the bridge of the piano. The bridge is pressed or pinched on the same principle, so as to isolate it and leave the vibration purely in the strings. The same thing has been realized to a less perfect degree in what is called the "Dolce Campana attachment" of Messrs. Gray & Boardman, but, as we understand, by an inferior mechanism, dropping weights upon the bridge. In the Swell-Mute the end is completely attained by a couple of sliding iron frames which close upon the bridge on either side, being precisely fitted to its curvature, so that the bridge is locked fast and firm. This is operated by a pedal, so that the pressure may be loosened and graduated at will, producing a beautiful swell. This yields a tone of remarkable sweetness and purity, a tone (it has been well said) "reduced to its essence", and which prolongs itself with an even power, not vanishing to a breath immediately. We have heard it only as applied to a quite ordinary square piano, and the effect even there was so singularly beautiful, so expressive and in the true character of the instrument, that we cannot doubt that the success of the invention will be certain when it shall be truly applied to Grand Pianos. Many of our best musicians are delighted with it, and we should fancy that some of our leading piano manufacturers would be eager to possess themselves of so genuine an improvement.

Are many of our readers aware to what perfection the construction of metallic reed keyed instruments has been carried in this country? Those who are not, and who would see and hear an instrument on the "Melodeon" principle, but much enlarged, with various stops and swell, equal in power and richness of tone to many small organs, and equal if not superior in expressiveness to the Parisian Orgue Expressive, we would advise to call and examine the "Organ-Harmonium," just patented by Messrs. MASON & HAMLIN, Cambridge (corner of Charles) Street. We hope soon to have room for a more minute description.

NEW COURSE OF HARMONY,

BY L. H. SOUTHARD.

The Publishers call the attention of the musical profession to this work, as one eminently calculated to lighten the labors of the teacher, and rapidly advance the pupil. It is emphatically a PRACTICAL work, serving both as a Manual of instruction on the one hand, and a Text-book on the other; and it is believed that the peculiar arrangement of the work, together with the very large number of exercises and examples, presents great advantages, to both scholar and teacher, over any similar work of the kind. Teachers highly commend the work. Mr. WILLIAM MASON says it is a work unsurpassed in the language. Mr. GEORGE J. WESS says that it is a work perspicuous in diction, methodical in arrangement, and sufficiently copious to embrace all the essentials of the general doctrine of accord. It can be ordered through any respectable Music-seller, and will be sent through the mail on the receipt of the price, ($1.75), postage prepaid.

Translated for this Journal.

Conradin Kreutzer.

FROM THE GERMAN OF W. H. RIEHL.

From wintry Russia, in December, 1849, came the news that the most lyrical among our opera composers, the pensive Swabian minstrel of the Spring, CONRADIN KREUTZER, had just died at Riga. And the German people took a warm interest in this news, whereat the learned old musicians, and the perverse moderns alike marvelled, since they both maintained—and justly—that the departed in no single piece had shown himself a great magician of his Art.

Kreutzer died at the age of sixty-seven years. Composers, to whom their Art has been the peaceful, tranquil occupation that it was to him, are apt to reach an even higher age; but it is remarkable, that the peculiar artistic reputation of this man dates only from the last fifteen of his seven and sixty years. He had published a long series of works since his youth, but only in his two and fiftieth year did he succeed in producing a kindling work of magnitude: Das Nachtlager von Granada (The Night Camp of Granada). This opera does not sound like the composition of a man of fifty-two. It had a wonderful success, the more wonderful since Kreutzer made no such lucky throw since this, as he had made none before. But this is in itself a most striking indication of the lyric talent, inasmuch as this depends more than any other on the favor of the moment. So Kreutzer in his inspired hours worked with fabulous speed and threw off his finest songs, those that were quickened with the warm poetic breath, as rapidly as the mere mechanical jobber in the Art. In other works of Kreutzer on the other hand you feel quite unmistakably, how painfully the composer toiled, yet could not invent aught fresh or new. This fluctuating dependence upon favoring moods is contrary to the calling of the dramatic composer, who has to work on a grand scale and for the whole, so that in view of the harmonious completeness of the structure we are willing to overlook some carelessness in detail. In this harmonious rounding off of the whole it was, that Kreutzer in his larger designs only succeeded once.

Kreutzer's course of life was extremely simple; you remark even in his compositions, that the unyielding powers of outward circumstances, which men call Fate, have made commotion in his soul. He was born at Mösskirch in the Schwarzwald, and indeed on the highest feast day of the musical calendar, on St. Cecilia's day.—From early youth he had judicious teachers at his side, who carried him quickly through the courses and degrees of musical study. At an age at which others had to fight their way forward step by step in Art in defiance of opposing circumstances, it was his privilege in the personal presence of great composers to feel the stimulus of the immediate impression of excellent performance.

The Wanderjahre, or travelling period of his artistic preparation, led him to Switzerland, to Vienna, Stuttgart and Donaueschingen, where he worked and learned in the excellent chapel of the prince of Fürstenberg. And as a kindly fate had otherwise befriended him, so here too to the composer, whose future fame was about to rest upon the composition of song, Nature had lent a tuneful voice, so that he could cultivate himself equally as an instrumentalist and as a singer.

Kreutzer has here and there directed, and in many places worked as a practical musician. I know not what interest may be felt in the special relation of these facts, and still less would it profit, to point here even in groups to the long list of his compositions. For Kreutzer belongs to that class of artists, with whom a single work as such has no peculiar importance, since it is only as reflected in his collective activity that the personality of the master manifests itself with any prominence.

It is well known that Kreutzer, himself a Swabian, in the choice of subjects for his composition has been particularly partial to the songs and ballads of UHLAND, and has frequently been very happy in hitting their peculiar tone. But this partiality to Uhland was more than a mere accident; it marks for us the whole historical standpoint in Art, which Kreutzer occupied, and this in fact is very nearly kindred with that of the "Swabian School of Poetry." As UHLAND, KERNER and their other Swabian comrades in song attached themselves to the older Romanticists, so Kreutzer's tendencies were in the direction of C. M. von WEBER.

But we are far from asserting that the artistic personality of Kreutzer holds as important a place in our musical, as Uhland's does in our poetical development. Only the key-note, which they both struck, Uhland in mightier, Kreutzer in weaker accords, was the same.

Out of the confusion of that many-colored magical world, unlocked by the Romantic School, Kreutzer snatched the simple song, a mixture of the popular echoes and of that ground-tone of a dissolving sentimental longing, already prefigured by von Weber in his best hours.

What GUTZKOW has said of Uhland, applies also in this sense to Kreutzer: "He pulled the bells of chapels, stationed shepherd boys upon the hill-tops and put happy songs into their mouths. He conjured back the Past in transfigured shape out of its germs, bade the old falcons once more stoop upon their quarry—bade minstrels knock for entrance at the gates of castles, charmed maidens out for us upon the green plain and let kings' sons pass by and fall in love with them." And so on, open the books of literary history, and almost every word, in which you find the Swabian School of Poetry described, you may apply to Conradin Kreutzer.

The day of this harmless Romanticism is past, in Music even more than in Poetry. Already the bright green of the Kreutzer Song-Spring seems monotonous and tame to us, and we feel clearly enough beforehand, that many a situation in his Nachtlager which is child-like to us, will appear childish to the coming generation.

The Romantic School split into two great branches, into a sickly and a sound Romanticism. The former strove for a lofty goal, but as if in a feverish intoxication, or indeed in that miserable feeling which attends the waking out of that, and which sick people have called Weltschmerz (world-woe). The others looked upon Art more as the pensive play of a soft and gentle disposition; they kept their health withal, like most men not addicted to too high concerns. Kreutzer in this sense has written a wholesome music, in opposition to the Frenchified New-Romanticists with their interesting paleness of face. In like manner, only more pervadingly and more victoriously, has the Swabian School of Poets formed a counterpart to what is called "Young Germany."

What GOETHE says of the Swabian clique of poets, that nothing "influencing human destiny" could proceed from their circle, holds in a yet higher degree of our harmless Kreutzer. But his very antipodes, the musical New-Romanticists, have shown too clearly that the last result is but a music of insanity, when the composer undertakes in every note to "influence human destiny."

Kreutzer kindled up a love for genuine German song, for the four-part songs for men's voices, at a time when the influences of the Parisian Neo-Romanticism were pouring in on us most powerfully. He was a quiet spirit, no reformer, not to say a revolutionist. Yet he has contributed not a little to enabling that enthusiasm, which takes its rise from the popular German song and which manifests itself more unmistakably from day to day, to insinuate itself gradually into the whole German music. Our German Liederkränze and Sängerbünde should bear this in mind and do honor to the memory of the deceased, who very early and at a very unfavorable time had fore-announced the very goal to which they bear their banners now. They should forget at the same time that Kreutzer threw into the bargain a couple of ounces more of sentimentality, than was exactly necessary, to keep the resisting public in good humor. And if Kreutzer in his operas sometimes forgets himself and coquets with the French and the Italian nature more than properly becomes a German musician, in his songs for the most part he has been a genuine national master.

In his Nachtlager von Granada Kreutzer has achieved the great point in Art, of keeping up the attraction of an opera almost without action by mere lyric situations, and of admirably veiling the lack of dramatic life through its lyrical exuberance. One may admire this, but let him beware of imitating it! It seems almost as if it were something more than outward ill luck, that Kreutzer found it so hard to get his Nachtlager brought out in Paris; in fact that the artist had to call in the aid of the law to refresh the memory of the French theatre direction about a German opera. For this lyrical opera bears about the same relation to the French notions of dramatic music, that water does to fire. And yet long after they have ceased to bring this opera out, you will hear them name it as a work, which more than any other has contributed to make the German male part-song respected abroad.

Kreutzer's genius always has appeared to us most lovable in one of his most modest works: in the music to Raymund's Verschwender (Prodigal). Here in the song of the beggar, he rises, in the simplest style of melody, to really thrilling tragical expression, such as he has realized with equal depth (so far as we know) nowhere else.—Here you may remark, that it is not the many notes, nor crowded instrumentation, which contain the highest power of tones, but that it is precisely the simple singing melody which works the greatest wonders. Kreutzer has succeeded admirably in hitting the popular tone of Raymund in his music; he has not musically localized it, as WENZEL MÜLLER did before him, who never could set the notes in his people's farces in any but the good Austrian way; he has nationalized it, expanded it into a German people's tone. But this happy throw also with Kreutzer was—an only one!

Every mortal is tormented with an organic ailment, which always holds him down just where he takes a spring towards the perfect, since perfection is to be realized only in Humanity and not in men. This organic heart-sickness in Kreutzer may be expressed by the maxim, that our knowledge and our Art are fragments. Could the fragments with him only have shaped themselves into a whole, could he have made himself more independent of the good or bad star of the moment, he would have become an admirable master.

There is another maxim which we find fulfilled in the pensive Kreutzer. Now, two years after his death, his posthumous work "Aurelia" is just beginning to get a foothold on the German stage. And in spite of the fact, that meanwhile this reflective and refined musical thought-painting, from which Kreutzer stands as remote as a harmless singing child, has been taking deeper and deeper root in opera, still the pensive strains of his posthumous opera find their old warm friends.—Such is the wonderful magic of the song of "Spring and Love," which breathes the freshness of youth for us again, even if we knowingly shake our heads over the litany for centuries repeated always in the same tone and never yet sung out. So it is still also with the songs, which Kreutzer's countrymen, the Swabian poets, sang.

In every artistically over-stimulated and over-cultivated age there are a few unpretending talents left, which in unaffected simplicity, as if they lived in another world, work on and by the force of contrast exercise a wider and a higher influence than they could otherwise have done. Such an amiable character, whose artistic significance was first created by the opposition of the other tendencies of his time, was CONRADIN KREUTZER. And that other maxim, of which his influence reminded us, is this: "God is mighty in the weak."

Conversations with Mendelssohn.

By the author of Fliegende Blätter für Musik, Leipzig, 1858.

I.

I NEVER possessed a good memory. Whenever I read, heard or thought anything that struck me as worthy of being remembered, I was obliged to enter it as quickly as possible in my journal, and, as I had a great deal to enter, to do so in the fewest words. I now regret this brevity very much, since I have looked over the notes of my conversations with Mendelssohn, for the purpose of making some of them public. I find the general purport, but not the particular expression. The deceased master, however, not only thought very exactly, but possessed the power of expressing his thoughts with precision, and often succeeded in hitting the right nail on the head in a very summary manner. The reader will, therefore, not receive Mendelssohn's thoughts in his words, but, unfortunately, only in mine. I am not aware whether any one can boast of having had long conversations with Mendelssohn, but, as far as my knowledge of him goes, he was not fond of them. In fact, smatterers and fine-talkers tried in vain to engage his attention. He either escaped from them by delicate turns, or, if they wished to detain him against his will, broke drily off. Many an unamiable judgment on his works arose very probably from such refusals on his part to enter into conversation. People said that he was proud, and revenged themselves by attacks in the papers.

I always liked speaking about our Art with practical musicians better than with anyone else. Mere Art-philosophers, even though they may be the most acute thinkers, cannot say a word on many points connected with the subject, either because they know nothing about them, or have not themselves any experience of them. That Mendelssohn had meditated earnestly on his Art, no one doubts. This fact was apparent in every opinion he uttered concerning it. But he generally enunciated the results of his meditations in a few words, without entering into any especial reasons. A proposal was once made that, in addition to directing the Gewandhaus Concerts at Leipzig, he should deliver lectures on music to the University. His answer was: "He did not think he possessed the necessary capability." He refused. He knew very well that he was perfectly capable, but he did not feel inclined. He preferred composing to lecturing. But, however this may be, I flatter myself that I was one of those with whom he was fond of conversing upon Art. The conversations between us which I now publish, do not, it is true, appear in exactly their original form. What, in some cases, is here given continuously, I was obliged to catch up at very distant moments of the conversation.

As we were walking together on one occasion, we happened to speak about "school," and the contempt with which people now (i. e. then) began to speak of it, as a drag on genius.

"This opinion" said Mendelssohn, bursting out, "is an insult both to reason and experience!—What signification do such persons attach to the word 'school'? Let a man possess the very greatest musical genius—can he compose without a knowledge of the accords and the laws for their connection? Can he form a piece of music, without having studied the laws of form? Can he harmonize with instrumental accompaniments, without possessing a knowledge of instruments or a varied experience of their inexhaustible combinations? And is not all this 'school'?"

"Perhaps," interrupted I, "they do not allude, when designating 'school' a drag, to the technical facts that you adduce, but rather to the æsthetical nonsense, which does not advance the artist, but actually confuses him by its opposite demands, and may certainly lame his powers of creation."

"No, no!" continued Mendelssohn. "They mean this same technical 'school.' I could name persons who afterwards sought in secret the thing they formerly despised, because they remarked that, with their genius, they only produced stupid trash."

"Again, in an æsthetic point of view—can anyone, without knowing what does, in music, produce anything beautiful? Why do I alter a passage? Because it does not please me. Why does it not please me? Because it sins against some æsthetical law, which I have learnt from the study of the best models. If I did not know this law, I should not perceive the defect, but consider the passage a good passage. Name me only one really great master, not in music alone but in any other art, who has not most diligently gone through the 'school,' both technically and æsthetically speaking. When we have to lament the deficiencies in any celebrated artist, as is sometimes the case, what do we say? He wants technical knowledge, or he is deficient in a perfectly certain insight into Art—in a word, he is deficient in school. It would never enter the head of any painter, sculptor, or architect to regard 'school' as an obstacle—a drag on genius. How comes it then that so many musicians entertain this stupid idea?"

"You must confess, however," I replied, "that many an artist is completely master of 'school,' and yet does not create any important work of Art, while many, who are very deficient in it, produce great things."

"Ay, that is true," answered Mendelssohn, "'school' cannot make talent, and, therefore, is of no use to him who does not possess the latter; but to make me believe that a man without 'school' can produce anything reasonable, you must give me proofs, for I myself know none. A man may display talent, without possessing 'school,' but do not let him think of ever producing a true work of Art. 'What a pity,' people say, 'that such and such an artist has studied so little,' or 'possesses so little real insight into Art. How much more important his works would have been, had he only learnt more.' Persons, whose talent has, from want of study, never come to anything, invented this phrase to console themselves for the reproaches of their own conscience, and other idlers adopted it after them."

II.

"How does it happen," Mendelssohn asked me on a subsequent occasion, "that you have become still as a composer? It strikes me that, for some years past, you have not published anything.—That is a great mistake, as I have already told you. Your power of production can scarcely have been exhausted as yet, I should say?"

"Perhaps not," I replied. "But the wish for production is. A single opinion in a critical journal has frightened me, I believe, forever, from composing, because, unfortunately, it struck me as just."

"The deuce! And pray," enquired Mendelssohn, smiling, "what was this opinion?"

"He possesses talent," I replied, "but will never strike out any new path."

"Hem! And did that frighten you?" he asked.

"Certainly," I replied. "I found that everything I composed not only did not excel the best that was already written, but did not even come up to it by a good deal. I now, it is true, endeavored to rise; I determined to write, from the first to the last idea, in a particularly original manner, and with the most unexpected beauty. But my imagination would not furnish what I demanded. It did not present me with a single thought that satisfied my heavy demands, or should have struck me as a pilgrim in a new path, and so the pen fell from my hand, and I gave up the task."

"Yes—yes," said Mendelssohn, "I know what you mean. When you begin a composition you have a very grand idea of what you are about—and what you are determined—to produce. The thoughts, for which you commence searching, are, in your dark presentiment of them, all far more beautiful than when they afterwards stand out upon paper. I once experienced a similar feeling, but I soon recovered myself. If we were only to adopt those thoughts which completely come up to our wishes, we should produce either nothing at all, or merely very little. From this motive I have even frequently thrown on one side and not finished works which I had begun."

"That proves nothing, however," I replied.—"All artists have left torsos behind them, in consequence of perceiving they had made a mistake."

"That may be," replied Mendelssohn. "Such unfinished works used to depress me very much, and render me very timid about commencing another. I regretted the time that I had spent in vain. I was not, therefore, long in coming to a decision—I have made myself a solemn promise never to abandon a work once commenced, but on the contrary, to finish every one, however it may turn out. If it does not prove a work of Art in the higher acceptance of the expression, it is, at any rate, an exercise in shaping and rendering ideas. This is the reason why I have composed so many things which have never been printed, and which never shall be."

"Yes, yes," I replied, "I could certainly produce a great many works like those of the last kind, but those which would appear to me as successful, and as striking out a new path, would be wanting. Again, it is not everyone who can work as you do, without troubling himself as to whether what he is engaged on will bring him in anything or not. A person like myself, on whose pen the existence of his family mostly depends, commits a sin if he writes a single stroke without the hope of recompense. It is laudable to sacrifice one's self as an artist, but it is wrong to make a family suffer for it."

"Granted—unreservedly," exclaimed Mendelssohn eagerly, "if a man renounces artistry from a deliberate conviction of the insufficiency of his artistic skill. Your reason for not writing, however, simply because you cannot strike out a new path, is—with all respect—not reasonable."

[Here follow the remarks about "new paths" cited by MARX in the piece translated in our last number.—ED.]

III.

ON another occasion, I asked him if he could explain a point which for me was very important.

"I have been informed," I said, "that you make a great many alterations in your works, even up to the moment you hand over the manuscript. Unfortunately, I do the same, and, in fact, a great deal worse, for I cannot name a single production of mine in which I have not found, after it was printed, many passages with which I was discontented, and for which I had hit upon some far superior idea, when it was no longer time to suppress them."

Mendelssohn was peculiar for two kinds of smile. The one was inimitably amiable, and played over his features in a quiet contented moment; the other, which was slightly tinged with quiet sarcasm, used to distinguish him when he had to find fault with anything that was not quite bad enough to make him actually angry, which, by the way, he very seldom was, or which, as an accomplished gentleman, he had learnt how to suppress.

"The misfortune of which you complain certainly happens to me as well as to yourself," he said; "I have erased quite as much as I have left of my writings. Let us console ourselves by thinking of the greatest masters, who were not a whit better off in this respect. Ah! would that it were only weak passages which that cunning conjuror, Imagination, smuggles past our judgment on to the paper! But she plays me worse tricks than that. She sometimes seduces me into writing down a whole piece that, at some subsequent period, I cannot help acknowledging to be very poor stuff! Out of twelve songs that I collected, I thought that only six were worth printing, and, therefore, threw away the other six. My Paul originally contained a third more pieces than it now does, but they are never destined to see the light of day. What say you to that?" he asked with a sarcastic smile.

"That, in all probability, you are too severe towards the offspring of your own mind," I replied. "Many would deem themselves fortunate if they had written and could publish what you reject."

"I am very much obliged to you for your good opinion," said Mendelssohn, laughing, "but I do not agree with it. I can adduce another and still better reason for keeping back my compositions, and one which will put the subject in a clearer light. I believe in the motto, Nulla dies sine linea. I do not often let a day elapse without writing something. But on what artist does the Muse always smile? Not on me, at any rate. I can always write something, however, and I do so, in order to keep myself in practice. Just as the virtuoso loses in technical skill and certainty, if he abandons his instrument for any length of time, mental operations lose a portion of their light, easy character, if you often neglect to practice. In order to keep myself up to the mark, I am always composing, but the mind is not invariably ready with good gifts. Do not, however, believe that—as might appear from what has fallen from me—I am contented with all that I print. Such is not the case. There is a very great deal that affords me but little satisfaction, and that I immediately feel to be nothing special."

"Supposing this to be so," I said, "why do you act as you do, since pecuniary considerations cannot be the cause? I always thought it the most lamentable part of an artist's fate, that he is obliged to create for mere bread."

"There are other reasons for the artist who sees the world as it really is," rejoined Mendelssohn.

"I should like to know what they are," I replied, with a feeling of curiosity.

"The world forgets very easily," observed Mendelssohn, "and that is something which the artist, who has once engaged in public life, must endeavor to prevent, by continually publishing new works. His name must not be wanting in any Messverzeichniss.^{*} In every fresh one it must again catch the eye of the public, for a long time elapses before the public will bite. Composers are becoming more and more numerous. If they disappear a few years out of the musical catalogues, they are lost, because forgotten."

"That is very true," I replied, "and the public is, perhaps, not quite in the wrong. We may presume that, if a man remains long idle, without publishing anything, the impulse of production and power of creation cannot be very strong and rich in him."

"Such is the case," said Mendelssohn; "and since the artist is not successful in every work, but yet always wishes to prove himself productive, he may, and must, occasionally, in order to retain his position, let something weaker than the rest slip out. If the thing is nothing particular, he at least shows that he works hard, and hopes are entertained that he will produce something better the next time. You forgive a man, in whom you take an interest, if by chance he is ill-tempered, or short in his manner, but you become indifferent about him, if he visits you too seldom, while, finally, you do not care about him at all, if he stops away altogether."

Music the Exponent of Emotion.

Of music it may be emphatically said that "it hath its own world." To those whose musical education, growth and development have given birth to that inner life, which may justly be termed the realm of tone, the communications of tone-thought are readily laid open. Emotions, germinating and ripening within that inner life of melody, always find a ready sympathy among those in whom corresponding emotions exist.

In this correspondent feeling of separate minds, which music discloses, we can trace a nearer resemblance to language than by any process of analogical description. And may we not here be allowed to inquire whether two distinct minds pass through the same train of emotions, or whether they feel similarly, on hearing the same musical theme? Written language can bring about a similarity of feeling in a great degree, although its best attempts are but imperfect in carrying out such a design. Painting does not effect an identity of perception or feeling in the minds of the observer, for if it did, criticism would be laid low, and its professors would be, in point of numbers, a diminutive body. And Music, from the very fact that criticism assumes to itself such a wide range of thought and exhibits such extreme departures from the same point of observation, cannot be said to awaken an identity of emotion in any greater degree than the other sister Arts. When she is said to awaken into life and action certain preconceived forms of emotional fancy, without addressing the hearer in language expressive of those forms, she may be said to have the truest revelation of her actual being laid open to us. The human myriads resemble each other, not in the structure of each individual fancy, but in the degrees of emotion, and it is these degrees which Music represents. She never speaks by detail of sentiment, but only by degree.

She re-awakens every individual's past and dormant history in a living picture of reality, not by enumerating the joys or sorrows of which he may have been a partaker, but by rousing up the flame of emotion on which all the characteristic events of the heart's annals rest. In complying with the laws and requisitions of rhythm, which may be said to be her mere outward form, she sympathizes with the physiological or outward organization of every human mind; for the soul, when it feels and gives expression to its feelings, may be said to disclose itself by rhythm. Hence, when Music makes her first introduction, her easiest ingress is by this warmth of graceful and expressive rhythm. On this she lays the whole superstructure of her vast infinitude of forms and groupings of form, called into being and spread out like endless crystallizations, perfect in each distinct part and as a whole. In her plainest rhythmical attire, the emotions she finds to sympathize in common with herself are soft, subdued and tender, like those awakened by the Andantes of Haydn. When her creations diverge into those vast crystallizations, as we have termed them, they are found embodied in the modern school of instrumentation, where the tender harmonies of the older schools are replaced by the vagueness and bizarrie of the new.

We are wont to view many of the new phases of a recent instrumentation as a falling off from old classical simplicity and beauty; yet music cannot be said to degenerate by undergoing all these new developments of form. The primitive rhythmical feeling, shown in earlier tone productions, remains as a substratum to all new melodious thought, but the clothing, or exterior coloring, speaking metaphorically, undergoes new changes and receives new additions.

When all the many-hued coruscations, thrown out by the pyrotechnics of tone and sound, tire the imagination, the inventor falls back into the simplicity of the pale light, which is the soul's natural unexcited rhythm.

In modern poetry the analogy of pyrotechnics is equally applicable, there being added to the simple rhythm all the exuberance of cultivated and developed thought, surrounding the mind with the brilliancy of conceptions that have their concrete type in the phenomena of Roman lights, sky rockets and particolored spheres of dazzling fire.

In conceding to Music her own world, we must look for her power in that exposition of feeling, for which there is no other adequate representation in writing, painting or sculpture. Except by the application of metaphor, to further description, she possesses no concrete forms, and in the attempt at a tone-painting of all material scenes, we have to substitute for intellectual thought a mere cardiac sensation, and, in many instances, confound one with the other.

For in outward phenomena, emotion is not the sole medium of description; the thoughtful and creative mind itself must show the grandeur, beauty and impressiveness of all external appearances by the detail of facts.

That Music can show these we must utterly deny.

In passing from the visible world to that of tone, we are made sensible of the fine line of demarcation that is drawn between them; and so nearly are the various phases of emotion, growing out of them, drawn together, that we are prone to imagine that we can realize both at one time. Hence all the spirituality that springs out of the study of the magic of nature finds its way into, and incorporates itself with the inventions of tone-thought. It is here that we must look for the origin of names of musical compositions, where the locality is given in place of the degree of feeling engendered there.

We have said that her world was her own; hence, too, her nomenclature springs out of herself. As her whole being is an abstraction, she admits of no description out of herself by an alliance with concrete forms.

It is true that, where Music is said to represent the history of passions, or the exciting drama of a whole rise and fall of human hopes, loves and hatreds, she may be regarded as descriptive; yet that faculty we have already supposed a doubtful one, as scarcely a single tone-combination can be found, illustrative of one passion, which could not be made use of as illustrative of another, and on this ground, all description bases its force and its truth. From what source then, are we to obtain means of description for the performances of musical genius? Solely by dwelling so long within the sphere of musical thought, as to imbue the mind with the characteristics of each individual, on whom has descended the wreath of musical fame.

All rhythm springs from the same common impulse of our humanity, but the ornaments of tone bring it up before us in a thousand shapes, and each individual mind possesses its idiosyncrasy of tone-emotion.

Thus many striking passages of acknowledged repute, instead of being regarded as the representatives of passion, or the exponents of certain grades of emotion, should, more justly, be identified as being in the vein of ROSSINI, MOZART or BEETHOVEN.

By this means we can grope our way out of a logical darkness into the sunlight of a musical truth. Such a reform in musical aesthetics would, in a considerable degree, clip the wings of fancy, that gives rise to so much vague and incomprehensible writing on the subject; yet it would answer the better purpose of establishing the science on the higher ground of truth.

Indeed, if we look into Art criticism, we find that many of its usages are open to the same correction, the vagueness of descriptive thought having no other origin, than in the brain of the critic himself, who is apt to take his own stand-point, as the only true one.

We presume to say that in pictorial Art, each original thinker lays as distinct an impress upon his works, as does the composer; hence his name should, in all cases, enter in among the terms of description. A successful attempt at the supposed inimitable coloring and divine facial beauty of TITIAN might appropriately be termed Titian-like, and thus express more than any other definition. What we are accustomed to term the profound or the grand harmonies of Beethoven, might, in their successful imitation, more justly be termed Beethoven-like, thus affording the reader the true definition, in place of a fanciful analysis.

(Conclusion next week.)

The Russians in Covent Garden.

("L'ETOILE DU NORD.")

From Punch.

The Russians are victorious; we are fairly beaten, and it is nothing more than common candor to own our discomfiture. Mr. Gye has been the prime means of introducing the Muscovites into the very heart of the metropolis; and, whether we will or no, we must own their mastery. We will, however, as plainly as our emotion will permit us, give a brief narrative of the catastrophe.

On the evening of the 19th July, between seven and eight, it was plain that an attack was to be made. The Russians had, by some means, taken possession of Covent Garden Theatre. The English, however, thronging the house, resolved to dispute the ground, inch by inch.

At eight o'clock precisely, General Costa, with his truncheon in hand, rode into the orchestra, and was received with heavy rounds, which he encountered with the self-possession and true modesty of a true hero. The orchestra opened from the overture battery, and never did we witness such power, such brilliancy and precision of fire. They carried all before them.

The fight raged from half-past eight—with but two brief intervals—until nearly a quarter to one, when the star of Russia—La Stella del Nord—was hailed as star triumphant. It is impossible for us—although subdued and led away captive by the power of Field-Marshal Meyerbeer, to suppress the expression of our admiration, our veneration of that genius of that little, great man (for in corporeal presence we think he hardly tops Napoleon or Wellington.) The subdued people flung bouquets and garlands at his feet—the giant of music!

But how admirably was the genius of the General seconded by the genius of his forces! Prodigious was the energy of Pietro Miccaeffo Formes; magnificent the power of the Cossack Corporal Gritzenko Lablache (he fought on foot, we can therefore give no idea of the horse that could carry him.) How gracefully, how skilfully did Danilowitz Gardoni bring up his forces—setting them in the most brilliant array!

Especially mighty in their grace and sweetness were the Amazons who took the field. How shall we describe Caterina Bosio, flashing hither and thither, and, wherever she appeared, subduing and taking prisoner all about her. And then, that Prascovia Marai—with an innocent face, a face like a tower, yet so invincible wherever she appeared. Unerring sharpshooters were the vivandières, Ekimona Bauer and Natalia Rudersdorff—picking off unerringly whatever they aimed at.

Finally, the triumph of the Russians at Covent Garden is all to nothing the greatest victory the Russians have had in the present war. There can be no doubt that Generalissimo Gye will "sack" all London.

Among the distinguished visitors who were present at this Russian victory, we noticed the earl of Aberdeen, Mr. Gladstone, and Messrs. Cobden, Bright, and Milner Gibson. We heard that Lord John Russell occupied a box, but, if so, he sat so far back in the shadow that we cannot say we conscientiously saw him.

DROLL BLUNDERS.—The London Musical World cites the following specimen of French musical criticism, which, with the said World's comments, will amuse our readers.

M. ETIENNE EGGIS—a correspondent of our contemporary, L'Europe Artiste—writing from Munich, while displaying a highly commendable enthusiasm for the late Mendelssohn Bartholdy, falls into some inexactitudes which it may be as well, as our neighbors say, to "relever." Alluding to a performance of the Antigone of Sophocles, with Mendelssohn's music, M. Eggis says:—

"Last week we had a spectacle quite new to a Parisian—and to myself, although I am only half a Parisian.—This was the Antigone of Sophocles, translated by J. J. C. Donner, with the magnificent music of Mendelssohn Bartholdy. The mise-en-scène was correct to a degree unknown in France. It was the antique tragedy in all its grandiose simplicity, faithful in everything to tradition. But alas!—Kings depart, and without the superb music of Mendelssohn Bartholdy the spectacle would have been one of profound ennui. While M. Dahn (Créon, King of Thebes), Mlle. Damböck (Antigone), etc., etc., were burning their lips with the difficult interpretation of old Sophocles, and the implacable word of ancient fatalism hung over the audience either astonished or bored, I was dreaming of that young man of genius, that Beethoven who died before maturity, called Mendelssohn Bartholdy—a poor eaglet that consumed itself! Dead at an age when others begin—at twenty-seven, I believe! Mendelssohn Bartholdy, who wrote Paulus, A Midsummer Night's Dream, and that sublime oratorio which bears the name of Elias—Elias, which Mendelssohn Bartholdy composed at the age of nineteen! This work is now the property of the Kapellmeister at Ratisbon, M. Mettenleiter, who received it from the dying Mendelssohn on condition that he should never allow it to be copied. Elias, to my knowledge, has never been executed but once—at Ratisbon. It demands 99 executants, and 300 chorus. Mendelssohn, had he lived, would, perhaps, have been greater than Beethoven!"

If M. Etienne Eggis should take it in his head to pay England a visit (in company with Meyerbeer) about the end of next month, he will have an opportunity of hearing the masterpiece of Mendelssohn at the Birmingham Festival, for which great meeting it was, as we all know, composed, and at which it was first performed, under the direction of the composer himself, in September, 1846—the year before his death.

Our capital allies are not very amply informed about Mendelssohn and his works. We may therefore, with the best good feeling, instruct an intelligent camerader (whose enthusiasm we devoutly share) about certain points with which our readers are thoroughly familiar, and for alluding to which they will no doubt excuse us. Felix Mendelssohn Bartholdy was born in 1809, and died in 1847; so that he was in his 39th year when he quitted this world—instead of being twenty-seven, as M. Eggis has been misinformed. The oratorio of Elijah (Elias), his last completed great work, was composed in 1846, when Mendelssohn was thirty-seven—that is, nearly twice the age M. Eggis gives him. It has been performed in various parts of Great Britain, including the metropolis of England, many hundreds of times, and has attained a popularity equal to that enjoyed by the immortal Messiah of Händel. We never before heard of M. Mettenleitner, the Ratisbon Kapellmeister, to whose care it was committed by the composer “on his death-bed.” The story is inexplicable, since Elijah has been played in nearly all the great musical towns of Germany, in spite of the Schumannshändler, and Lisztshändler, and the Wagnersbändler. Italy and France alone are unacquainted with it. Even the Yankees over the Atlantic know it by heart. (Ask Mr. Dwight of Boston.) We can only, therefore, come to one conclusion—namely, that M. Eggis must refer to the Reformation Symphony, which the four misguided men at Leipsic, who persist in burking the correspondence and the MSS. of the illustrious composer, so obstinately withhold from the world, and which was once performed at Ratisbon.

It is also rather strange that M. Eggis, who is “half a Parisian,” should not be aware that a French version of Antigone, with Mendelssohn's music, was many years ago executed (literally) at the Odeon, in Paris, when M. Bocage played Créon.

Musical One-Idea-ism.

Our friend “Counterpoint” still continues his “Hints concerning Church Music” in the Transcript. He set out famously. From the brave and trenchant manner in which he showed up the mockery of the modern trade of psalm-book making, and his witty satire of many of the frivolities and affectations of fashionable styles of music, we had hopes of him. But we are sorry to find, as he goes on, the ultimate drift of all his argument is to a very narrow one-idea-ism. He recognizes but just one school of music as at all worthy or legitimate, and that a school known only in one country, and within one church or sect. One little isolated group of old composers, like a group of islands seldom visited in a remote part of the broad ocean of musical history, are to him the centre and circumference of the proper world of music. His notions are most clearly summed up in his last number, which we are tempted to copy almost entire, partly for the quaintness of the thing, and the many incidental good things said in it, and partly as affording texts for a few very brief comments—merest hints, as any full discussion of the points involved would fill several numbers of our Journal.

HINTS CONCERNING CHURCH MUSIC. No. VI.

* * * The fulsome and indiscriminate adulation heaped upon foreign compositions, musicians and teachers, during the past five years, is not without an example. About a century and a quarter ago, Farinelli, a handsome and very celebrated Italian singer, captivated half the women in London; and, during the performance of a certain song, one of them gave vent to the following impious ejaculation: “One God, one Farinelli!” This event has been satirized by Hogarth in his “Rake's Progress.”—Farinelli is there represented on a sort of throne or altar, upon which are depicted several hearts pierced with arrows. At the foot of this altar a female is kneeling and presenting her heart, whilst the above-named ejaculation proceeds from her mouth.

Let us now glance at that hybrid species of music, the masses of Haydn and Mozart.

“They are (says Jebb) the genuine offspring of the opera, though trained by a hand of greater strength than is to be found in the more modern Italian school, (the encouragement of which is on many most serious grounds a disgrace to the English nation), and deeply versed in the most hidden resources of an exquisite melody. But there is an exaggerated expression of sentiment foreign to our national character, and inconsistent with its manly strength. They are in a style neither ecclesiastical nor English.”

Mozart had the misfortune to live in a secular age. His reputation and his living depended on his popularity at court, and to be out of favor there was a fatal disaster. His new and brilliant instrumentation was eagerly seized upon as a fitting adjunct to the gay pageantries of popery.

“In the Roman choirs, (continues Jebb,) the secularism of modern times has introduced theatrical singers into a gallery, to execute that operatic style of music, which has very much superseded the school of Palestrina and Allegri. Rome has heinously transgressed ancient practice in grave matters, whilst in the particular of sacred music she has sinned against the decorum of public worship more grievously than any church upon earth. The services of Passion week at Rome have degenerated into a mere spectacle, which people go to hear and see from exactly the same motives that send them to the opera.”

Modern masses depend very much upon tawdry instrumental effects, and require the aid of an orchestra. They are peculiarly adapted to the Latin tongue, and are part and parcel of the sensuality of popery. There are in Boston certain young men and women who go about o' nights singing masses in unknown tongues. If such persons think that they are doing anything for the improvement of church music, they are most sadly mistaken. On the other hand, if they seek only amusement and vocal exercise, how much more rational to use the fine old English glees and madrigals, or the fine old contrapuntal church compositions by the best English masters. Here the words combine with the music in the promotion and refinement of all the generous sentiments, and the noble and devout impulses of the heart.

Nothing can be more absurd than for an Englishman (or American) to study Italian song, unless he be first well instructed in English singing, or unless he intends to forsake his mother tongue altogether. To intone the English language well, is an art requiring careful study and practice, whilst almost any person who can open his mouth may sing Italian. The singing of English requires that smart and expert action of the lips and tongue which is necessary for the quick and distinct articulation of the consonants without interfering with the vowels, and to which the Italian and German are entirely opposed. We may all call to mind certain cases, amongst our female vocalists especially, where the almost exclusive study of German or Italian song has entirely unfitted them for the articulation of English. The common remark in such cases is, that “she sings as if her mouth was full of pudding.” The great desideratum in Boston at the present time, is a thorough teacher of English singing, which we have not had since the death of that perfect master, John Paddon.

A writer in Dwight's Journal of Music complains of the indistinctness of musical utterance with some of our popular vocalists, “inasmuch that one might be led to conjecture that the use of singing was to stifle words.” No doubt; but is not this a strange complaint, coming as it does from a source which denies the existence of any English school of music? Who can ever forget the greatness of expression, the largeness of style, the wonderful effect, which characterized the singing of those famous exponents of the English school, Braham, Phillips and Anna Bishop. What, “no English school, but only singers of English?” What can such an opinion be worth, when it comes from a person who professes his ignorance of English church music; of that which is the very head and front of all music, and in which Handel took great delight; indeed, he was an Englishman in everything save the accident of birth.

Handel, in contrast with Mozart, had not only the advantage of a maturer age and a riper judgment, but he had also the good fortune to write for English ears and for the devout English mind. At the age of about forty years he gave up the Italian opera, and turned his attention to the sacred Oratorio; “a pursuit, which was better suited,” as he himself used to declare, “to the circumstances of a man advancing in years, than that of adapting music to such vain and trivial poetry as the musical drama is generally made to consist of.”

“Handel, (says Mr. Hogarth, in his recent Survey of Music) was the greatest of musicians; and it is not more probable that the lustre of his name shall be dimmed by age, or impaired by a successful rivalry, than that any such thing shall befall the names of Homer, Milton, or Michael Angelo. Since his day, indeed, music, in some respects, has been progressive. But the music of the church, the noblest branch of the Art, has remained unchanged for generations, and will probably remain unchanged for generations to come. Founded on the great principles of harmony, established by the ecclesiastical composers of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, it is constructed of materials over which time has small power; and the few ornaments which may be applied to it by the varying taste of different ages, can but slightly affect the aspect of its massive and colossal structure. Compared to this, accordingly, all other kinds of music appear to be fleeting and ephemeral. In every country it is the oldest music that is extant; and in our own, the walls of our cathedrals may still re-echo the sacred strains of Gibbons and Tallis, Purcell and Boyce, after all the profane music that has been produced, from their days to our own, shall have been swept away. It is on this foundation that Handel has built the stupendous choruses of his oratorios. Their duration is independent of the mutability of taste or fashion. They make the same impression now as when they were heard for the first time; and will continue to act on the mind with undiminished power so long as the great principles of human nature shall remain unchanged.”

“In England, (says another writer) Dr. Tye had the merit, even before the time of Palestrina, of abandoning, in some of his compositions, the artificial and complicated methods of his day; and Tallis, Byrd, Gibbons, and others, during the Elizabethan age, profiting by his works and those of Palestrina, succeeded in bringing ecclesiastical music to a state of grandeur, simplicity and purity, which has never been surpassed.

It is singular that English composers alone should, down to the present day, have adhered to the exclusive ecclesiastical style; but to this distinction they are unquestionably entitled; and it may well console us for our admitted inferiority in music of a theatrical and miscellaneous nature.”

“Our music (continues Hogarth) consecrated to religion, retains the grand and solemn harmony of the old masters. It admits none of those light and tripping measures, which, in the words of Pope,

“Make the soul dance upon a jig to Heaven.” or rather draw it down from those heavenly contemplations which religious music ought to inspire, and fill the mind with thoughts of trifling amusements. England is thus entitled to boast that her cathedral music is superior to that of any other country, and that while the music of the church in Italy, and even Germany, has degenerated, ours retains the solemn grandeur of the olden time.”

“A great people who possess the instinct of great things!” exclaimed Hector Berlioz, after attending a choral festival at St. Paul's; “the soul of Shakespeare is in them!”

COUNTERPOINT.

1. There is one obvious criticism upon the whole of this. The writer proceeds on the theory that the Almighty created Music for the exclusive benefit of the Episcopal Church of England, and without any reference to the rest of us heretics and heathens. He really makes a mere religious question of it. What suits the peculiar service, the peculiar idea of the English Church, is the true sacred music, and there is properly no other. The music that grew out of that church in that inspired moment of the English mind, called the Elizabethan age,—the music of Tallis, Byrd, &c., answers best that end, and therefore must forevermore remain the model or the fountain head of all true music. Whatever the merits of those old masters, such exclusive veneration will hardly find sympathy among the best music-lovers even in that church, to say nothing of out-siders, for whom also Music in its various forms has sometimes proved itself a quickening, elevating divine gift. And is it not the very divinity of Music that it is a universal language, that it appeals to the universal heart, that it cannot in its very nature be sectarian, but is a medium for communion in those highest aspirations, purest, deepest and immortal passions, which underlie all souls in common, constituting our religious nature and making us children of one family?—But a few notes on specialities.

2. The writer makes a strange use of the term "foreign", as applied to music. Everything that is not English, forsooth, is foreign. But if our idea of music be right, it can have no "foreign" and no "native." In good music, whether Yankee or Italian be the first inspired with it, the heart is everywhere at home. Words require translation; but melody and harmony do not.—Musically, the works of Byrd and Tallis are as foreign to us, Americans, as any music from the continent of Europe; and more so, since they have had less power to penetrate among us and prove themselves belonging to us. Again, the idea that any compositions are "adulated" because they happen to be "foreign", is a mere bugbear of the Contrapuntal imagination. Depend upon it, music here and everywhere is praised and sought for simply because people like it, because it pleases or inspires.

3. Next to the Yankee psalmists, "Counterpoint's" especial object of aversion seems to be the Masses of Haydn and Mozart. In one view this is merely English Episcopacy versus Roman Episcopacy; and from the purely musical standpoint one must ignore the issue. The real pertinent question is: Are these Masses good music? Are they solemn? are they elevating? Does the spirit of Christian tenderness, love, faith, penitence and joy pervade them? Does the soul's deepest religious experience find expression in them? Are they in harmony with holy feelings, thoughts and purposes? Ask those who know, from the experience of their own souls, and if they answer yes, what matter pray, that they are a less plain and austere style of music than that which this critic loves so dearly and we dare say so justly? What if the species be "hybrid", that is to say, not wholly according to any old model, but blended of several species and in part new altogether? What if it be in some sense an offspring of the opera? The opera has its faults, has been the nursery of much frivolity and affectation and poor sentimentality and false effect; yet who does not know that in the opera Music first became emancipated from the mechanical fetters of priestly ordinance and dry contrapuntal formula; that in the opera Music first attained to freedom, first became an Art, became inspired? All Art, if it teaches anything, teaches the reconciliation of the sacred and the secular, the blending and perfect marriage of the spiritual and the material; and one may experience religious emotions during an opera or a symphony sometimes, as well as in a temple; the Spirit cannot be confined to forms or places; the church may borrow from the opera, the opera from the church sometimes, to good advantage. We have heard much church music that dragged us down to earth and idleness, and much secular music that lifted our thoughts up and made us strong. Who has not? Therefore the fact that Mozart made his Masses pleasing, that he employed the new resources of the opera and of the orchestra to give more expression, more variety, more adaptation to the changing play of sentiment, more beauty, is nothing in itself against them, provided that he wrote not in a frivolous mood, from vanity, and provided that the music is really solemnizing and inspiring. Now we do maintain, and thousands with us, that these Masses, although sometimes, in certain passages, open to the charge of being too light and ornamental (especially Haydn's) are in the main solemnizing and inspiring. Take Mozart's 12th Mass, which is perhaps the most familiar. Is not the Kyrie solemn and religious? Are not the Qui tollis and the Crucifixus overwhelmingly, profoundly grand? And are not the Gloria and Resurrexit full of that triumphant joy which ought to be the normal temper and complexion of the religious mind? And why call the orchestration "tawdry"? Is it not beautiful, expressive, often grand? Does it not give fuller scope to the real inspiration of the music, so that it does its work more perfectly?

The slur at those young persons who unite in little clubs for practising mass music, is gratuitous. Of course they do it with no view to the improvement of church music. May they not sing for any other purpose? Is it not enough that they find pleasure in it, that they find musical culture, spiritual excitement, joy and strength in it? that they find this music a medium of sweet communion? Here is a music good and admirable in its way: it is well that any who are so disposed should organize such simple means for making themselves acquainted with it. Your Gibbons and Tallis are also good in their way—at least you think them so,—let clubs be formed for making acquaintance with them also. We long to know them, since you say so much about them. But if they are really such great music, then they are too great to be confined within a given church, even as the Masses of Mozart and Beethoven and Cherubini are greater than the Roman Church; that is, they belong to Humanity, to the universal heart, and we should like to claim our portion of the common birthright in their blessing. So of Palestrina and the old Italian school; we long, by clubs or otherwise, to penetrate into the heart of that. But not as something Italian or something English, not as Protestant or Catholic, but as something that is musical and human, as something truly inspired by genius, something conceived in the spirit of high Art, and which allies the earthly with the heavenly, the human with the divine.

There are more points we would touch upon, which we must leave to the next time.

The Musical Conventions.

I. MR. SOUTHARD'S MUSIC.

One of the most interesting events connected with the "Conventions", if not the most interesting, was the first production of some MSS. compositions of magnitude, by our young townsman, Mr. L. H. SOUTHARD. We have several times had occasion to speak of Mr. Southard as one of the most earnest, thinking and profound students of the Art and Science of Music, that we have among us, and of the happy promise of several of his smaller efforts in the way of composition. The rumor that he had been grappling with the difficulties of an orchestral score, and that he was engaged in the composition of a serious opera, with the dialogue in recitative, although in English, has excited not a little expectation among those who know the man. On Saturday evening, by arrangement with the Convention, an orchestra, led by Mr. ECKHARDT, was collected at the Tremont Temple, and the first part of the concert of that evening was devoted to the performance of two concert overtures and portions of the unfinished opera: "The Scarlet Letter", by Mr. Southard, the young composer himself using this first opportunity to try his hand as a conductor, as it was also his first chance of hearing how any music he had written for an orchestra would actually sound. A very large and eager public was assembled, and the first appearance of the composer was greeted with the most enthusiastic and encouraging applause, the warmth whereof did not abate as piece after piece was heard and found good. It is not too much to say that it was the most decided and legitimate success that has yet come within our knowledge in the history of American efforts at musical composition in large forms.

The first piece was a concert overture in A, entitled "Night in the Forest". It was an overture after the Mendelssohn form and general structure; conceived somewhat too in a kindred spirit with those romantic, dreamy overtures, tone-pictures of Nature, or rather tone-translations of the sentiment of Nature. Occasionally ideas, melodic themes, and modulations pleasantly reminded you of Mendelssohn. They were by no means literal imitations, or borrowings in any sense; but simply showed what no young and susceptible musical nature in our day probably could escape, some traces of the influence of the loved composer. Which of our poets bears no marks of Wordsworth, Tennyson or Goethe? This overture has ideas—ideas that seem genuine, original and interesting. A poetic feeling pervades the whole.—There is progress and agreeable variety and contrast in the movements. The sombre, musing introduction, as of the soul seeking and finding communion with Night and Nature; the spirited and swelling march, like the swelling of the breast of genius, as it begins to feel itself, in its inspired hour (were you not reminded of the finale of the "Scotch Symphony"); the quaint and merry little theme that then springs up, and haunts you all along, as phrases are repeated from one and another group of instruments, like the joyous tune that genius might be humming to itself when fairly up to the creative pitch; all arrest and carry you along to a conclusion that does not disappoint.—Seldom have we noticed such unrelapsing attention to any but the best of the well-known overtures. But we ask pardon for interposing any fanciful interpretation of the overture; we do it simply to recall the points. The instrumentation was clear, euphonious, richly colored, with happy combinations and contrasts of the tone-masses, and showing an insight into the individual genius and means of performance of each instrument. Very violin-like was the long obligato passage for the first violins, interesting in itself and in the returns of little fragments of it in the working up. It was a matter of general surprise that a young composer for the first time should handle the orchestral forces as if he had long been at home among them. And the same might be said of his conducting—modest, quiet, courteous, but efficient; the musicians appeared happy both in the music and conductor. It was only to be regretted that the orchestra was not stronger in the string department, while some of the wind instruments were false or unreliable, and that there had not been more time for rehearsal. What time there was, however, had been well improved.

Next came a Scene and Air from the "Scarlet Letter", for soprano, the most elaborate of the selections from that opera, as indeed it well might be, since in this soliloquy of the heroine the key to the whole tragedy is contained. The author of the libretto, Mr. F. H. UNDERWOOD, of this city, seems in this and the following selections to have shown tact and judgment and a true poetic feeling in the dramatizing and condensing of HAWTHORNE'S story. The images are simple and to the point, the diction lyrical, and suited to the composer's purpose. These are the words:—

ANNA.—Ah, why came I to this pitiless clime? True I could but fly; for love shivered under those icy glances, and froze at the touch of that marble hand. No, Albert, it was enough for thee that I was thy shadow, near thee, silent, but never in sunshine. How was I to watch the drowsy cathedral clock all day, while beyond the city walls the birds were calling me, myself the airiest of them all?—or to tarry at midnight by the furnace, with its strange colored fires, while thou wast chasing the phantoms of alchemy? The dreams of romance and of music possessed me; and, most of all, my soul longed for love.

BUT, oh, the change! Love I have tasted. Delicious, maddening draught! Is it not worth the priceless pearl I have dissolved in it?

No, the past is sacred, but it returns no more. Now, shame and misery, ye are my only companions! Gloomy clouds bound my horizon. Fears hurry my pulses; not for myself, but for my child,—and for him, dearer a thousand times than the one I left. From Albert the wide ocean happily divides me. But he, though near, can no more glad my desolate heart. Never again may I rest my head on his dear breast. For love has been ours, and its memory is left to us both; but shame shall be mine alone.

Sealed from all mortal eyes,
Sacred from blame,
Deep in my heart it lies,
Deeper than shame.
O God on me bestow
All that thou wilt of woe,
Take from me life and light,
Still, still from human sight
Cover his name!

Mr. Southard has set these sentences with much dramatic power and feeling. The Recitative is truly expressive, varying with the emotions, and interesting; the pauses, filled with highly dramatic and richly colored bits of instrumentation, make the scene rather long; but this would doubtless justify itself in the scenic action. We confess we should not wish it shortened; some of those orchestral harmonies and modulations were mystical and almost Freyschütz-like, and others bright and rapturous as the theme required. The true office of recitative in holding up the words until they become transparent in the light of passion, where speech properly becomes music, was well fulfilled. The sweet and prayerful melody at the end, with delicate arpeggio accompaniment, was very beautiful and free from common-place sentimentality as well as from unmeaning bravura. We do not remember many such scenes in Italian opera, where music is so truly the exponent of passion without mannerism or exaggeration. Mr. Southard has evidently studied Gluck and Mozart, Cherubini and Spontini, not to say the recitative of Handel and of Mendelssohn (of whose "Elijah" we were once or twice reminded) not in vain. Mrs. J. H. LONG sang it admirably, showing a fine dramatic quality of voice and talent, and a most conscientious, thoughtful study of the music.

No. 3 was a bass solo from the same, of rather a trying character, in an energetic, manly style, and a sort of polonaise-like rhythm, which proved quite effective in the rendering of Mr. MOZART.

No. 4, also from the "Scarlet Letter", a Trio for soprano, tenor and bass, in more Italian, flowing style of melody, yet with certain characteristics of a stronger and less hacknied quality, and with a remarkably clear and euphonious piece of part-writing, proved the most popular of these selections, and a repetition was demanded. Mrs. LONG, Mr. LOW and Mr. MOZART sang it con amore and reaped a large share of the applause.

These were followed by another concert overture in F, "View from the Mountain". This was not at all suggestive of Mendelssohn, nor of any master in particular; but seemed the product of Mr. Southard's own thought and imagination. It is a work of more direct, onward movement than the one in A, compactly woven, with a rich pastoral coloring in much of the harmony, less easily recalled than the other, but not less interesting, and on the whole (as we suspect) the better composition of the two. We should like much to hear it again, and trust that means may be found ere long to give us a repetition of all these pieces, with the benefit of a more perfect orchestra and more rehearsal. For the result of the whole was (and we say it with sincere joy, as having waited long for inward leave to say a thing so pleasant; for no one will accuse us of having fallen into the idle trick of glorifying "native efforts" because they were native), the result was greatly to increase our confidence in Mr. Southard's sound practical musicianship and talent for dramatic and orchestral composition. We now look forward, with some assurance, to the hearing of an original American opera, which shall have positive merits, although it would be too much to hope that it should prove an exception to all first works and be without faults. Defects there may be also in the overtures referred to, of which no one probably is quite so well aware as the composer. But there was success enough to warrant us in giving him joy of his debut in so high a character.

The second part of the concert consisted of grand choruses from "Samson", the "Messiah", &c., sung by the choir of the Convention, quite effectively, and a couple of Mr. MORGAN'S brilliant feats of organ-playing, the whole opened by a tasteful voluntary from Mr. WILLCOX.

2. ORATORIO.—The Convention at the Music Hall, under Mr. B. F. BAKER, opened its series of five evening concerts with a performance of Haydn's "Creation" on Sunday evening. The chorus was small for the place, about fifty or sixty voices, but remarkably efficient. For orchestra there was simply a quartet of strings, eked out with flute, clarinet and double-bass, principally by the MENDELSSOHN QUINTETTE CLUB, which gave a more vivid outline sketch of Haydn's picturesque instrumentation, than one would have supposed. Mr. CUTLER played the organ. Such fragments as we heard at different parts of the evening, were very successfully rendered and gave the impression that the whole was "going well". The solos were generally creditable, some quite superior. Miss BOTHAMLY and Mr. WILD in the music of Eve and Adam, Mr. BALL, in the tenor, a very sweet and fine voiced lady (whose name we did not learn) in "With verdure clad", made their parts highly acceptable to a really crowded and apparently intelligent audience. The trios were excellent.

3. MISCELLANEOUS CONCERTS. On Monday, Tuesday, Wednesday and Thursday evenings the Music Hall was gay with great numbers of well-pleased listeners, at low prices, to musical medleys, composed of choruses by the large and well-drilled choir of Mr. BAKER'S Convention, nearly covering the stage; songs, duets, quartets, &c., by several of our best choir and oratorio singers; and piano pieces by Mr. SATTER and Mr. MAY. Among the choruses we may mention the Prayer from "Moses", as given with imposing effect. One night we heard the unaccompanied quartet Quando Corpus, from the Stabat Mater, sung with such unerring truth of intonation and expression, as we have found extremely rare even with great artists, by Miss BOTHAMLY, Miss TWICHELL, Mr. ADAMS and Mr. MOZART, who compose the choir of the Somerset-street Church. We might name other excellent quartets or trios by the same. A true spirit seems to animate this little group. One of the best things that we have ever heard in any concert in the way of concerted music was the singing of Krentzer's "Chapel" by eight men's voices; it was really a model of male part-singing; the voices were better than in most of the German clubs, and the blending, the light and shade, &c., nearly perfect. Why will not our native tenors and basses cultivate this sort of music more? Why leave it wholly to our German friends?

The number of young persons who contributed to the pleasure of the audience in the way of solo-singing was quite remarkable; not a few fine voices, (some familiar and some new to us), promising talents, and fruits of careful training were exhibited. We may not particularize, except to thank Miss TWICHELL for the example of an earnest, simple, unaffected manner, which she uniformly sets to her young associates; not seeming to think of self display more than the music she has to express; her rich contralto develops nobly, and promises good service in a large and truthful, if not the most showy school of Art.

Both Conventions gave miscellaneous concerts, and both furnished good examples of song-singing. Yet one was sometimes pained to notice instances of vanity and forwardness, premature passion for applauding publics, which only a frivolous public would encourage; although these were fewer than one might expect. This vanity too was nourished by the uniform demand for repetition which followed every solo, making the evenings tedious. The songs selected were mostly of a higher order than prevailed a few years since; and yet it had been better, had several of those namby-pamby sentimental English ditties been weeded from the programmes, if only in view of the educational and taste-improving purpose of such Conventions. To hear a full-grown man, who comes before the younger members somewhat of course as a model singer, possibly "professor", making the silliest portion of an audience laugh by such platitudes as Mama, the men, they wont propose, with lamb-like refrains of Ma and Mammy, is neither refreshing nor improving to the taste.

In the solo concerts of Mr. JOHNSON'S Convention, we have been repeatedly struck by the rare beauty, power and richness of the soprano of Miss WHITEHOUSE, who sang the Inflammatus finely. It is a voice and talent worthy of the best culture, not in a mechanical sense merely. Mrs. LONG, also, and others of our more cultivated vocalists, several times favored the assembly at the Temple.

Other features of the Conventions, happily closed on Thursday, may come up hereafter.

Translated for this Journal.

Albert Lortzing.

From the German of W. H. RIEHL.

A composer, whose songs live in the mouths of the whole people, must first die before the people are reminded that these songs were not woven of themselves, but that it was the deceased kapellmeister of the Friedrich Wilhelmstädter theatre in Berlin, this very LORTZING, that made them.

Lortzing in his personal fortunes, as in his whole artistic tendency bears a strong resemblance to CONRADIN KREUTZER.* Both became popular by their unassuming stand in Art: but the rare glory, of having sung to the hearts of the people, both had to purchase by an unsettled, and often strongly proletarian life, vexed by continual disappointments and privations. Kreutzer at an advanced age had to seek a livelihood on a Russian provincial stage, and when he died it fell to the pious duty of the nation to provide for those he left behind him. After Lortzing's death, his friend Düringer published the biography and letters of the deceased for the benefit of his children. This little book is a chapter in the history of our social misery, which teaches us that the times of the poor poet, who has to doom his old age to the alms-house in order that he may offer up the vigor of his youth to the artistic glory of his country, are by no means past; and furthermore that Lortzing, who was gifted with the simple melody of the people, had for an accompanying gift that silent, self-renouncing trust in Providence, which "the people" strictly so-called, that is to say, the poor people in Germany, have always maintained so heroically.

The fate of these two popular composers reminds us of the tragical end of a kindred old master of the popular opera, FERDINAND KAUER, the composer of the Donauweibchen (Nymph of the Danube). It is a little story and sounds to us like a deeply symbolical poem. The Viennese musician, whose popular operas had brought so many thousands into the theatres, had long been forgotten as a pauper, passed away or supposed dead, when in the Spring of 1830 the news was suddenly spread that, during the terrible freshet which laid waste the banks of the Danube with fatal rapidity in the night of the 1st of March, an old man of eighty, who lived wretched and unknown in the basement of a little house upon the bank, brooding over his old piles of music, had barely escaped drowning, but that his last, sole treasure, his dear MSS. compositions, on which his memory fed itself and which kept up a little remnant of good spirits in his care-worn life, were lost. For a short time the unhappy man wandered about on his beggar's staff, until he died from utter debility. That was Ferdinand Kauer, a man, whose popularity in the day thereof had spread through half of Europe, the composer of the Donauweibchen. The Donauweibchen, the water-spirit (Nixe) of his country's stream, to whose glory he had sung his two best compositions, had at last drawn down to herself also the composer, sick of life! But she had compassionately taken care, that a ray of poetry should fall upon the evening of the poor old man's life; whereas ungrateful men had left him but the common prose of a worn out and forgotten proletary's lingering death.

An artist, who seeks to appear no more than he really is; who in his productions does not torture himself to become more than by God's gift he may; who would not get above himself; who puts his works and not his person in the foreground,—a man who makes himself useful everywhere and for that very reason never gets due credit; a not merely personal, but also æsthetically modest talent—this in our day so rare phenomenon was Lortzing.

He was no epoch-making musician, he did not try to be. If he had tried to be, he would have failed, like hundreds of his fellows. The course of his development lies clear before us; it is not that of a genius. Having grown up in the theatrical world, the gifted actor and singer gradually felt the need of passing over from the sphere of reproduction to that of production. Playing and imitating, he came to creating, and creation with him remained all the time play and imitation. No steady organic development of one ground-thought filling the whole artist's personality, reigns in the genesis of his works. You might say on the contrary: Lortzing felt his way along until the thing would go, and a happy instinct told him in good season when he had found the point where it went admirably. Of conscious tendency there was absolutely, and fortunately, no pretence.

Lortzing was thoroughly naïve, naïve even in the welding together of the most heterogeneous forms. When original thoughts failed him, then he innocently leaned, as if it were a matter understood of course, upon the thoughts of others. Such a proceeding is only possible in Music, which has maintained not only the most refined, but also the most childlike character among the modern Arts. Contemporary literature therefore scarcely affords a true parallel for Lortzing. He has been called an eclectic. But the genuine eclectic drags before you, with theoretic, Art-historical consciousness, the forms and colors of all ages, in order thereby to compose the motley mosaic of the alleged most excellent; he sets the mask of Jupiter upon the Torso of Hercules, and tacks on below the legs of the Apollo Belvedere, and thinks that now he has produced an image representing the combined ideal of all manly beauty. This cannot be said of Lortzing, from whom every theoretic tendency lay infinitely far off. Not because he was learned in his Art, but for just the contrary reason, because he was no scholar, has he let all sorts of contradictory thoughts and forms, both borrowed and original, run alongside by side so innocently.

Criticism never became with him, as it has done with most modern artists, the tenth Muse. Hence the sunny bright, Spring-like quality, which seems so lovely and attractive to us in Lortzing's pictures. The cloud shadows of reflection have never darkened the blue sky of his cheerful Art.—His acting, too, upon the stage is said to have been easy, lively, always natural. His whole life long he was a child of Nature, and such are confessedly very rare in our reflective age.

When one considers how, in our day, particularly since the example of BERLIOZ, music has been made into an apocalyptic allegory, wherein all the sense and nonsense of the age purports to stand portrayed in fabulous tone-pictures; when one reads for instance, how the absolute Critique has recently discovered, that from BEETHOVEN's third Symphony in E♭ (Eroica) to his ninth in D minor (Choral) we mark the unmistakable progress from republicanism to socialism, it does one good to feel that people like Lortzing, too, have lived among us, who could play so contentedly and unaffectedly with innocent tones, and who sought nothing further than a pleasant play. There is an infinite gain to sensible, even if it be superficial clearness, in this relief to deeply contemplative musical insanity.

To those reflective musicians, who torment themselves without either outward success or inward satisfaction, who feel as badly as if they had perpetrated a stupid blunder, if perchance for once a natural and simple melody flows into their pen, and who then tug and twist at such a melody until it has happily lost all natural flow; to those musical tendency-manufacturers the popular success of every work of Lortzing preaches the moral with which St. John concludes his first epistle: "Little children, keep yourselves from idols!"

Lortzing wrote, composed, played, sang his operas himself, to-day conducted their performance and the next day wielded the kapellmeister's baton. It reminds us of the time, when the old MATTHESON still sang the hero in the first acts of one of the operas composed by him and, after he had stabbed himself in the third, in the fourth and fifth acts went down into the orchestra and conducted the rest of the performance in person. In all possible kinds of theatres, great and small, Lortzing in his life's changeful pilgrimage has toiled. No artistic task was too small for the modest man.

Considered as a musician in the abstract, Lortzing was almost a dilettante, but as a theatrical-musician he was a man of the profession. With most of the living opera composers the reverse has been the case. Therefore with these the history of Art registers only the scores, but with people like Lortzing the performances. Herein he seems in elective affinity with those poet players, who from IFFLAND to DEVRIENT, BENEDIX, and so forth, do not in composition get beyond a certain dilettantism, but who by their masterly theatrical talents contrive tolerably well to offset this weakness. Lortzing's operas play and sing themselves, as it were, since every single number from beforehand has been accepted and determined on as suited to the stage.

Had Lortzing possessed a deeper culture, he would not have evaded self-criticism so easily.—He would have worked in a more rounded, ripe and well-considered manner; he would have stricken out many a platitude of text and music, which had flowed into his pen; but if he ever got to the end of a score, then probably he would have worked it all over again from the beginning, until every simple effect would have been spoiled, or, likely as not, he would have torn it up. To produce as easily as Lortzing did, requires in our time a certain naïve absence of culture. As MENDELSSOHN achieved musical successes by the richness of his culture, so Lortzing won the prize of practical success over many a more richly endowed composer by the naïveté of his poverty of culture! Therein does the artistic diversity of the age show itself, that such opposites can subsist so pleasantly side by side, and even attain outwardly to like results.

The whole nature of our composer made him the born adversary of that over-spiced, reflective tendency-music of the French New-Romanticists, which has so long controlled and still controls the German opera. His happy instinct led him to the only point, where a man like him could victoriously assail this false direction. He seized upon the German People's Song, and wove it, with multifarious change and imitation, as the costliest ornament, into his operas. In this way his Czar and Zimmermann took effect; the songs have kept this work afloat. And while the master was wrestling at home with German artist cares, the song of the Czar made the tour round the world. It was mainly this happy thought, of transferring the popular German song out of the farces into the higher comic opera, that has made Lortzing a celebrated composer. The songs have given to his operas that bit of Art-historical importance, which they could hardly have had otherwise. Lortzing stepped into the ranks of musical reformers, without knowing or intending it. In his songs he made front against the French New-Romance, while in his arias and ensembles he still borrowed from them quite genially all sorts of motley frippery. It is scarcely possible for another musician to proceed in so naïve a manner. With him too the genius of the German song has become mighty in the weak. Lortzing by no means apprehended the German Volkslied in its depth, in its historical sanctity, as Mendelssohn has done; on the contrary with him the German popular song appears mostly in its homeliest garb, often enough prinked out with modern mannerisms. But by this very fact the Volkslied gives the more shining proof of its indestructible inborn energy and freshness, that it can operate so magically even when thus diluted.

One might say that the popular element with Lortzing often smacks of the old-fogy Philisterei. I say it not disparagingly. For I am not thinking of the leathern Philistines of our modern town society, but of those "divine Philistines" of the rococo period of musical history, whom I have elsewhere described.* As these introduced the real good-natured dilettantism into parlor music, so Lortzing propagated the echoes of the same upon the stage. But this German "divine Philistine" is a humoristic fellow, at all events ten times better than the blasé fop, who has become musically embodied in the points of the new French comic opera. FLOTOW, in many pieces a successful imitator of Lortzing, has nevertheless in his musical comedy made a considerable advance from the German Philistine to the Parisian coxcomb. All that German opera has gained by it is a new form of disease.

Even the many little jokes, droll conceits and improvisations, which Lortzing has scattered through the text-books of his operas, are for the most part rather Philistine. This harmonizes with the entire description of our master. The tone of musical romance, which he endeavored to strike in his Waffenschmied (armorer), only succeeded where the old German 'fogy' (Spießbürger) was to be depicted; the chivalric element is a failure. In the magical opera Undine, where Lortzing has aspired to the musical delineation of the tender, shadowy dream-life of the spirit world, the most characteristic portion of the music is a couple of downright hearty drinking songs.

Herein Lortzing's manner of appropriating the German Volkslied for the opera, differs strikingly from the use made of it by CARL MARIA VON WEBER. Weber idealizes the Volkslied, he renders it transparent with the fabulous magic glow of his romantic mood of mind; Lortzing makes the naturalness of the Volkslied if possible still more natural, with a right citizen-like familiarity, somewhat home-baked to be sure, but generally without becoming flat. The aristocratic figures and situations in his Wildschütz (Poacher) are entire failures; the Philister-ish queued school-master on the contrary is successful. The tendency to seek the essence of musical comedy in the humor of Philisterei, has been constantly characteristic of German opera since DITTERSDORF. Therein lies precisely the inextinguishable charm of Dittersdorf's music, that its creator was such a "divine Philistine." A standing formalism of musical comedy has attached itself to this phenomenon: even MOZART and HAYDN could not rid themselves of it; and these forms of Philister-like fun in tones through the hereditary transmission of a century, like an "inventory of the iron hieffer," have descended at last to our Lortzing. The burgomaster van Bett in his Czar und Zimmermann is the genuine representative of such delightful musical Philisterei; but he is cut entirely to the pattern of the Dittersdorf 'old foggy.' Lortzing has known how to prize the importance of the good discovery, for he has constantly worked anew according to this model.

It is worthy of remark that the German painters began to employ the Philister queues as the best material and most thankful form of modern caricature, at the same time that Lortzing caricatured the same tribe musically with such success. Precisely because Lortzing's comedy is often so Philister-like, has it found so immense a public. Whoever, in joke or in earnest, appeals to the Philistines, is always sure in Germany that he will find an audience.

The race of unsophisticated artist natures, who sing on carelessly, because song is given them, is disappearing every day. Lortzing in this sense was a rare, one might say a belated appearance. The people will keep on singing his songs and—as he himself has done—re-shaping them in sport, long after his name shall be quite forgotten. But in the history of Art that name and the works on which it is imprinted will be designated as a memorable evidence of the success of an entirely simple and modest talent, unmoved by the reflectiveness and the æsthetic egoism of the age, compared with the unspeakable barrenness and fruitless striving of so many minds far more richly and more highly endowed.

Letters about Richard Wagner, to a young Composer.

The above is the title of a series of letters we find in the Fliegende Blätter für Musik, a musical pamphlet, issued at irregular intervals in Leipzig. The editor and author is the same who, some years since, issued two volumes of musical letters under the pseudonym of the "Well-known." These volumes have attained a large circulation, in consequence of the practical knowledge and experience in musical matters exhibited in them. As no one in Germany is ignorant of the right name of this "Well-known," we may as well give it here. It is Professor LOBE, a composer of operas, symphonies, and musical compositions of various kinds, and for some time the editor of the Allgemeine Musikalische Zeitung, published by Breitkopf and Haertel, and previously edited by Rochlitz and Hauptmann. Prof. Lobe was also an intimate friend of Mendelssohn, with whom he, at various times, held most interesting and curious conversations in regard to musical matters, one of which we have heretofore given.

"Well-known" is strongly opposed to the eccentricities of the so-called new school in Germany; he believes neither in the entire novelty of its doctrines, nor in the benefits to be derived by music in general from them. He is classed as a decided opponent of Wagner and his followers.—Still, in marked contrast to his London partizans, Prof. Lobe's opposition does not go so far as to render him blind and unjust to what there is in this school which is undeniably good and a progress. So in these letters, while he very clearly points out what he deems the extravagances of Wagner, with regard to instrumentation and modulation—while he calls attention to his “imitation of Weber,” and many other “defects, which are in direct opposition to some of the principles advanced in his writings, and which may be found as well in most of the composers who have preceded him,” he most willingly and heartily admits the many beauties contained in Tannhäuser and Lohengrin. In evidence of this, we quote some sentences from his twelfth letter:

“As it is known to you, a great many think that Wagner can not produce melodies! Look at the following song from Tannhäuser:

Or this from Lohengrin:

Had Wagner never written other melodies than these two, the above-mentioned reproach would be unjust, and not to be accounted for, or there are no melodies in any opera. But both these operas show many similar true melodies and tuneful phrases.”

Prof. Lobe afterwards refers to the vision of Elsa in Lohengrin, and Ostrand's hypocritical flatterings of Elsa, in the same opera, as proofs that Wagner does possess the gift of melody.—From the thirteenth letter of this series we extract as follows:

“The new school requires that the principal expression should be given to the orchestra. There is no doubt that the voice, with mere melody, can not express all the different feelings which may agitate the human breast, at one and the same time. If Tamina, in Mozart's Zauberflöte, should sing, ‘Help! help! or I am lost!’ without accompaniment of the orchestra, we should indeed hear the cry of fright and terror, but the chilling of the blood, the trembling of the nerves, the benumbing of the senses, would find no expression: to do this is the task of the orchestra. But how much soever an orchestra may add in this respect, it should never overpower and stifle the voice of the singer; for, in the latter case, pure instrumental music would be the result, and this, you know, the school ‘of the future’ does not allow.

“What Wagner so earnestly preaches in this regard is not always put in practice by himself; for his operas show many well-proportioned instrumental phrases and entire pieces, which, moreover, produce splendid effects. It is also true that there are also many places where the voices of the orchestra are so numerous, express so many things, and become so very loud, that the words and even tones of the singer are barely heard, if at all. Look at the part written for Elsa, in the score of the first finale of Lohengrin; call to mind the mighty masses of chorus and orchestra, and the different figures which roar around the delicate woman's voice, and you will see, what every one who has listened to a performance of this opera must have himself experienced, namely, that the singing of Elsa is not to be heard at all. It is true that there is almost no opera entirely devoid of such nonsense, and of this I shall have more to say at some other time; but it was not to have been expected that Wagner, the so-much praised cleanser of the Augean stables, should have left untouched this dirt, just as his predecessors had left it.”

In another portion of the same letter, Prof. Lobe writes:

“Wagner possesses an extraordinary talent, a remarkably delicate sense for new, and at the same time characteristic and expressive modulations. In the beginning of his operas, or when, at the piano-forte, you go through a single scene of one of them, you will find many of these modulations most delightful and impressive; but, in time, this constant change of modulation becomes stale, and even unimpressive, from that fixed law of human nature which will not permit long-continued extremes of excitement.”

“Well-known” concludes these letters, from which our limits have compelled us to make but brief extracts, with the following remarks:

“It is not a pleasant task to call attention rather to the faults than to the beauties of a composer of such high gifts as Richard Wagner. But he who really loves Art and artists can not do otherwise.—Wagner, by his letters and criticisms, has provoked comparison between them and his music. He possesses one great quality—ENERGY. This is rare in our day, most valuable in itself, and generally exercises an irresistible power over the majority of men. Could he and would he restrain this energy within true and proper boundaries, and not drive it to wild fancies and fanaticism, it would be better for him.—It is true that the polemics excited by his writings, and the constant noise of his disciples have, to a high degree, awakened curiosity to hear his operas.—Every body will see and hear them, and as they have a genuine poetical and musical value, it is quite natural that they must please everywhere. But the mighty stream of enthusiasm will flow by and pass away. When curiosity shall have been sufficiently satisfied, and the public, by repeated hearings, have learned not only better to appreciate the many beauties, but also to detect the weak points, the works of Wagner will, indeed, enter the ranks of the more distinguished works of Art, but no longer be praised as the highest in Art; the genuine inspirations of former masters will maintain and preserve their claims, and the future?—will produce master-works of its own.—Wagner decidedly has not written a ‘drama of the future,’ but dramatic and musically effective operas, the appreciation and enjoyment of which requires no future generation. The present one is able to understand and appreciate their superiority, but it can also discover their weak points, which indeed, are sometimes quite apparent.

“I hold Wagner for one of the most important, powerful, and energetic Art-natures of our generation, but not the only one. Musically, Robert Schumann is fully his equal; technically, the latter is his superior, and possesses also more natural creative powers, although in opera he can not compete with the author of Lohengrin.”

It is not without a purpose that we have quoted from these Letters to a Young Composer. We know of nothing which will better show the importance and influence of Richard Wagner in musical matters upon our times; and, moreover, how differently those who know his music and his writings judge the man from those who know nothing of either, even when both parties are partisans of the “old school.” Prof. Lobe is as firm an opponent of the so-called Wagner party as are the critics of the London Musical World and Athenæum; but Prof. Lobe is acquainted with the works of the man he attempts to criticize, and mark the difference of his tone!

Conversations with Mendelssohn.

By the author of Fliegende Blätter für Musik, Leipzig, 1853.

IV.

On a subsequent occasion, I led the conversation back again to the “new paths.” The idea tormented me, and Mendelssohn's reasoning had in no way convinced or tranquilized me.

“I heard,” I began, “your overture to the Midsummer Night's Dream a short time ago, for the first time. It appears to me to surpass all your former works in originality, nor can I compare it to any other composition, for it has no brother, or any family likeness. Might we not, therefore, say that you struck out, in it, a new path?”

“By no means,” Mendelssohn answered; “you have forgotten what I understood by ‘new paths:’ creations in accordance with newly-discovered, and, at the same time, higher laws of Art. In my overture I have not enounced a single new maxim. You will find for instance, in the grand overture to Beethoven's Fidelio, the same maxims that I have followed. My thoughts are different, for they are Mendelssohnian and not Beethovenian, but the maxims which guided me in composing were Beethoven's as well. We should be in an unfortunate position, if, because we followed the same road and created in accordance with the same principles, we could not produce new thoughts and new pictures. What has Beethoven done in his overture? He has painted the substance of his piece in tone-pictures. He has done so in a more than usually broad form of overture, and built up more than usually broad periods, and so have I. But our periods are essentially and entirely formed on the laws according to which the idea of a ‘period’ presents itself as a general rule to the human mind. If you test all the musical elements in this manner, you will find nowhere in my overture anything that Beethoven did not possess and turn to account, unless, indeed,” he continued, playfully, “you give me the credit of striking out a new path, because I employed the ophicleide.”

“You impute, then, the originality of invention to the well-defined subject that you had before your eyes when composing that overture?” I inquired.

“Certainly,” answered Mendelssohn.

“Then,” I continued, “we ought to be absolutely inundated with original works, for there is no lack of titles, containing a material value, and yet the music belonging to them is frequently of the most common description! According to your theory, Mr. A., Mr. B., and all the Messieurs throughout the alphabet, would have written your overture to the Midsummer Night's Dream, had they only taken it into their heads to render the substance of the piece in tones?”

“If they had set about the work with the same earnestness,” responded Mendelssohn, “and identified themselves with the piece as zealously, they would all have produced higher and more important works than are to be produced without such a course.”

“If a man possesses talent, and yet manufactures ordinary trash, it is always his own fault. He does not employ his materials as he could employ them, were he in earnest. The most ordinary cause of ordinary compositions is a want of self-criticism and of an endeavor to improve. Had I printed everything without altering, there would be very little peculiar to remark in my works.—If I am allowed to possess any peculiar characteristics, I am conscious, in my own mind, that I owe them mostly to my strict self-criticism and my habit of altering and striving to improve. I have turned and twisted the thoughts—how many times have I frequently done so with one and the same—in order to transform their original ordinary physiognomy in to one more original, more important and more effective. Just as it may easily come to pass that two or three notes treated in a different manner, tonically or rhythmically, will give a single thought quite another look and expression, so, if we take examples of greater dimensions, an entire period either inserted or cancelled may make something extraordinary and effective out of something ordinary and ineffective. Good Heavens! only look at Beethoven's book of notes! only look at his notes for Adelaide! Why should he have set about altering at the very commencement? Because the first reading is flat and ordinary, while the second is lively, more expressive, and melodious. What will you bet that if you give me a thought, of the most ordinary description, I will not turn and twist it, as regards the outline, accompaniment, harmony and instrumentation, until I have changed it into something good? And just as in the case of a single notion, I would undertake to change, by alterations and improvements, a most ordinary piece into an interesting one.”

“That I believe,” I replied, with a feeling of perfect conviction.

"Well, then," said Mendelssohn, "what more would you have? Pigeons ready roasted do not fly into the mouth of the most talented artists.—Such a thing may happen, perhaps; but very rarely; as a rule, you must first catch, pluck, and roast them."

"And yet you have laid whole pieces on one side, as not having turned out especially well?" I inquired.

"That is very true," answered Mendelssohn; "many come into the world so sickly, that it would take as much, and perhaps more, time to render them strong and healthy than to create new ones. In such a case you prefer producing something new."

"But is it not possible," I asked, "by too much alteration, to render a work worse instead of better? Is not Goethe, for instance, right when he says:

'Hast deine Kastanien zu lange gebraten, Sind dir alle zu Kohlen gerathen.' *

"Yes, such a thing might happen," replied Mendelssohn laughing. "What did Goethe ever say that was not deduced from facts? But I prefer letting one dish cook too long and be burnt, to having every dish brought up raw to the table."

V.

One day, I succeeded in leading the conversation back again to the subject mentioned in the last chapter, and put the question to him: Whether the artist could, knowingly, do still more for his idiosyncrasy, and whether he, Mendelssohn, was not conscious of certain modes of mental proceeding for this end?

"Except sharp self-criticism when the work is finished, and careful alterations, I can name you no others," said Mendelssohn. "And yet," he added, after a short pause, smiling ironically, and tapping me on the shoulder, "the fact of a musician's composing more, and grubbing on less in reflection, may also assist idiosyncrasy. As in every other thing in the world, so also in the case of the musician, there are secret agencies at work, which we perceive in the fact, but whose primitive grounds we can never find out. We enable these, by continual labor, to develop themselves, while we keep them back by too much merely critical reflection."

"I may grant that," I replied, "but still, we may be too easily contented, if we take this last view, and consider what is explicable in a subject as exhausted, at a stage when such is not, perhaps, the case. Had we dug further, we might, possibly, have discovered more."

"Have you done so, and discovered more?" inquired Mendelssohn, eagerly.

"I have certainly thought further about a thing, but without discovering much. The following ideas on the matter have suggested themselves to me:

"It strikes me that all we create is principally, though other causes have some influence, decided by what, in our art, interests or repels, especially pleases or especially displeases, in the works of our predecessors; for if we want to render ourselves a strict account of the impressions which musical compositions produce upon us, we find that many works do not please us at all—indeed, it is very seldom that we meet with one which satisfies us in every respect. In one case the melodic outline of the thought pleases us but not the accompaniment, or if the latter pleases, the harmony to it does not, and so on. Some persons, again, delight especially in the most vigorous thoughts, with a plentiful supply of brass instruments, while another individual, more delicately organized, does not like them, but prefers far more the finer, milder shades, etc. These likings and dislikings implanted in us, for productions of Art, constitute our original individual dispositions, and are, in their various degrees and combinations, intellectually, what the outward varieties of figure, bearing, and features are physically. In this respect, all men, or at least the great mass of individuals, possess a disposition for idiosyncrasy."

"There is something in what you say," replied

* Your chestnuts you have too much done;
They're burnt to cinders every one.

Mendelssohn. "I presume that you deduce from this the fact that the artist must give the reins to his original disposition; that he should not, for instance, seek to remodel or modify it in obedience to the authority of great artists, or even prevailing views, and that, by this means, he can work, with full consciousness, towards the development of his idiosyncrasy?"

"That is certainly what I mean," I continued. "There are, as I have already said, few men without idiosyncrasy originally, but there are very few of them who possess such independent minds as to be able to develop themselves entirely in accordance with their nature; they allow themselves to be caught by other influences, by æsthetical arguments, by criticisms on their works, by celebrated men, who command a large public, etc. They think they will pursue a safer course by taking the road followed by such persons, than by following the manner that is naturally their own, and thus, from this constraint, to which they subject themselves, become more or less imitators."

"That is perfectly right," said Mendelssohn, interrupting me. "Such independence, however, I can claim for myself, for I have been conscious of it from my earliest youth upwards. I cannot remember a single occasion on which I ever said in my own mind: 'You shall write a trio, like such and such a one of Beethoven, or Mozart, or any other master,' but I wrote it in conformity with my own taste, according to what floated before me generally as pleasing. Thus, for instance, I never liked the boisterous brass instruments, and have never favored them especially, although I have frequently enough had occasion to remark on how many of the public they produce an effect. I like parts finely worked out—the polyphonic style of composition, in which I may be no doubt principally influenced by my early contrapuntal studies with Zelter, and the study of Bach. And thus, in the fact of my seeking to develop what satisfies me, and what exists in my nature, may have arisen whatever idiosyncrasy people choose to attribute to me.—That is not so bad, not so bad," he exclaimed, as his eyes sparkled in that inimitable amiable manner, which was peculiar to him, when an idea pleased him. "That is not so bad," he continued, after he had walked on a few steps further, immersed in thought. "If, therefore, I remember these principles, and act consistently with regard to them, I can guide myself by them, and direct myself alone in the sphere of creating minds, properly so called."

"But," I observed, "this relying upon one's self has, also, its perils, when pursued too unconditionally, as, for instance, when the individuality of the Art of a period is opposed to it. In such a case, the artist remains alone; he cannot obtain a public, and becomes a martyr to his idiosyncrasy."

"Better to be a martyr than a mere repeater of others," said Mendelssohn. "But when was there ever a peculiar, and, at the same time, naturally important artistic mind that did not make its way, sooner or later? Every man in whom there is an energetic idiosyncrasy obtains a public, provided he only holds out. Many a man is, however, ruined from not continuing as he has begun, and, when he sees himself left a short time without exciting any remarkable degree of interest, abandoning his nature, and endeavoring to accommodate himself to such as are accounted the heroes of the day. Such men become renegades and converts, and turn back, exhausted, when perhaps near the victory they would have achieved, had they continued to fight on manfully. Do you suppose that I do not know I found no real appreciation for a considerable time? It is true that there was no dearth of apparent appreciation when I was present, but that did not mean much. I was under the necessity of introducing my works myself, for I seldom found them anywhere I went. This was, in truth, not very encouraging. But I thought: 'what you have done, you have done, and now you must go and see how it gets on in the world. It must at last, although slowly, find those who think like it; for the world is very large and varied.' And so it proved. It proved so, too, because I continued in my own way, without troubling my head much whether or when it would find more general acceptance."

"And would you really have held out, if appreciation had never been bestowed?" I inquired; "or did you not, as was natural, feel within you the conviction that your way was really worth something, and must force itself a passage?"

"I will not make myself out stronger than I really am," said Mendelssohn; "I never lost this conviction, or, at least, strong hope. One stroke does not fell a tree, I said to myself; very frequently a great number fail to do so, if it is vigorous. Every artist depends upon an éclat, that is to say, a work that hits the public hard; if that is achieved, the thing is done. The attention of the public is then excited, and, from that instant, it not only takes an interest in all the artist's subsequent works, but makes inquiries about his former ones, which it has passed by with unconcern, and thus he is fairly started. All music-publishers reckon on this, too. They continue to publish the works of talented composers for a long period, without expecting a profit from them. They wait for the work, the éclat, which enables them to dispose of the former ones as well."

"And such an éclat you achieved most triumphantly, with your overture to the Midsummer Night's Dream," I said. "I recollect very well what a sensation that overture produced, by its astonishing originality and truthfulness of expression, and how, from that moment you went up very high in the estimation of musicians as well as unprofessional people."

"I believe so, too," said Mendelssohn, "and thus, you see, we must trust a little to luck as well."

"Luck!" I exclaimed. "I should say that it was not the luck, but the genius of the composer that created an overture like the one in question."

"Talent," replied Mendelssohn, modestly changing my expression, "is naturally requisite in the matter; but I here call luck the inspiration of choosing the subject for the overture—a subject calculated to supply me with such musical ideas and forms as contained within themselves a general interest for the great mass of the public. All that I could do, at that period, as a composer, I was able to do previously. But I had never had such a subject for the exercise of my imagination. This was an inspiration, and the inspiration was a lucky one."

Music the Exponent of Emotion.

[Concluded from last week.]

This personality of the composer is ever at work and influences, more or less, the mind of every student of music, as we find many of the most delightful passages constantly recurring, or themes based upon old and familiar thoughts of Haydn and Mozart.

Such airs, having derived their rhythmical element from a universal emotion, and having taken an enduring hold upon the affections of the musical world, have consecrated those well known names in our memories and have identified themselves with all that is primarily beautiful in music.

The great, the overcoming reverence for a name has always entered into the essential spirit of our admiration for any work of genius, and, owing to the characteristic impress thus bestowed upon all the emanations of Art, where no language can successfully portray that which is the spiritual essence of the master mind, we need not wonder that personality occupies such an important position.

Into the arena of every noted mind we cannot enter; his thoughts descend upon us like sacred revelations, and for want of appropriate terms of definition, we are forced to name them his.

Thus the artist is not bound to render Nature in her own coloring, but is often tempted to give her a different interpretation from that by which she passes into the unsophisticated mind. In a similar manner the tone-painter leads us into those inner relations that are exclusively his, not by passing gradually from a simple to a complex degree of beauty, but by conducting us through the mists of discord into scenes of ravishing harmony.

As the painter selects Nature for the full play of his emotions, so the tone-artist has tones, rhythm and tact-emotion at his full command, and making these subservient to his feelings, fashions all his inventions of an unseen but imperishable beauty.

Unable to dive into his soul, we cannot name the particular ground of his emotions, only in so far as they may serve to move ourselves, attributing to him that which arises within us.

The opinions of mankind are always gregarious. Hence we find that the personality of genius receives an extraneous impulse from this cause, generally raising it to an eminence from which it cannot fall.

All master minds, however, lead these opinions, and often give a direction to the movements of the age in which they flourish. Thus BEETHOVEN is regarded as the Messiah of modern music, appearing at a time when enlarged boundaries of musical conception were demanded, and when intellect was becoming allied to feeling. As in all similar instances, he led the age, because the age wanted him, and his style became gregarious because it was a response to the calls of an enlarged sentiment.

To this individuality, therefore, the world is necessarily indebted, as it indelibly stamps new marks of intellect upon its works and infuses into these the rare elements of its own being.

In the cause of music, personality must exert an important and salutary influence, since, in the absence of a practical language, we can designate the creations of the tone-Art by the characteristic fancy of individual genius.

To abjure metaphor, or the use of figure, altogether, we do not propose, but rather to eschew that excessive use of them which is apt to give wings to a too vague fancy and render the subject entirely meaningless.

We think in all cases where it is attempted to conduct the hearer into the visible and outer world by a passage through the inner world of tone, the composer should give an exposition of his design, in written language.

In this way, and in no other, can the concrete go hand in hand with musical abstraction.

Where poetical description is rendered illustrative of music, as in the "Seasons" and "Creation" of HAYDN, and the "Glocke" of ROMBERG, the enjoyment is lifted up from an enigmatical beauty of pure instrumentation to a certain and truthful comprehension of some real intention, on the part of the composer.

In the "Last Rose of Summer," we imagine we hear the sighing of autumn, with her melancholy cadences, or see the faded leaves falling; the fancy, however, is derived from the stanzas on which the air is founded, where all these intimations, first made in language, place the scene and action before us as precursors of the music. We should surmise that, in all of these instances, language had made all the first suggestions, leading the thought previously to our having heard the tones, and that a primitive signification, as inherent in modulated tones, expressive of distinct real pictures, is entirely unapproachable.

We would yet suggest that the highest interest attaches itself to the æsthetical problem, as to how far the world of tone is illustrated by that of vision. It is proved by the fact that musical composition is striving to blend its harmonies with the glories and enchantments of outer nature and derive sustenance therefrom, that a strong identity of conception is always in operation, when the two apparently distinct organs of sense, the eye and the ear, are employed. In all beings endowed with a normal intellectuality, the senses are unquestionably co-operative and illustrative of each other; their separate perfection conduces to the perfection of the whole by continually adding to the sum of etherial enjoyment and perception; and although it is often remarked that a one-sided culture concentrates the strength of diverse mental faculties and leads to the highest developments, yet in the æsthetical problem relating to an alliance of a pictorial and tone-imagination, we can see nothing less than an advance towards one of the highest attainments of human life. Many practical facts, applicable to the question before us, are to be found in the extreme popularity of music when introduced to raise the appreciation of pictorial displays, as well as to season every species of out-door life, under shady trees, and woodland recreations and festivities.

Here it is most successfully called to the aid both of Art and Nature, by filling up a void in the emotions, which the visual sense cannot independently supply. In this view of it, we might say that music embellishes Art and Nature, by adding to the soul's excitement and heightening its susceptibilities; yet we might, with equal justice, say that pictorial Art and Nature add to music, by bringing to bear upon it the harmonies of an outer world.

Although we may not conceal the fact that much of the effect here produced is derived from the pathological influences of out-door life, a pure atmosphere and genial companionship, combining to exalt the mind and body to their liveliest and happiest condition, yet the cause of the Art is not degraded thereby, but its moral influences are augmented.—What the practical uses of music may be, and how its cultivation might conduce to the true education of our people, softening and subduing the asperities of an austere conventionality and soulless materialism, we leave for the subject of another paper.

Musical Chat-Chat.

We were by no means alone in the pleasure we received from Mr. SOUTHARD's music. A genial correspondent of the New York Evening Post, under the head of "Art Gossip from Boston," writes as follows:

"But a more refined and subtler form of Art has a claim even now, and music, never amiss, seems to be the complement of the voice of Nature. I have heard music, new and fresh and good. Conventions of psalm-singers have met and sung here, and professors have sold their books. But with all their trading and money-changing in the temple of Art they have given much that was good. A new name among composers of native birth was introduced to us, which we think bids fair to be one of note. Mr. L. H. Southard brought out some new works—two overtures, descriptive, poetical, concert overtures, called 'Night in the Forest,' and 'The View from the Mountain,' both very beautiful in themes and master-like in treatment, which were listened to as to the accepted and famous works of the Art. They are not native, as some national works I have heard, brazen, bedrugged potpourris of Yankee Doodle, the Star-Spangled Banner and Hail Columbia, but are like the works of the native scholar, who has sat at the feet of the great masters, studied their works, and become imbued with their spirit. Besides these were given selections from the 'Scarlet Letter,' an unfinished opera, the story of which is taken from Hawthorne's novel of that name, ingeniously and poetically made into a libretto, by a literary gentleman of Cambridge, with no little dramatic skill and effect. Three scenes were given by competent singers, with orchestral accompaniment, and I venture to say that the audience of your Academy of Music would come down with hearty and enthusiastic applause could it hear them. Rather German, Freischütz-like in general style, yet brilliant, too, as if an Italian fancy had conceived them and created them with more than Italian learning. Ole Bull, I dare say, would have had at least one good opera which could have competed for his prize; and, prize or no prize, I hope to hear before long the whole of the 'Scarlet Letter.'"

The New York Academy of Music is at last taking one step towards justifying its name and fulfilling the educational purpose described in its charter. It announces a free school for instruction in vocal music, under the direction of Signors AMATI DUBREUIL and TORRIANI, chorus-masters of the opera. It is open gratuitously to all applicants, and promises employment in the opera to such as may desire it. A nice way of replenishing the choruses!—The star of the Academy troupe for the coming season is to be Mme. LAGRANGE. BERTUCCA, MORELLI, BRIGNOLI, AMODIO, and others are engaged; and we understand the management are in treaty with Miss HENSLEY. MIRATE, the tenor, we believe, has returned to Europe. Most of these artists are now in Newport, and there are rumors that they will give concerts in Boston, during the first weeks of the RACHEL excitement in the great metropolis. MAX MARETZEK is still conductor. The manager will be he whom L' Eco d' Italia calls "Il piccolo ULLMAN," while Sig. PAYNE, who is supposed to have "de moneys" will be "il nitello d' oro".... Mlle. TERESA PARODI with the pianist STRAKOSCH and his wife, assisted by APTOMMAS, the harpist, BERNARDI, baritone, and others, gave a concert at Niblo's on Tuesday evening, for the benefit of the sufferers by the yellow fever at Norfolk. Since her former career in this country, Parodi has been performing in the principal theatres in Italy; she returned to New York, under engagement with Strakosch, at the time of the falling out between the rival troupes at the Academy, which prevented her appearing. She has just returned from concertizing with Strakosch in the West.

Australia seems to be the golden lubberland just now for virtuosos. We read of an organ-grinder who has amassed a fortune there in a few months by the turning of his crank; and CATHARINE HAYES, who has returned there from Calcutta, is said to be reaping immense sums.... The opera at Madrid is to have the benefit of our old friend BENEVENTANO's lusty baritone.... Sig. LORINI is at Paris, soon to be joined there by his wife (VIRGINIA WHITING). MARINI, the basso of the Havana troupe, has also arrived at Paris.... BETTINI, the tenor so admired here, is engaged to sing at Vienna three months, for $6,000.... Our veteran unrivalled baritone, Sig. BADIALI, is to sail on the 5th of Italy. Possibly he will rejoin his old comrade SALVI, now manager of the Italian Opera at Paris. Of Badiali the Italian journal, L' Eco d' Italia, printed in New York, says: "In five years that he has trodden our stage he has never failed manager or public in a single instance.—Always in voice, always in tune, always the severe artist in all stage matters, never permitting himself the least exaggeration (?) either in singing or in action, he has reaped merited applause everywhere. Cesare Badiali had become indispensable to every enterprise; the Italian Opera without him was a body without a soul. All the famous singers wanted him to second them. He sang with JENNY LIND, with SONTAG, in the ALBONI and the STEFFANONE and the other troupes too numerous to mention. The baritone, who is to succeed Badiali in the theatres of America, must possess great merits indeed. He was about to revisit his country for the first time after an absence of six years; but the last illness of his brother, FEDERICO BADIALI, the most faithful agent of the Havana Impresario, detained him two months, during which time he was a most devoted brother." Of all those heroes (from Havana) of our first golden opera days, PERELLI, the successful teacher in Philadelphia, is the only one of note remaining in America.

Miss ELISE HENSLEY's concert at Newport was highly successful; so was another which she gave last week at Lynn, in company with the brilliant pianist, CARL HAUSE, now a resident of Salem. One of the cognoscenti tells us that she surpassed herself on this last occasion. . . . Mlle. VESTVALI has been giving brilliant concerts at Cape May. . . . Cinderella, by the PYNE and HARRISON troupe, still continues its attraction every second night at Niblo's. This engagement has been successful beyond precedent. Next week the new American opera, "Rip van Winkle," by GEORGE F. BRISTOW, of New York, will be brought out.

Fitzgerald's City Item sketches the programme of the approaching musical season in Philadelphia.—The Musical Fund Society are to give six concerts without foreign aid, "abandoning the ruinous star system"; there are rumors of classical symphony concerts, and also of a chorus added to the instrumental department and the performance of grand oratorios. . . . The Philharmonic Society will have their usual three concerts of miscellaneous music, with "stars." . . . The Harmonia Sacred Music Society are to open with a new native Oratorio: "The Cities of the Plain," by FRANK DARLEY; to be followed by "The Creation," &c. LEOPOLD MEIGNEN is to succeed Mr. STANBRIDGE as conductor; MICHAEL H. CROSS is retained as organist of the Society. . . . The subscription course of Oratorios, Cantatas and Madrigals announced by Messrs. THUNDER, CROUCH and ROHR, will soon commence. Mehul's "Joseph" and Rossini's "Moses in Egypt" form part of their programme. . . . The old Philadelphia Sacred Music Society is to be revived, and will "recall the days when the 'Seven Sleepers' (Löwe's Oratorio?) was the great admiration of Philadelphia." . . . THOMAS BISHOP is to give Ballad Soirées, assisted by Mr. CROSS; Sig. PERELLI will of course continue his fashionable operatic concerts, with his large class of pupils; Mr. THORBECKE will renew his classical Chamber Concerts, of piano music, string quartets, &c.; also Mr. EDWARD L. WALKER, the pianist, after long silence, enters the field of classical and popular musical evenings. So much for Philadelphia! May all that, and more, be realized.

Our Berkshire village of Pittsfield has been enjoying musical opportunities this summer. We have before us the programmes of three Soirées Musicales given by Messrs. ENSIGN and KNERINGER, teachers of music in the Young Ladies' Institute in that place. The selections, while miscellaneous and popular, are tasteful and embrace compositions, instrumental and vocal, by Haydn, Mendelssohn, Schubert, as well as by Rossini, Auber, Bishop, Balfe, &c. Verily the Musical Department, or Staff, (for it has five lines) of the Pittsfield Institute, is singularly large and formidable for a New England literary seminary. It consists of J. L. ENSIGN, Organ, Piano, Vocal Music and Harmony; A. KNERINGER, piano; J. JONES, development and culture of the voice; MME. RICHARD, piano, harp, guitar, and Miss E. L. B. CLARKE, piano. Mr. Ensign was for several years the Secretary of the New York Philharmonic Society, and the influence of such musicians must be good in the "rural districts."

RICHARD WAGNER is again in Zurich, more quietly settled apparently than he has left the hypercritical world in London. The article which we borrow from the Musical Review in another column, shows that those who know about his music, even though they agree not with his theories, talk about him very differently from the Athenæum, Times and London Musical World. . . . We had not room last week, or we should have asked our readers to compare the passages in Prof. LOBE's "Conversations with MENDELSSOHN", where that master speaks of certain compositions of his which he never wished to see the light, with the still reiterated bark of the London critics at his Leipsic executors, because they refrain from publishing all that he left in manuscript. (See in the same number, the piece headed "Droll Blanders").

The following statistics of the German Theatre, which we translate from a German paper, are not without interest. There are in Germany 165 theatres, including 19 real Court theatres, 12 town theatres of the first rank, 28 town theatres of the second rank, 39 town theatres of the third rank, and 67 travelling companies, 20 of which are of good reputation and financially flourishing. The amount of business done in the theatres of the first rank is reckoned at 100—400,000 thalers; in the larger town and smaller Court theatres at 80—100,000 thalers; in the smaller town theatres at 36—50,000 thalers, and in the smaller establishments, which are open only in the winter season, at 6—20,000 thalers. The number of players, singers and dancers who reside in Germany runs up to 6,000; the number of chorists, orchestra members, stage-officials, costumers, &c., to 8,000.—With regard to salaries it is approximatively estimated that the principal artists, who receive 2,500—6,000, or 4,000 to 12,000 thalers, number about 50. The average pay in court and town theatres of the first rank to artists who take the first parts, is 1,000—2,500 thalers; the second characters average 500—1000 thalers. Good town theatres and smaller court theatres, regarded as a second category, pay for the first rôles 800—2,000 thalers, for the second 400—600 thalers. Theatres of the third rank pay for the first rôles 400—800 thalers (at the maximum for first tenor and prima donna 1,000 thalers), for second rôles 250—400 thalers. In travelling companies the maximum wages are from 40 to 60 thalers per month, the minimum from 12 to 15. Members of orchestra and chorus commonly get between 14 and 24 thalers, and 16—36 florins.

The Royal Italian Opera in London closed its successful season on the 9th of August, with the eighth performance of L'Etoile du Nord. MEYERBEER seems to have quite monopolized the stage during the last weeks. GRISI and MARIO made their last appearance, July 28th, in the Huguenots; the Athenæum charitably hopes it will be Grisi's very last; the World has no doubt of her re-engagement; the Times says of Mario: "His voice has been in such order as not to have failed him on any occasion; and it is gratifying to be able to add that he has not once disappointed the subscribers and the public. The singing of this accomplished tenor becomes every day more refined, and his keen dramatic intelligence has kept pace with his vocal progress." On the 31st the Prophète was performed, and again Aug. 2, with Mme. VIARDOT, Mlle. MARAI and Sig. TAMBERLIK. On the 8th ROSSINI's Otello was given for the only time this season, VIARDOT, TAMBERLIK and GRAZIANI being principals.

LISZT at Weimar is arranging choruses to Herder's Prometheus for concert performance. . . . MME. JENNY LIND GOLDSCHMIDT lately gave a concert at Ems, with MME. CLARA SCHUMANN, for the benefit of ROBERT SCHUMANN, who is again in a state of almost hopeless insanity. . . . Musical matters get out of joint sometimes even in more musical cities than Boston and New York. Three great and opulent cities, Cologne, Hamburg, and Frankfort-on-the-Maine, are, at the present moment, it is said, incapable of supporting a respectable theatre. At Leipsic, too, the theatre is closed.

An extract from an English soldier's letter from the Crimea is affecting, and affords a remarkable instance of a man singing his own dirge:

The other night I was in the intrenchments, and a good number of us were sitting together amusing ourselves. One was singing a song called "Mary, weep no more for me," in which occur these beautiful lines:

"Far, far from thee I sleep in death,
So, Mary, weep no more for me," when a shell came in, burst among us, and killed the man while he was singing the song.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, SEPT. 1, 1855.

Musical One-Idea-ism.

We have to remark upon a few more of "Counterpoint's" strange statements under the head of "Hints Concerning Church Music" in the Transcript, copied in full in our last number. The drift of his whole series of communications, we have seen, has been to the setting up of a certain exceedingly exclusive Anglo-Catholic standard of Church Music. MOZART and HAYDN, all the Italians, all the Germans (except only HANDEL, whom he classes among Englishmen!), to say nothing of our native anthem and psalm-wrights, have produced nothing worthy to be sung at holy times, while a few old English composers, of the time of Queen Elizabeth, were pre-ordained to make the only legitimate religious music for all peoples of all ages since then and to come! That, so far as it is possible to gather his meaning, seems to be the amount of it.

4. After snubbing those young men and women who sing Haydn's and Mozart's Masses, by way of musical and social pleasure and improvement, he recommends as better exercise the practice of the "fine old English glees and madrigals." Fine they are, many of them, doubtless, in their way—learned, contrapuntal, full of fugue, and often built upon good English words, though quite as often on the silliest love stanzas. But that they are less liable to the objection of artificiality and of desire to please, than are the Masses, may be questioned. Moreover our friend forgets that the Madrigal, as such, was not of English, but Italian origin. Palestrina and others wrote Madrigals, long before the form was grafted upon English musical culture. This is only one of many instances in which he will find that in showing up the superiority of his favorite English music, he is by that very act endorsing something which he dreads as "foreign."

5. We wish all of "Counterpoint's" remarks were as sensible as those upon learning to sing English well. There is no questioning the truth of what he says of the importance of distinct articulation. But to assume that the study of German or Italian necessarily unfits one for the articulation of English, is to go too far. Articulation is an essential of good singing in whatever language, and he who cultivates it in one will be less inclined to slight it in another. Have you not seen that foreigners, in seeking to acquire our language, articulate distinctly to a fault? Still more extravagant it is to assume that all the elements of the true school of Song are necessarily to be found among those who can best teach how to keep English words distinct in singing. We should rather seek the school of Song among those nations who are most full of the spirit, of the genius of Song,—that is, in the most musical nations. In this connection the writer honors our Journal with a mention, in a paragraph so curiously perplexed and full of non sequiturs, that we must copy it again.

A writer in Dwight's Journal of Music complains of the indistinctness of musical utterance with some of our popular vocalists, "insomuch that one might be led to conjecture that the use of singing was to stifle words." No doubt; but is not this a strange complaint, coming as it does from a source which denies the existence of any English school of music? Who can ever forget the greatness of expression, the largeness of style, the wonderful effect, which characterized the singing of those famous exponents of the English school, Braham, Phillips and Anna Bishop. What, "no English school, but only singers of English?" What can such an opinion be worth, when it comes from a person who professes his ignorance of English church music; of that which is the very head and front of all music, and in which Handel took great delight; indeed, he was an Englishman in everything save the accident of birth.

How any possible opinion with regard to an alleged English school of music should disqualify one for requiring distinct musical utterance in singers, whether English, German or Italian, is beyond our feeble comprehension. We cannot see that the two things are in any way connected. We do not remember where or when we may have used the expression quoted, but are willing to suppose that in some connection we did use it. What has an opinion about the artistic, musical merits of a certain class of composers to do with an opinion about the technical requirements of good singing—essentially the same in every language? But if we have chanced to say there was "no English school" of singing, "but only singers of English," have we thereby denied that those who sing in English ought to sing distinctly? What could our remark mean but this: that singing, while it has to do with words, has more essentially to do with music, and that the singing of English words, in however English a way, does not constitute an English school of music; since a peculiarly English and original character of musical genius would be requisite for that. In singing, however, there is but one school, from which all nations have derived the true traditions; and that is the Italian; and it is none the less Italian, that Braham, Bishop, &c., have applied it happily to English words.

6. We cannot indeed profess any very intimate acquaintance with the old English Church music, or even with the more modern English Church music, which Mr. Hogarth, in the passages cited by "Counterpoint," extols upon the ground of its entirely unprogressive character. "Counterpoint" goes still further, goes the whole length, and calls this English Church music "the very head and front of all music"! Then there is more musical genius, more inspiration, more of the highest qualities of Art in the severely traditional and antique style of those services sung and chanted in the English Church, than in the sublimest works of Bach and Handel and Mozart and Beethoven! But if it be so, why has not their charm penetrated further? why has not their potency been felt beyond the limits of a Church? why have they not interested the outsiders, as the Masses written by great masters for the Romish Church have done? why has not Germany, so all-accepting and hospitable to works of genius from all quarters, been forward to appreciate them, as she did the English Shakspeare? No! their glory was "adhering to the exclusive ecclesiastical style." It is in this exclusiveness that "Counterpoint" and Hogarth find their merit, and not in their intrinsic charm, originality, sublimity as music. To rule out all that ever grew outside the English Church walls, and then call the English the "head and front" of all music, is a convenient way of making out a case. Why, among Englishmen themselves is any strictly English music half as much admired, as Handel's, or more latterly, as Beethoven's and Mendelssohn's?—Does England owe to her Tallises and Byrds, in any thing like the degree she owes to Handel's residence in England, her high estimation of the Art, her great Birmingham and Norwich festivals, her numbers of accomplished organists, her Philharmonic Societies, her patronage of "foreign" artists and composers, (in which no country ever went so far, O "Counterpoint," as England), and all that makes her in any sense a musical nation at this day? Are Handel's choruses at all like those old august Elizabethans whom you make the "head and front" of all? Have they their prototypes in anything that any Englishman composed before him? On the contrary is not the modern English music (so far as it runs not after later German and Italian models) all full of Handel, echoes and reflections of his mighty genius?—Handel an Englishman!

THE BOSTON MUSIC HALL.—Upon this subject, the writer of the following, as all will see by his initials, is certainly entitled to a hearing.

For Dwight's Journal of Music.

It has been a painful and surprising thing to see, that in the justly condemning newspaper articles upon the proposed "Baby Show," not a word has been said against the desecration of a building mis-called Music Hall, and in the construction of which some few of the persons who aided, supposed that the building if ever used for any other than musical purposes, would find in those purposes worthily associated aims and objects.

That any Exhibitions or Discourses connected with sister Arts, or Sciences, or Charitable purposes, or even that innocent festivities should there be allowed, would neither have offended nor roused the most delicate susceptibilities—for it is perhaps too much to expect, that in our new country so noble a building could be exclusively consecrated to its legitimate and ostensible purpose. But that the building which was to serve as a Temple, should be thus profaned, and the profanation passed over in silence, would be a disgrace to Boston and those few Bostonians who love Art for Art's sake. Far better sell the building, and thereby acknowledge the fact that the public do not feel enough for Art to make such a building yet necessary among us, than let it, under the name of Music Hall, be used for low and catch-penny exhibitions. If the money changers cannot be chased from the Temple, let it be sold and be called by another name, and let all in who will pay the price—but do not let us act a falsehood, and call it by a wrong name. Let not the master works of the great composers be heard in a building which will ever after merit the name of Barnum's Nursery.

CONCERT AT THE NAHANT HOTEL.—Mrs. J. H. LONG, assisted by Mr. ARTHURSON, and Mr. SOUTHARD as pianist, gave a very pleasant concert at this fine hotel, on Saturday evening last, to quite a large audience. The programme was an excellent one of the lighter sort, and both vocalists were in excellent voice, though the room (the dining hall) was by no means well adapted for musical effects, which seemed in one instance to tell somewhat on the accuracy of intonation of the lady. ROSSINI's exquisite duet: Mira la bianca luna was exquisitely given by both artists, and seemed rarely appropriate for the evening, which was bright with the brightest of full moons, whose light was reflected doubly glorious in the sparkling waters. The steamer Nelly Baker made an extra trip, returning after the concert, with a goodly number of passengers tempted by the good music and the pleasant sail to spend the evening at this delightful place.

A choice little band of some of our best musicians is engaged there for the summer by Mr. Stevens, who leaves nothing undone that can promote the comfort and enjoyment of his guests. We heard them one evening and were much pleased with the excellence of the performance of this little band, and the good taste of their selections. Mr. KREBS of the Mendelssohn Quintette Club is their leader.

SIGNOR AUGUSTO BENDELARI

WILL be ready to receive pupils by the beginning of September. He may be addressed at the rooms of Messrs. Chickering & Sons, or at Richardson's Musical Exchange, until October 1st, after which time at his residence, No 86 Pineknay Street.

Signor BENDELARI proposes to form a class of young ladies in singing, for beginners only, to commence about the middle of October, and meet twice a week, in the Messrs Chickering's Saloon.

NEW COURSE OF HARMONY, BY L. H. SOUTHARD.

The Publishers call the attention of the musical profession to this work, as one eminently calculated to lighten the labors of the teacher, and rapidly advance the pupil. It is emphatically a PRACTICAL work, serving both as a Manual of instruction on the one hand, and a Text-book on the other; and it is believed that the peculiar arrangement of the work, together with the very large number of exercises and examples, presents great advantages, to both scholar and teacher, over any similar work of the kind. Teachers highly commend the work. Mr. WILLIAM MASON says it is a work unsurpassed in the language. Mr. GEORGE J. WEBB says that it is a work perspicuous in diction, methodical in arrangement, and sufficiently copious to embrace all the essentials of the general doctrine of accord. It can be ordered through any respectable Music-seller, and will be sent through the mail on the receipt of the price, ($1.75,) postage prepaid.

NEW AESTHETIC JOURNAL.

THE CRAYON,

A Weekly Paper devoted to ART, offers itself to the attention of all who are interested in the elevating and refining influences of Beauty. Among the contributors to THE CRAYON already are BRYANT, LOWELL, STREET, REMBRANDT PALE, A. B. DURAND, President of the National Academy of Design, DANIEL HUNTINGTON, HENRY K. BROWN, and amongst those engaged are LONGFELLOW, BAYARD TAYLOR, GEO. W. CURTIS, REV. H. W. BEECHER, REV. SAMUEL OSOON, REV. H. W. BELLows, Hon. CHARLES SUMNER, and others of our most eminent writers. A series of papers by RUSKIN, and essays left by the eminent sculptor, HORATIO GREENOUGH, add to the interest of The Crayon.

From the Cincinnati Gazette.

We have already strongly recommended THE CRAYON, and every succeeding number proves it to be more and more worthy of all we have said in its praise. No journal, devoted to Art, has ever been so ably conducted, in this country; and if it meets with the support it so richly deserves, we have no doubt that it will exert a most wholesome influence upon the taste of the country.

Conversations with Mendelssohn.

By the author of Fliegende Blätter für Musik, Leipzig, 1853.

VI.

"We have read and heard a great deal lately of the influence which a composer's way of looking at the world exercises on his works," I said to Mendelssohn. "I confess that I can form no clear idea on this matter. You are a composer of the present day. What is your opinion?"

"Ah! you ask me more than I can answer," Mendelssohn replied, with a smile. "I do not possess the mania, or, if you prefer it, the talent for discovering profound combinations between heterogeneous subjects. It is certain that many things, very often apparently dissimilar, work upon, and pre-suppose one another, but it is equally true that there are others which have nothing in common, and are perfectly independent of each other. A man's way of looking at the world* and a man's way of looking at Art† are two things that have nothing in common, and exercise no reciprocal influence upon each other."

"What you say is exactly the reverse of what is now asserted by a great many really thinking minds," I replied.

"I cannot help it," said Mendelssohn, shrugging his shoulders. "After all, did you ever know a composer who gave utterance to this opinion, or agreed with it?"

"I must own that I never did," I answered.

"There, you see!" said Mendelssohn, "and yet we also ought to be consulted on the matter."

"But the proofs for the opinion in question have been deduced from the works of composers," I replied. "There is Beethoven, for instance—"

"Has put his way of looking at the world in a score—is not that it?" inquired Mendelssohn.

"So it is said," I replied. "Is the idea then quite destitute of reality, quite contrary to experience?"

"In my opinion, completely—utterly," said Mendelssohn. "The expression: the way of looking at the world, means, I presume, nothing more than how a man thinks respecting the occurrences of the world, what he holds of them—what his views are with regard to them. Out of these views are formed a man's sentiments for or against the things of this world. The democrat is not pleased with the present political system, because he does not deem it in accordance with his ideas of government. He wants it to be arranged after his notion, and from this proceed his sentiments, a hatred for everything and every one that differ from or oppose this idea of his. Suppose now, Beethoven had possessed such a way of looking at political matters, and such sentiments in conjunction with it, and that he had consequently fostered a feeling of hate in his mind, what influence do you suppose such a mode of looking at matters and such sentiments exercised upon him when composing his Pastoral Symphony?"

"You very cleverly select one phenomenon of his, that is adverse to the proposition. I will remind you, on the other hand, in favor of it, of his Eroica. We know that he wished to celebrate Napoleon as the hero of the Revolution, and as a republican, and that he tore up the title, on hearing that the Consul had created himself Emperor."

"You reproach me with the same thing in which you indulge yourself," said Mendelssohn. "I adduce one phenomenon against, and you, one phenomenon for—if, by the way, I admit that the music of the Eroica is democratic music, that is, music of such a kind, that by hearing it we could perceive Beethoven's democratic views and sentiments. I should like to know whether you could ever learn them from the music, supposing you to be unacquainted with the title and anecdote in question? Besides these two symphonies, however, Beethoven has written seven others, as well as a certain number of quartets, quintets, trios, sonatas, overtures, masses, an oratorio, and an opera, and in them, as far as we actually know, portrayed a mass of subjects and things which have absolutely naught in common with democratic views and sentiments. What democracy is there in Christus am Oelberge—in Fidelio—and in many other of his works?"

"You will, at any rate, grant," I observed, "that no artist can step out of his own period, which consequently exercises an influence on him?"

"Certainly, I will," replied Mendelssohn, "but that, instead of refuting, merely confirms my views. When people say the artist is a child of his own times, it means, he cannot step beyond the way of looking at Art followed in his own times. If a man at the present day composes a symphony, he has not got Pleyel, Dittersdorf, Wolf, etc., but Mozart and Beethoven before his mind. Beethoven wrote as he did, because the works of Haydn and Mozart were the guiding stars in his day; but he took some of his musical thoughts from the political or religious spirit of his day, did he? Can you, for instance, tell, from hearing his symphony in B \flat , or the one in F major, that the Revolution had broken out in France? All the religious and political opinions of the day never inspired him with the idea of employing the clarinets, oboes, flutes, horns, etc., in such and such a manner, or of working out a theme thematically after this or that fashion; but he heard these means so employed in the works of his models, he read them in their scores, he abstracted from them the maxims for his own guidance, and, in his own way, still further developed and practised them."

"But we see," replied I, "poets, for instance, who are properly called political poets, since, in their poems, they treat of political subjects of the day."

"Poets may do so, if they choose," replied Mendelssohn; "but such effusions are merely speeches in rhyme; the goddess of poetry has naught to do with them. Moreover, a composer has no business to interfere with political and party opinions on state affairs, but must busy himself with feeling—purely human feeling—if he would work upon the entire body of musical humanity. The artist should be objective and universal. He must be capable of portraying circumstances of every kind as well as the feelings arising from them with equal truth and faithfulness—to-day a rebellion, and to-morrow an idyll, and to call up in his own breast all the notions and passions belonging to them. If the worldly views and opinions of his time commanded him, he would not be a free creator in Art, but a shackled slave."

"The artist, when creating, flies from everyday life, with its conflicting interests, and enters the higher and rich sphere of Art. What reciprocal influence do you suppose is at work in the case of a political fanatic at the moment he has to set a love-air to music? Can he, at such an instant, think of his democratic or aristocratic opinions, or arouse the hatred within his breast, and, with this feeling, proceed to the musical portrayal of the love of a gentle girl?"

"He would certainly produce a strange piece of music," I observed.

"An artist," continued Mendelssohn, "must, in the hour of creation, be that which he wishes to represent; that alone; that, and nothing but that. His sentiments may to-day agree with any subject, and to-morrow completely differ from it. Goethe is said to have been an aristocrat. Supposing this is true, in Götz von Berlichingen and Egmont there is not the slightest trace of any such sentiments. In those works, his heart appears to have glowed for freedom. What sentiments, then, produced Iphigenia—what, the Wahlverwandtschaften—what, the Tasso? Whatever political convictions Goethe may have entertained, however, it was not they which furnished him with the ideas in his works—the subjects of the latter did so."

"I perfectly agree with you," I replied, "but then we must ask the question: Whence can an idea come, and find so many believers, when there is, in reality, nothing true in it?"

"It comes from a one-sided view of things," replied Mendelssohn. "Because Auber wrote La Muette de Portici, Beethoven, the Sinfonia Eroica, and Rossini Guillaume Tell, people hit upon the notion of a political system of music, and demonstrated that the above composers were under the necessity of producing these works, in consequence of their political views and the times in which they lived. The fact of Auber's having composed a Maurer und Schlosser, and Fra Diavolo, Rossini, Otello, Tancredi, etc., and Beethoven a hundred works which have nothing at all to do with the political mode of looking at the world, is passed over in complete silence."

* Weltanschauung.

† Kunstanschauung.

"If your reasoning is correct," I replied, "we may draw a more comprehensive conclusion from it. Because the artist's works have been considered dependent on his mode of looking at the world, many persons wish to bring the course pursued by Art generally into necessary connection with the course followed by our religious and political life; political and religious ideas are developed after this or that fashion, and, consequently, music must be developed after this or that fashion also. Händel was obliged to write in his day in the manner he did, because the life of the period was what it was. Gluck, Haydn, Mozart, and so on, were obliged to write as they did, in obedience to the path pursued by people generally and universally in their mode of looking at the world at that epoch."

"An opinion which is as untenable as that on the works of the individual artist," said Mendelssohn. "Beethoven's genius for music did not come into the world for the first time with Beethoven. It is probable that it had existed several times, at earlier and different epochs. But it found other predecessors, other models, and other modes of looking at Art. People admit Goethe's assertion that an artist, coming ten years earlier or later than he did, would have been a different person, that is to say, in so far as he would have met with other views of Art, which would have worked differently upon his development, and then again they would make the course pursued by Art dependent on that followed by the world. That Beethoven's genius manifested itself as it did, was dependent simply on the order in which he appeared. Had he lived in Händel's days, he would not have been our Beethoven. He would have been different before Haydn and Mozart. Haydn and Mozart would have been different had they lived after Beethoven. This would have so happened, whatever the world might have been, politically, religiously, etc. No matter what dogma or political opinions had prevailed, whether there had been peace or war, absolutism, constitutionalism, or republicanism, it would have had no influence on the course of music, and that is true solely because the artist cannot expand and develop himself otherwise than in accordance with the artistic moment at which he appears. Let us suppose that, from to-day, all artistic creation were interrupted for a hundred years, while the political, the religious, and the philosophic world continued to progress without let or hindrance. Would music, on awakening from her long sleep, have gone forward with the rest of the world, and would the works of the next master be a hundred years in advance of the best works of our own times? Not one step. Under the most favorable circumstances, they would only follow in the same line as our best works, and continue the series uninterruptedly, however the world might, in the meantime, have progressed in everything else.

"In a word—the course of musical Art possesses nothing in common with the course of science, philosophy, religion, or politics; it develops itself in conformity with the laws of its rise, growth and decay."

Much to my regret, Mendelssohn now perceived a friend, whom he called, saying,

"Adieu, Mr. Grub, Auf Wiedersehen," as he stretched out his hand to me.

I had a great many objections to make against his last arguments, but I was obliged to wait for a good opportunity, as Mendelssohn was not always inclined to enter on such discussions, and, when I remarked this, I took care not to annoy him with them.

Letter from Wagner.

Willis's Musical World translates from the German the following letter which Richard Wagner wrote to a friend in Dresden respecting his withdrawal from London, where he and his works have been violently assailed by a portion of the press:—

The false reports which have been put in circulation as regards my difficulties with the directors of the Philharmonic Society, and my consequent withdrawal from London, are based entirely upon the following circumstance. After the fourth concert, as I entered the withdrawing room I met several friends to whom I communicated the annoyance I felt, that I had ever consented to direct that kind of concert; a matter which, as a general thing, does not at all come within my sphere. These endless programmes, with their masses of vocal and instrumental pieces, weary me and torture my æsthetic feeling; I ought to have foreseen the impossibility of introducing any change or amelioration to this established order of things; and this thought increased a discontent, which rested upon the mere fact that I had undertaken a thing of the kind, not on my relations in London, and least of all on a public, which always had received me in a friendly and distinguished manner and oftentimes with great warmth. Quite indifferent to me, on the other hand, was the abuse of London critics, who only proved by their attacks that I had omitted to bribe them. Indeed, it always amused me to observe how they still left a door open, in order upon the slightest approach on my part to change their tactics:—a step, of course, which I never thought of taking.

On the evening in question, it had made me fairly indignant, that after the A major symphony of Beethoven I had to direct a poor vocal piece and a trivial overture by Onslow; and, (as I generally am in these matters,) I indignantly declared aloud to my friends my dissatisfaction, and that on the morrow I should take my dismissal and return home. Accidentally a German singer was present: he heard my expressions and carried them immediately, still warm, to a newspaper writer. Since this time the reports are circulating in German papers which have deceived you. I need not tell you that the persuasions of my friends who accompanied me home, turned me, subsequently, from my somewhat hasty determination.

Since then, my Tannhäuser overture has been finely played in the fifth concert, and well received by the public; although not fully understood. It was therefore the more pleasant to me that the Queen (which very seldom happens, and not every year) had signified her intention of being present at the seventh concert, and ordered a repetition of the overture. It was in itself a very pleasant thing that the Queen overlooked my exceedingly compromised political position* (which with great malignity was openly alluded to in the Times), and without fear attended a public performance which I directed: but her further conduct toward me infinitely compensated for all the disagreeable circumstances and coarse enmities which I had heretofore encountered. She and Prince Albert, who sat in front next the orchestra, applauded after the Tannhäuser overture, which closed the first part, with almost inviting warmth, so that the public broke forth into lively and sustained applause. During the intermission the Queen sent for me in the saloon and received me in presence of her suite with these words: "I am most happy to make your acquaintance. Your composition has charmed me." She thereupon made further inquiries (in a long conversation in which Prince Albert took part,) as to my other compositions; and asked if it were not possible to translate my operas into Italian. I had, of course, to give the negative to this, and state that my stay here could only be temporary, as the only position open was the direction of a concert-institute; which was properly not my affair. At the close of the concert the Queen and the Prince again in the most friendly manner applauded me.

I communicate this to you because it may please you, and allow you, with pleasure, further to communicate what I have written, as I see how much error and malice as to my stay in London there is to correct and expose. On the 25th of June is the last concert and I leave here on the 26th, in order at last to resume my long-interrupted work, in home retirement.

TIME'S OURE.

Mourn, O! rejoicing heart!
The hours are flying,
Each one some treasure takes,
Each one some blossom breaks,
And leaves it dying;
The chill dark night draws near,
The sun will soon depart,
And leave thee sighing;
Then mourn, rejoicing heart,
The hours are flying!

Rejoice! O! grieving heart,
The hours fly past,
With each some sorrow dies,
With each some shadow flies,
Until at last
The red dawn in the east
Bids weary night depart,
And pain is past.
Rejoice, then, grieving heart,
The hours fly fast!

A New Life of Gluck.

Christopher Willibald von Gluck, his Life and Music—[Christopher, &c.] By Anton Schmid. Leipsic, Fleischer; London, Williams & Norgate.

There are few subjects in the records of Art richer in anecdote or fuller of material for speculation than the life and the works of Gluck. We are, therefore, grateful for the opportunity which this biography affords us anew to study that giant in stage-music, and the influences exercised by his genius. It is true that Herr Schmid's volume is wearily prosy:—a mass of dry material heaped up by one who thinks much of his own accuracy, and who comprehends little of the humanity of his subject. Any future writer, however, desiring to treat the lives of the great musicians in a less technical and exclusive fashion, will find his collections of value.

Without re-writing this book, it would be difficult to do its contents justice, still more to touch upon all the points which, if well treated, might have made the biography of Gluck as various in amusement as it is in instruction.—To begin at the beginning, there was more to be told concerning the boyhood and training of the child than Herr Schmid has managed to tell us. A South German writer, having a moderate share of acuteness, and due acquaintance with national manners, might have forgotten the Royal Library of Vienna for a few pages, in order to set before us a picture of Bohemian village life. We would hand over to the Appendix the heap of minute documents by which our author establishes his rectification of the date of Gluck's birth—the 2nd of July, 1714—if we might have their space filled by some lively picture of the world in which his genius struggled its way upwards. His father, who was a forester, living at Weidenwang, near Neumarkt, in the Ober-Palatinate, seems to have been merely a peasant; and as such, only able to give his son the average peasant's schooling. The child, Herr Schmid tells us, was hardened by being made to accompany his father through the wood bare-footed, even in winter weather. He was placed, from his twelfth to his eighteenth year, in the Jesuit seminary at Komotau. There he picked up some rudiments of musical education, learned to play on some instruments, and to assist in singing the Mass. Like the more promising order of country musicians, little Gluck found employment at holiday times in travelling round from village to village to assist in making such music as might be wanted. How differently are our composers trained now-a-days! We would gladly have seen tabulated, for their benefit, a few more of the facts and traits of this harsh and primitive life, and this rude and limited teaching,—in spite of which the boy managed to find some learning, and to get some reputation. Next come hints (for Herr Schmid's notices amount to little more) of his giving a concert on the violinello, and of the manner in which his musical promise attracted the attention of the Lobkowitz family, into whose service Forester Gluck had entered. Under the auspices of these Bohemian nobles, Christopher was removed to Prague, where he sang and played in the Theatre Church, under the conduct of "the famous composer and organist, Czernohorsky." This professor is reported to have been one of the greatest Bohemian musicians of his time, who, after having served in the Church of St. Anthony of Padua, with its four organs, returned to Prague, where he trained many distinguished pupils,—among whom were Segert, Czeslaus, Tuma, and Zach. Master and pupils are now alike forgotten! But the above meagre notice, derived from the 'Biographie' of M. Fétis, indicates that a page might have been judiciously devoted to Gluck's preceptor by Herr Schmid. While under the wing of the noble patronage referred to, Czernohorsky's most famous scholar was heard by Count Melzi, a Lombard nobleman, who was so captivated by the youth's talent as to nominate him chamber-musician,—to take him to Milan,—and to place him under Sammartini for the completion of his education. By filling up these naked outlines, any one having due understanding of the privileges of a biographer could have made lively and instructive pictures,—and this without resorting to the style conjectural, so felicitously but so fallaciously employed by Godwin, in his 'Life of Chaucer.' But of the features or humors which would give his subject universal interest, Herr Schmid seems to have a profound disregard or a provoking ignorance; and the reader is left for himself to divine how, betwixt the imperfections of home-training and sudden exposure to the ripening influence of Italy, one of the most individual geniuses whom the world has ever seen was placed in circumstances where development became possible.

Certain critics and thinkers, who have declared that Gluck never was a perfect physician (in the degree to which Bach, Handel, Haydn, Mozart and Mendelssohn may be described as perfect), might refer the alleged limitations of his knowledge to the restricted opportunities of his early years, followed by that incessant course of stage production which gives the master no time to complete his scholarship on that stern and solid basis of contrapuntal knowledge, without which there is no musical salvation or omnipotence. Other observations, of more than universal interest, are suggested by the facts of Gluck's career.

Those enthusiasts who maintain that youth has the monopoly of the brightest outpourings of genius,—who demand that imagination should manifest itself in one form and at one epoch in life,—and who thus discourage all such aspirants in Art as cannot arrive at originality till after time has brought them experience,—must be considerably puzzled by the example of Gluck. Let us run over the list of his operas. The first, 'Artaserse,' was produced in 1741. To this followed, 'Demafonte,' 'Demetrio,' 'Ipermestra,' 'Fedra,' 'Poro.' Next came, 'La Caduta dei Giganti,' which was written for London, in glorification of our Duke of Cumberland's victory over the Pretender in 1745. On this opera the English critic may excusably pause, since its production not merely marked an epoch in its writer's progress, but connects itself with the story of music and manners in England by more than one link. Gluck assured Burney that he was led, during his short stay in England, to study the power wielded by Handel, who, having given up operas, was then writing 'Judas,' in commemoration of "Culloden Field," and that this study induced him to alter and to simplify his own manner. But Gluck's study must have been carried on in fear and trembling. Those were days when the London people could behave ferociously to foreigners, and an opera riot was expected on the night when 'La Caduta' was to be played first. This was averted; nevertheless, the opera did not succeed. Politics ran high in the world of fashion. State trials and executions for high treason involved and interested a good third of the noble patrons of the musical drama. Then Lord Middlesex, the responsible manager, seems to have had the usual amount of managerial capital and integrity. He quarrelled with every one, save his own favorite dancer,—and shut the Opera House without paying his artists. Gluck's opera, however, was strongly cast, including, among other artists, Signora Frasi, Monticelli (an artificial soprano), and Jozzi, the same singer who subsequently palmed off Alberti's 'Harpsichord Lessons' on the London amateurs as his own compositions. La Violetta too (afterwards Mrs. Garrick) danced in the ballet. Their names are merely strung together, to suggest the amount of matter which a biography like this might have yielded had it been thoroughly wrought out and genially studied. Similar anecdotes and recollections might possibly have been gathered with regard to other of the following long list of his forgotten productions. The operas produced by Gluck after he left England were, 'Artamene,' 'Piramo e Tisbe,' 'La Semiramide Riconosciuta,' 'Telemacco,' 'La Clemenza di Tito,' 'Le Cinesi,' 'Il Trionfo di Camilla,' 'Antigono,' 'La Danza,' 'airs for a pastoral,' 'Les Amours Champêtres,' 'L'Innocenza Giustificata,' 'Il Re Pastore,' new airs for a comic opera, 'Le Chinois poli en France,' new tunes for a 'Déguiseement Pastorale,' airs for 'L'Isle de Merlin,' for 'La Fausse Esclave,' for 'Cythérée Assiégée,' for 'L'Yvrogne Corrigé,' 'Tetide,' and airs for 'Le Cadi dupé.' Here we have twenty years of labor, and it is not till we come to 1761—till the master was forty-seven years of age—that we arrive at the first theatrical production by him which makes any specific figure in musical history. This is what Dr. Burney calls "the famous ballet of 'Don Juan,'" which, however famous in its time, has been only of late inquired after as a curiosity, because antiquaries have hinted that this ballet contains suggestions afterwards wrought out in Mozart's immortal opera. Twenty years of little-prized toil, and partial success,—thirty important stage works had not worn into nothingness the invention of this great inventor,—nor, so far as we know, had indicated the course which it would ultimately take. The few fragments of Gluck's earlier opera music which have reached us seem timid and stiff, constructed to suit the mode, but without such fascination of melody or choiceness of figurative passage as were studied by or came unsought to the Italian composers who then commanded the European stages,—Hasse, Jomelli, and others.—For it may be observed, parenthetically, that Handel's operas, in which may be discerned the germ of a nobler manner, did not travel far from our capital, where they were written.—Gluck then was destined to illustrate a principle entirely opposed to the canons of those who apportion set seasons in a poet's life to Imagination's seed-time and harvest. He might have been sent into the world to show that persistence is one element of originality and individuality,—that, whereas some arrive quickly, others only reach the goal after timid and halting steps, wearily interrupted.

When, however, the goal was reached by the production of 'Alceste,' the master took his place like a giant among giants—a place from which no subsequent caprices and changes of Art—no innovations, no discoveries, no revolutions in the schools of vocal or orchestral music have been able to move him. The four Greek operas of Gluck,—his 'Orfeo,' 'Alceste,' and two 'Iphigenias,' and his fairy opera 'Armide,' have withstood the assaults of time better than any other serious stage-music in existence, Mozart's 'Don Juan' excepted. It is true that they are not heard perpetually. Antique and classical dramas are, possibly, not to be established as a frequent attraction with the opera-goers of Europe. But Shakespeare's 'Coriolanus,' though it is not often performed, keeps the stage,—and Gluck's four Greek operas rise, in music, to the height of that play, in drama. Let them be compared with the Greek opera of Gluck's more popular successor—the 'Idomeneo' of Mozart—and the later work will sound mannered and obsolete,—less grandiose, though more elaborate,—less striking in the beauty and majesty of its forms, though more luxurious in the color with which every portion of it is suffused. These great operas of Gluck can be sparingly presented, because such artists as the public would now accept for tragic heroes and heroines are rare. We cannot believe that Mdle. Sophie Arnould and M. M. Legros and Larriée, who were the beloved of Paris in the days when the "urlo Francese" had not ceased to be the reproach of French singers, would now be endured there for the most admirable show of dramatic propriety. Since Madame Milder's death there has been no prima donna in Germany capable of satisfying eye and ear in these difficult but grand characters. Madame Schroeder-Devrient was too romantic; Mdle. Wagner hardly possesses the requisite voice, being a soprano by force, and not by nature. Remembering the admirable singing of Mdle. Lind in 'La Vestale' of Spon-tini, we might have looked for a rendering of Gluck's daughter-heroine, if not his wife-heroine, had she remained on the stage, and had she been willing to work in operas of combination; but where has been the Orestes or the Admetus fit to appear with her,—where the poet, tragedian, and singer in one? And yet, wretchedly as these operas are under-sung and under-acted by the flashy, violent, thoughtless folk who now are (and, possibly, have always been) the staple members of operatic companies, it is observable that wherever Gluck's music is given with general care and scenic propriety (as at Berlin) their effect is as great as it was at the first moment of their appearance. Our own columns have recorded, on the testimony of correspondents totally different in training, taste, and temperament, the rapture (such word is no caricature) excited by the Prussian presentments of 'Armide' and 'Alceste.' If Gluck's five operas are not more frequently given, it is not because they have grown old, so much as because executive art has sunk low, and because a taste for the poetical and antique is not a paying commodity for which managers cater, and to meet which artists educate themselves.

(Conclusion next week.)

For Dwight's Journal of Music.

Somewhat from the Private Papers of Mister Brown.

BERLIN, AUG. 6, 18—

"Hoffmann says, in one of his note-books, that on the eleventh of March, at half past eight o'clock, precisely, he was an ass."—Hyperion, Book III. chap. 2.

This afternoon, one hour before sundown, I was the same! How could I have been so foolish?

Now the thing was on this wise, and this was the manner thereof—but, not too fast.

He that takes a donkey to ascend the Drachenfels, pays a donkey price; for doth he not take the donkey with all its donkey nature, and habits, and feelings, and affections, and dispositions, and obstinacies and notions and humors? And does he not make himself subject "to his cholera, and his moods, and his displeasures, and his indignations?" If then (for four-legged and two-legged asses oftentimes reason differently) the quadruped decides to stop, and all argument of whip and club from rider and donkey-boy prove ineffectual to start him, and thereupon the rider loses his equilibrium of temper—does not the biped become the greater ass of the two? Though there be other and greater differences between them than the mere number of legs and length of ears, have they not met upon the common ground of donkeyism? Quod erat demonstrandum. Why then did I lose my temper and get angry with Wyzaker?

Wyzaker came over in the last steamship but one to 'do up' Europe. He has 'finished' England and Scotland—scenery, historical localities, Art, literature, everything—knows all about them; and is thus far on his way to Italy. Six weeks from to-day he will leave Havre for home, having accomplished all!

In my boyhood, when Tim or Stanly fell into a train of lofty talk, using high-sounding words, whose significance they did not understand, upon some topic of which they knew nothing, Ira Felch used to call it 'explottering.' In devising this word, Ira was a benefactor to the English language.

Wyzaker's leading 'peculiaristic' is to explotterate. No other word can convey the idea. He explotterates on the greatness, glory and 'gumption' of America and the Americans, and is a very Smellfungus to all on this side the water. But above all he explotterates upon Art. This was the topic to-day.

He came up after dinner to make me and N. a call. We had coffee, sent out for some cigars, and when all was comfortable and in order, he began. I am not going to record all his platitudes and inanities—could not if I would—nor is it necessary. After a long explotteration, highly to his own satisfaction, in which painters and paintings were discussed, as he doubtless thought, highly to our edification, I began to question him.

—You have paid a good deal of attention to pictures?

—No, not so very much. But I have a great taste that way.

—No doubt. I suppose that whatever there is worth seeing in New York, Boston, and our other cities, you have made yourself familiar with?

—Well, I can hardly say. I always calculate to see the best that comes along. But you know we have no galleries.

—There are some good things in the Boston Athenæum, are there not?

—Nothing of consequence. I was in there, one time, once when I had a leisure hour in your Athens. (Here Wyzaker smiled—he is a New Yorker.)

—You must have studied Bryan's Gallery in New York pretty thoroughly, it should seem; that is the best preparation one can have in America for the European collections.

W. I can't say that I ever was there, but I always look in upon our Art Union exhibitions. Encouragement of native talent, you know; and besides, until the stupid Court decided that it was gambling, I had a chance at a fine picture, you see. My wife wanted a season ticket to the Dusseldorf Gallery last year, and so I took a couple, and went there now and then with her.

Mister Brown. Ah! I see.

W. But one don't need seeing all these pictures. We have, sir, implanted in our nature, a perception of beauty. Like truth, beauty is eternal; it comes from the very beginning of eternity, and when we see that which has beauty, we—we—we recognize it, sir, and call it beautiful. That's it, sir!

(N. nodded his head to Wyzaker, as much as to say, so it is. I knew what was under that grave face, though.)

Mr. B. But this sentiment, or this power of appreciation, can't be developed and cultivated, I thought.

W. It is, sir: to every thinking and observing mind, not a star twinkles, nor a rose blossoms, without cultivating it, and as—

Mr. B. Stop a minute; you were discoursing, just now, about certain female figures in the Gallery here, and criticizing them rather severely. Have you studied living models?

W. Do you think a respectable man like me would patronize the model artists?

Mr. B. Not at all. But I cannot see how the star, the rose, or a landscape can develop the eternal sentiment of beauty, so as to make you a judge of the works of men whose lives were devoted to the study of the human form, in countries, too, where even a sister of an emperor would sit as a model.

W. Who was that—who was that?

Mr. B. Napoleon's sister; it is an old story.

W. In painting, just as in music, we have a natural appreciation of what is good.

Mr. B. So you are fond of music. You of course subscribe to the Philharmonic Concerts, and omit no opportunity of hearing the Oratorio, and other great performances.

W. Why, the truth is, that I don't think much of these Philharmonic concerts. It is all foreign stuff, and this talk about the grandeur of symphonies and the like, is all fudge. They never have any great singers there. I heard 'Elijah' once in Boston, and the 'Messiah' in New York. Old-fashioned music—flat—nothing stirring in it. And as these are said to be the best, I saw it was of no use to spend time and money in this way. No sir, those Jullien and Sontag and Alboni concerts are the concerts for me. The fact is, my eyes and ears are as capable of letting me know what is good as those of anybody else, and he who pretends to deny it may as well call me an ass, and done with it.

Here the Doctor turned the conversation, and Wyzaker was drawn off upon ground where he was at home. He is a shrewd business man, cunning and wary, and has grown rich. Upon business matters he talks well, but on Art—! He puts me in mind of a country parson turned editor, arguing with the Tribune on questions of political economy.

It was not long before I roundly disputed some point which he was laying down. I laugh now to think how learnedly I talked about 'change and markets, and corn-laws, and tariffs, and balance of trade, of which last I only knew that all sorts of money balances have always been against me. At last he descended upon me—not like rain upon the mown grass—more like a hawk upon a chirping squirrel. How could I know anything about such things? I who have passed my life among books and papers, in libraries, or in roaming over lakes and mountains, in writing for namby-pamby periodicals, or possibly in teaching children the spelling-book and Colburn's arithmetic? Upon this hint I spake; nay, I fear, explotterated. At all events, I exploded. My thermometer had been rising, rising, until now it was almost boiling heat. I finished my coffee, laid down my half-smoked cigar, ordered the Doctor, who was just opening his mouth to speak, to "shut up," and began:

—Now look here, Wyzaker, you are just where I want you. I am not a business man, never have been. All I know about mercantile and financial affairs is derived from books, and from my limited means of observation. You have spent your life in the counting-room and on 'change. You know Wall street, as I know my musical or my German lexicon. If I tell you I think that in this or that business matter, such or such must be the right in the case, you are perfectly satisfied with me. I may think as I please. You have no objection. But just now when, with a purpose in view, I flatly denied something you said, you became offended—rightly enough, too. You know better than I about that, and took me to task for pretending to make assertions without the previous training necessary to enable me to form a judgment. Now apply what you have just said to me to your own case. The other day Mr. A., who is also making a flying tour through Europe, was here. He had but a day to spend; he saw what he could—would gladly give more time to the works of Art here, but it was impossible. Whatever chances he had ever had of cultivating his taste he had improved, and it was a hard necessity for him, not to be able to devote so much time to the master-works of Art in France, Italy and Germany, as to be able to find out the secret of their world-wide fame, which in some cases still defied him. Such a man, God speed him!

But you—you galloped on board the vessel in New York, galloped on shore in Liverpool, galloped through Scotland and England, galloped across the channel, and hither; have galloped through the Louvre; did not think Antwerp, with its treasures of Art, worth galloping to; galloped through Cologne, and yesterday went on the gallop through the Museums here. At home you never spent an hour in your life in really trying to learn why one picture was considered better than another; but you did pay one visit once to the Boston Athenæum—have often stopped at the windows of the picture-shops, when a pretty girl's portrait was there—never went near Bryan, whose collection is the only one in America where you can compare different eras and schools of painting, and learn to feel the difference between good and bad, but did go half a dozen times to the Dusseldorf Gallery on a season ticket. And now you come over here and undertake to talk about pictures! The collection you have just mentioned, made up of the refuse, after the King, and Consul Wagner, and various rich men and galleries have had their pick—that is your standard of excellence. You talk about an eternal sentiment of beauty, a sort of unerring instinct, and yet judge of all by a single school, in which bright and flaming colors, tedious, mechanical accuracy of finish, or the humors of low life in caricature, are the principal characteristics. And the works of this school you have visited half a dozen times!

Murray's handbook says our gallery here in Berlin "is far below those of Munich and Dresden in works of first-rate excellence"—and so you turned up your nose at it yesterday; the hour you gave to some two thousand pictures being exceedingly favorable to artistic enjoyment, as it preceded a late dinner for which you were ravenous.

My quarrel with you is not because the fine works which hang on the walls of the Museum give you no pleasure. Why, they cannot do it—you are not capable of it—that is not my cause of complaint, all the saints in the mythology forbid! but that you, who are incapable of participating in the pleasure of the man of cultivated taste, as I am of sharing the grim satisfaction with which you said to your wife a month ago, "Erie is down, and Central is up, Smith has lost thirty thousand, I have made forty, I'll take a run to Europe,"—should dare to aver that all the cultivated world is wrong, and set up your Ebenezer, to which we must all do homage. This I don't like.

You have eyes and ears—enough of the latter, heaven knows! I can see and hear, and if you would only see, if you would only hear, you are as capable of learning to enjoy paintings and music as another. But first and foremost, man, for mercy's sake forget Dusseldorf. Never speak the word even, if by any circumlocution it can be avoided. I'll wager my hat—not a very good one to look at, but an astonishing one to wear, like Sam Weller's—that before ten days are past I shall meet some bland Englishman at Shangnapani's, who will begin a conversation with me (after finishing the Times, advertisements and all) with, "I had the pleasure of meeting a countryman of yours in the gallery at Dresden, who spoke often of 'the Dusseldorf Collection to New York.'" Avoid it, Wyzaker, avoid the word as you would an oath in a company of clergymen. Never forget those New Yorkers who took the English gentleman to see the Park! If you care for the good name of your country, never open your lips about Art. A donkey cannot sing. Then, too, to hear you expatiating upon Music, giving your opinion of composers with all—nay with more assurance than either of the University professors across the way, for Marx speaks carefully about them—to hear you talk about Beethoven and Mozart and Handel and Rossini, Bellini, Donizetti, is enough to make one forget hospitality and the common dictates of politeness. You, you who go to the fashionable concerts to talk and chatter, and thump with your heels and toes, and cane and umbrella, who are great at applause, only it comes in the wrong time—who did not go last evening to hear Beethoven's Fifth Symphony, because you had heard it once and found it a bore! You who once or twice in your life have been to Oratorios to hear Miss This or Madame That sing, but who have no more idea of such a work as a grand whole, than the blind man has of the heaven with all its glorious gems! You, who yawn while Miss R. plays a sonata by Beethoven, or a nocturno by Chopin, and then say, "Ah, sweet, very pretty; do you know the Carnival of Venice with variations?" You who do not know one note from another, and think the whole orchestra plays the same tune! You, who in your heart had rather hear Yankee Doodle on a hand-organ than the sublimest strains that ever made a cathedral full of worshippers weep—you set yourself up for a musical critic, and talk ex cathedra! You, who never saw an opera properly put upon the stage, with suitable orchestra and chorus; all whose opera is of but one school, cut out by one pattern and made up after one model—you undertake to argue disputed questions of the musical stage! Be a man, and say outright that you like an Ethiopian quartet better than the quartet in Rossini's Stabat Mater, and that "Sweet Home" is sweeter than all the sweetness of Italy. By this you will gain respect. You are a great man in Wall street; let that suffice. Why will you, in Art,

Try to show off classical,
And only show jackassical?

Oh, Wyzaker! I fear me much thou art an ass! a complete ass, an unmitigated ass, an ass past redemption!

Here I ceased explotterating, and Wyzaker was offended!

When Handel held the final rehearsal of the Utrecht Te Deum, he called out just before beginning, of course good-naturedly, "Gentlemen, he's a rascal (hundsfott) who makes a blunder! During the performance he was so completely carried away with the sublimity of the music and the splendor of the execution, that he forgot everything, and even the time for a number following, until the leader spoke to him. He could not overcome his emotion, and at the close, with tears running down his cheeks, said, "Gentlemen, I am the rascal."

Now Wyzaker is rich, his word has power. When he gets home he won't think much of Mr. Brown;—met him abroad—impertinent, prejudiced—he won't do much in the world, and so on.

Brown, why did you fly into a passion? You are the donkey!

Oh Dogberry and shade of Hoffmann!

Musical Chat-Chat.

The dazzling feats of virtuosity of our modern pianists and violinists were long ago characterized as the pyrotechnics of the Art. One of the masters in such magic seems to have been struck with the obviousness of the analogy. Herr STRAKOSCH has adopted for the title of his last grand composition, which figures in the programme of one of PARODI's recent concerts in New York: "Musical Rockets, a brilliant Capriccio Characteristique, composed and performed for the first time," &c. &c.

We see by an Italian paper that some of our old friends in the operatic line, long since lost sight of, members of that first Havana troupe, which gave such an impulse to Italian opera in our cities, have again turned up in Havana. The company, which was to open there last month, (of course with Trovatore), consisted of CORRADI-SETTI, VITA, the fine baritone who first taught us Verdi's Carlo Magno, CARANTI VITA, his wife, together with a contralto and tenor, Signora CACCIATORI and Signor TIBERIO (or TIBERINI), not associated with them in our memory.

Miss ADELAIDE PHILLIPS is reported in London, where she was soon to appear in public; we hear privately, however, that she has taken passage home to Boston. The London Illustrated News in a review of the Italian Opera season at Covent Garden, says: "Mlle. BOSIO was much before the public, and is a greater favorite than ever. As Zerlina, Elvira, Adina, and above all, Catharine, she has delighted every body by the charms of her person, the beauty of her voice, her brilliant yet delicate execution, and her grace and animation as an actress." . . . On the 13th ult. there was a full rehearsal of COSTA's new oratorio, "Eli," at Hanover Square Rooms (London). The principals, VIARDOT GARCIA, CASTELLAN, SIMS REEVES, HERR FORMES, and WEISS, and the entire orchestra and chorus from the city were present. Costa himself conducted, and the Illustrated says of it: "We have no hesitation in saying that this oratorio will take its place among the greatest works of its kind that have appeared since the days of HANDEL. The subject and incidents are contained in the first four chapters of the Book of Samuel, the poem being from the pen of Mr. BARTHOLOMEW, (who gave MENDELSSOHN his 'Elijah' book,) who has produced a sacred drama full of grandeur, beauty and pathos. The music is worthy of the subject. It is highly original, combining the graceful, flowing melody of the Italian school, with the force, depth and solidity of the great German masters."

The great master of the violin, DE BERTOT, the husband of MALIBRAN, has become a victim to continual labor. His sight, for some time gradually weakening, is lost forever. . . . Lara is the name of the libretto which Mme. GEORGE SAND is said to have offered to ROSSINI. . . . To the list of failures in operatic enterprises in leading European theatres, mentioned last week, we may add La Scala at Milan, and the Italian opera at Vienna. The expenses of the latter for the last season are set down at £30,000, more than double the receipts.

New oratorios, operas, &c. seem to be multiplying in our New World. May they only prove as new, in the best sense, as some of the oldest works of genius! LEOPOLD MEIGNEN, the Philadelphia maestro, has nearly completed a second oratorio. The subject of the libretto, written also by himself, is taken from the Bible, and embraces the epoch of the Deluge, Noah and his family being the dramatis personae. A fine opportunity for musical treatment of that classical incident about the man who thought "there would not be much of a shower"! . . . Signor ARDITI, too, has turned his hand to the composition of an American opera, to be brought out during the coming season at the Academy of Music. The plot is taken from COOPER's "Spy."

The music-lovers in our good city of Worcester have shown their appreciation of true services in the cause of pure and classical music, by presenting the "Complete Piano Works" of MOZART, in nine vols. (the superb English edition, edited by Cipriani Potter,) to their young townsman, Mr. B. D. ALLEN, whose nice soirées we have several times had occasion to mention. Mr. A. is a gentleman of rare modesty and merit in his profession, and the gift (transmitted by some of the first citizens of Worcester,) is eminently appropriate.

A San Francisco paper says: "The whole of our mining section of country, as it seems by the interior papers, is overrun by strolling players of every grade and description. Tragedy, comedy, farce, opera, and a general mixture of all, are given. The papers denounce the larger portion of these performers and and performances as arrant humbugs. . . . The Italian Opera Troupe, consisting of Mme. CLOTHILDE BARILI THORNE, Signora SCOLA, BECHERINI, and others, had sailed for Callao, with the design of making a professional visit to all the principal South American cities. . . . Mme. BISHOP was to take a benefit on the 30th July, when Auber's opera La Muette de Portici was to be played for the first time in California, with Mme. Bishop as the Princess, and Mlle. THIERRY as the Dumb Girl.

One of the ready recipes of psalm-tune manufacturers is well shown up by the Rev. THOMAS HILL, of Waltham, in an article on Church Music, in the last Christian Examiner. He says: "Sometimes an attempt is made to alter a secular air by changing the cadence to a religious form. We have recently heard tunes of this character from some new collection of sacred (!) music; popular Irish and Negro Melodies being cut off in the last measure, and a chord of the subdominant introduced, as it were to sanctify them. The result is, that the tunes are spoiled for whistling on a week day, without being rendered fit to sing on a Sunday. They neither express the wild mingling of pathos and humor of the Irish tunes, the dreamy wailing hidden under the outside gayety of the Negro songs, nor yet any properly religious emotions. They are senseless, mutilated fragments, ill pieced together." Speaking of sacred music, some of our German friends have strange notions on the subject. We have before us the programme of a "Grosses Sacred Concert" given on a Sunday evening by a German company in Philadelphia, composed of cavatinas from Norma, and Lucrezia Borgia, overture to Zampa, orchestral arrangements from Le Prophète and the Nachtlager von Granada, instrumental solos, glees, declamations, and what not. We do not know that such music need be any more corrupting on a Sunday than on other days; but to call it sacred!

A new biography of HANDEL is soon to appear in England, the work of M. VICTOR SCHOELOHER, a political exile in London. He has examined the Handelian MSS. in the Musical Library of Buckingham Palace, and discovered an oratorio by Handel, entitled "The Passion", hitherto unknown, as well as an opera called "Silla."

Who does not relish now and then a hearty exclamation against music? If one lived in England where they undertake to digest three or four roast-beef oratorios in a day, or sit through one of M. BENEDICT's annual concerts, with thirty-nine pieces in the programme, the more musical he was the more might he suffer torture from too much of a good thing, and be inclined to sympathize with SYDNEY SMITH, who said: "Music for such a length of time (unless under sentence of a jury) I will not submit to"; and again: "Nothing can be more disgusting than an oratorio. How absurd to see five hundred people fiddling like madmen about the Israelites in the Red Sea!" And after one's cutaneous musical sensibility has been haunted through hot summer days by hand-organs and boys whistling "Old folks at home" and "Pop goes the weazel", or even Casta diva, how one likes the honest, humorous confession of CHARLES LAMB, who, nervously susceptible of sounds, and tortured by a carpenter's hammer, calls even "these unconnected and unset sounds better than the measured malice of music!"

The Gazzetta Musicale of Naples laments the want of serious study on the part of modern singers in Italy. When composers write only for effect, can you expect the singers to devote themselves to Art for Art's sake? . . . At Milan the only theatre now open is the Rè; at which Rossini's Gazza Ladra and Cenerentola and Sig. Muzio's Claudia were to be performed. . . . At Venice Meyerbeer's Il Profeta has been exciting enthusiasm; the principal rôles were filled by Signore Sanchioli and Carozzi, and Signori Negrini and Nanni. Baffe was expected to spend some time at Bologna. . . . An unpublished opera of C. M. VON WEBER, called Silvana, was recently performed for the first time at Dresden. It was composed in 1803, and remodelled by the author in 1810-12.

M. STRAUSS, director of the masked balls recently given at the Opera in Paris, but who has nothing but his name in common with the defunct waltz-king of Vienna, has been in the habit, like all other dance composers, of appropriating the ideas of others, that is, of taking themes for his quadrilles and waltzes from the fashionable operas, &c. of the day. The society of dramatic authors, having a copyright interest in some of the said operas, prosecuted him and recovered pretty heavy damages, the Court deciding, among other things, that "even a modification of the time of a musical composition in applying it to the exigencies of dance music could not be allowed to deprive an author of his rights." Would that the same law were in force here also! Not so much for the copy-righted, as for the sake of our own ears and of the poor tunes, tortured and twisted and be-deviled into all shapes, danced to and ground on hand-organs and made into virtuoso fireworks, until one is sick to death of them!

MISKA HAUSER, the knight-errant of the violin, who seeks new fields of virtuoso fame away in the Sandwich Islands and remote corners of the world, seems to be getting equally famous as a historian and romancer in the way of newspaper correspondence. We find him in the German papers, we find him in the Paris La France Musicale, and in the English papers. Latterly in Chambers' Journal, in giving an account of a concert in Sydney, Australia, he sketches an "independent editor," one of whose economies we think it might be fair enough for every editor to adopt in his own practice. He says:

"A few days after my arrival, I paid my visits to the different editors of Sydney. At my first call, I came to a palace-like house, the ground floor occupied by the printing office. On the first floor, among other advertisements, I found a tablet informing visitors that the editor cannot be spoken with unless paid for his valuable time; accordingly every body without exception, is advised to buy a ticket of admission at the door of the waiting-room—one hour costing 10s.; half an hour, 6s.; fifteen minutes, 3s. Such were the contents of this singular price-current of time. I went into the waiting-room, and buying from the Australian negro, in red livery, an hour of his master's time, I entered the parlor with a strong feeling of curiosity. The editor received me in a very unprepossessing and sluggish manner. 'You are an artist, and come from Europe to make money?' said he in a not very friendly tone. But when he understood that I had come from South America and California, his face lighted up, and his voice became less abrupt. He asked me, without longer preface, what pecuniary sacrifice I was ready to make in order to be puffed by his paper. I was startled by this bluntness, and replied, that in case of success, I would surely give him material proofs of my gratitude; but he did not find my answer precise enough, and requested me to come at once to a definite understanding, and to pay a certain sum, without which, according to him, it would be impossible for me to succeed. Telling him that I wished to adjourn the conference, as I could not at once come to a decision, I left the temple of editorial integrity and public spirit. The other editors were less rapacious and more friendly; they gave me, indeed, the best advice about my concerts."

Our Music Table.

Oliver Ditson adds another to his series of cheap operatic scores, in octavo form, with Italian and English words. This is "Moses in Egypt, as performed by the Handel and Haydn Society of Boston, composed by ROSSINI, translated and adapted by GEORGE S. PARKER." It makes a volume of 160 clearly printed pages, and is a convenient and valuable book, although the paper and the outside general appearance are not quite so tasteful as in the same publisher's edition of Lucrezia Borgia, Sonnambula, &c.;—probably on the ground of cheapness, that it may be the more available for large chorus and oratorio practice; for "Moses" as here given (upon Sunday nights) is made to answer for an oratorio. The heavy letters of the title-page are "black as Egypt", as befits the subject. Whether the opera of Mosé in Egitto has been in any degree curtailed in adaptation to a Boston oratorio audience, we have not the means at hand for knowing; but it is pretty certain that we have here essentially the whole of one of the very best of Rossini's productions;—a wide interval between it, however, and his "William Tell" on the one hand, or his "Barber of Seville" on the other! But next to these in richness of interest we may place Moses and Semiramide, both of the most melodic, florid, voluptuous, Oriental creations of Italian lyric Art. They are much alike in the pomp and splendor of the choral parts, the ingenious beauty of concerted pieces, the long-drawn florid melodies, and highly colored, piquant instrumentation, as well as the frivolous, merely sensuous, foot-lifting character of certain portions. And there is a like sameness of style pervading all the voice-parts, all the characters; only here there is less mere literal imitation and echo of one another. It must always be an extremely popular kind of music, because the flash of diamonds and the kaleidoscope play of colors never lose their charm for fresh senses. In the nature of things it is still destined to be sung a good deal by our societies and to attract large audiences; and it will be a convenience both to the singer and the curious hearer to possess so nice a copy of his own. The English words are applied with taste and judgment, and have proved themselves singable by the experience of many seasons of Handel and Haydn concerts.

Very valuable to students of the organ, and to the fledgling organists in country and city churches must be "RINK'S Practical Organ School" (op. 55), published entire, in the elegant style of J. A. Novello (London and New York), with the German directions and terms translated into English. It consists of six progressive parts, complete in one volume (price $3.75), or separate (75 cts. each). Rink represents the sound old classical school of organists, who have been brought up on BACH. As a creative, inspired genius he was no Bach at all; not one of the greatest of tone-poets; but he had learning, mastery of the instrument, style, school, and he has written such a series of exercises as must, when carefully practiced, lead one into the true, solid, contrapuntal style and spirit of organ-playing. We doubt if any organ school, accessible in English, is at all to be compared with Rink's. It is enough to give a brief synopsis of its contents.

Part I. contains twelve short and easy pieces in two parts, twelve in three parts and twelve in four parts, thus initiating one from the outset into the mystery of real composition, or intertwining of distinct, individual parts. There is much beauty in these little pieces. These mastered, we take another step and practice 24 short Preludes in the twelve major and minor keys, and find the music growing more and more attractive.

Part II., after a course of Pedal exercises, gives twelve of the good old German Chorales, each with several variations,—variations in respect of harmony, as well as of melody. These are extremely interesting. But let one turn from them to Bach's arrangement of the chorales (for quartet of voices), if he would penetrate still deeper into the secrets of inspired Art.

Part III. contains easy Postludes, or concluding voluntaries, in fugue style.

Part IV. Similar pieces for more advanced performers.

Part V. contains various Organ pieces in the free style:—fantasia-like, more of the order of show pieces, and calling for contrast of stops.

Part VI. brings us face to face with what is properly the soul of all true musical form, with the Fugue itself, and is thus a preparation for the study of the great BACH's Fugues, which are the school of schools, as it regards the organ. It has also miscellaneous pieces, variations, &c., for accomplished performers.

Connecticut Fairy-Land.

One who has read Tennyson's "Princess," can conceive of a mystical community of romantic, beautiful young ladies, segregated from the coarse and selfish world, and leading the happiest life imaginable, a life all music, in a secluded valley, unapproachable to vulgar feet, in the midst of the very land of "blue laws" and of "wooden nutmegs." Of such we have information in a most cheerful little paper called the Gleaner of the Vale, of which a stray number or two have reached us. It is full of the happiest little articles, emanating from the happy members of a female seminary in a happy valley, which rejoices in the name of Music Vale. Music Vale Seminary is the title of the institution; and the life there would seem to be in imitation of the birds, one life-long practising of pianos and singing of songs, and studying of counterpoint, and rehearsing of original operas, and warbling praises of such paradisaical existence. Nothing but Music and Happiness are recognized; with these every page and paragraph of the Gleaner seems to be steeped and dripping. The whole business of the life is learning music; and to this end these heroines make laws and establish order, and Amazon-like, shrink not from athletic (finger) exercises, trying to strength and courage. Here are the "Rules and Regulations":

1. Ladies will commence practice at sunrise.
2. Hour of retiring, 10 o'clock, P. M.
3. Required practice will be four hours per diem. Extra practice will be credited on the bill, by the monitress, to the pupil.
4. The visiting or calling on neighbors, attending parties, or absence without permission, is prohibited.
5. Ladies will be required to dust their rooms and pianos prior to commencing practice in the morning, alternately, and successively taking precedence by seniority.
6. Conversation with ladies at pianos without permission, is prohibited.

The maxim of Music Vale is "one thing at a time." Hence it differs as a school, from other schools, in providing for a year or more of life of uninterrupted music. "The most approved and fashionable music furnished, if desired, at the lowest cash prices": so it would seem that Verdi, Balfe, Jullien, Labitzky, &c. have the entrée in Fairy-land; (far more, we are afraid, than Chopin, Schubert or Beethoven—alas, that fairies will be fashionable!) The editresses of the Gleaner give the happiest pictures of the life at Music Vale. They had an Examination, when "Music Vale put on its best looks and smiles to greet its visitors. The trees, flowers, and all joined in the welcome and convinced every one that there is no pleasanter place than this Valley of ours". The ceremony consisted of "exercises in Theory, relieved and enlivened by the performance of pieces, both instrumental and vocal". The examination is rigid, and then comes some anxious heart-beating "lest we should not be the happy recipients of a 'Sheepskin',—for diplomas are awarded. Then come the evening exercises, to which "we march escorted by the Burr Cornet Band", and more happy singing of 'Welcome' and all hail to Music Vale! And then we commence to enact our melodramatic Opera of "Ralvo", of which the lady editresses think it not amiss to give a slight sketch, which we too, since we have to go to Fairy-land for topics, think it not amiss to copy:

Ralvo is supposed to be near the Fairy Isle, on which he declares his determination to land, notwithstanding the assurance of his comrades that he will be changed to stone if he does so. He lands; a sense of drowsiness steals over him, and he sleeps. The Sylphide appears and wishes to warn him of his danger, but dares not let herself be seen. The bugle sounds when touched by her fairy wand, though no lips press its tube. Ralvo starts from his slumber. An Invisible Chorus then warns him away. Invisible birds chaunt their lays. He knows that he is surrounded by enchantment, and strives in vain to solve the mystery. He calls his bargemen, but they have left the Island, through fear. Again he sleeps. Two of the fairies appear and speak of the love which the Sylphide has for the stranger, on whose approach they quickly vanish. The bugle sounds once more, and the Invisible Chorus again warns him away. The Sylphide re-appears, and this time, her wish to save the stranger overcoming the dread of the Queen, she permits herself to be seen by him. She bestows upon Ralvo her fairy wand, telling him that it will guard and guide him safely through all danger, as it was presented to her by the most powerful of the Genii. Ralvo bids her farewell and turns to leave, when the Queen herself appears and bids him change to stone. He waves his fairy wand and changes not. She summons the Elf of the Genii, and commands her to bring her most potent wand, with which she calls on the spirits of Water and Air. They do not appear. She cries "treachery," and falls from her throne.

Then Ralvo calls for the Sylphide, and orders the Elf to crown her Queen. She is made Queen amid the songs of rejoicings, and the Island is declared free from enchantment.

Whatever merit there was in the libretto, or in the music, belongs exclusively to us of Music Vale Seminary, as both were composed here. We are not anxious for any laurels which we do not win, but we wish for those that fairly belong to us. We may also be allowed to add, that it was composed and performed simply as a recreation from study, and not one moment was lost from regular practice in its rehearsal. And, while it has been a source of pleasure to us who have taken a part in its representation, it has also been of practical use, on account of the discipline we have received in composition, elocution, and particularly in regard to expression.

The article closes with allusions to the editorial modesty in excuse of criticism and with thanks to the (brass?) Bands from Colchester, which, we may presume, officiated as orchestra,—but brim-full of happiness, the halo whereof crowneth every soul and thing that enjoys the slightest connection with this happy Music Vale. Lest the spell should be broken by such enemies to boarding-school young misses' peace, as love-sickness and home-sickness, the diagnosis of these troubles and the sovereign remedy are duly set forth in the Gleaner: the remedy is an inspiration of the happy temper of the place, to wit:

Three parts of contentment;
Three parts of good humor;
Three parts of sociability;

Mix well together, add any quantity of smiles and cheerfulness, and above all keep yourself busy, and our word for it, you will soon cease feeling any unpleasant sensation.

Such, care-worn readers, such, O weary mariners upon life's troubled sea, is the philosophy and the melodious flow of life in Music Vale, which is no fairy land, save as "the mind is its own place", but has an actual habitation and a name in Salem, Connecticut,—so says the Gleaner of the Vale.

We ask the attention of Church music Committees, choir directors, &c., to the advertisement of a Soprano and Bass. The applicants are competent musicians, who have sung very acceptably in choir and concert-room.

Music Abroad.

Paris.

The Théâtre Italian, in the Salle Ventadour, late the scene of RISTORI's dramatic triumphs, is to open with opera Oct. 1st. Sig. Calzado, the new lessee, announces the following programme:

Primi soprani assoluti:—Madame Giulia Grist, Madame Claudina Fiorentini, Madame Virginia Boccabadati, and Madame Virginia Penco. Primo contralto assoluto:—Madame Borghini-Mamo. Primi tenori assoluti:—Signora Mario, Carillon, Pietro Mongini and Lorenzo Salvi. Primi baritoni assoluti:—Signora Francesco Graziani and Everardi. Primo basso profondo:—Francesco Angelini. Primo buffo assoluto:—Signor Giovanni Zucchini. Seconda donna comprimaria:—Madame Dell'Anese. Basso comprimario:—Signor F. Rossi. Secondo tenore comprimario:—Signor Soldi. Secondo basso comprimario:—Signor Zucbelli. Administrator:—Signor Salvi. Chef-d'Orchestra:—Signor Bottesini.

So GRIST returns to Paris after a lapse of seven years,—less changed, the Musical World opines, than Paris. Mme. BOCCABADATI, unknown as yet to London or Paris, has enjoyed considerable reputation as prima donna in Italy and Spain. Mme. BORGHINI-MAMO is called the best Italian contralto after ALBONI. MARIO, as all the English testify, never sang better than now. Sig. CARRION is the tenor who has been exciting so much attention in Vienna. The critics say he is a fine singer in the florid Rossini school, but that his voice is used up. SALVI is well known of our readers. Of GRAZIANI we have read much in praise in English papers; the other baritones and basses are new names to us. Among the operas promised are Don Giovanni, Il Barbiere, Mosè, Semiramide, Otello, La Gazza Ladra, Cenerentola, (so much for old Rossini's visit!), besides the usual unavoidable doses of Verdi, Donizetti, &c. More than one new opera will be produced, if good ones are offered.

At the Grand Opera, M. CHARLES WICART, a Belgian tenor, pupil of the Paris Conservatoire, has made a moderately successful début in GUEYMARD's part in La Juive; Mme. LAFON was a "fair" representative of Rachel, and Mlle. DUSSEY, "a young singer of remarkable promise, made a charming Eudoxie." Les Vêpres Siciliennes had been performed twenty-three times, with still increasing success, due in a great measure to SOPHIE CRUVELLI, who in the part of Hélène has taken Paris by storm. All hope of getting Santa Chiara, the Duke of Saxe-Coburg's new opera, ready against Queen Victoria's visit, had vanished. We copy the following outline of its subject:

In the early part of the last century Peter the Great married his son Alexis, then aged 21, to the Princess of Wolfenbüttel, sister of the Empress of Germany. Peter, busied with schemes of aggression abroad, and assimilation and amelioration at home, had altogether neglected his parental duties; the education of the Czarévitch having been confided to bigots of the old Russian school, averse to change and opposed to progress. Too late the Czar discovered his error, and endeavored, with the aid of foreign professors, to cultivate the shallow mind of his son; but the mischief was done, the seed sown of fanatics had taken deep root, and the Czarévitch like the deaf adder, refused to hear the voice of the foreign charmers, and stopped his ears to the instruction they strove to convey. Convinced that the nation was opposed to his father's magnificent projects, he joined a conspiracy against him, and, being discovered, fled to Vienna, and eventually to Naples. In the king of that state, Peter had a friend as firm as King Bomba to Czar Alexander, and Alexis was arrested by Romanzoff and Tolstoy, carried to Petersburg, and there strangled—by his father's hand, as was generally believed.

Some historians have supposed that his wife did not share her husband's fate, but that, plunged like Juliet in a death-like trance, she afterwards escaped; and the duke has followed this version. The opera opens in 1715, and the first two acts take place in the Kremlin, at Moscow. The scene of action is then changed to the Hartz mountains, where the princess is supposed to have taken refuge, and the composer has availed himself of the numerous legends and mysterious tales of which they have ever been the subject.

The engagement of ALBONI expires on the 20th of September. It has been wonderfully successful. Roger's engagement is to the end of October, and that of Cruvelli to the end of December, with the privilege of a month's congé. In January, 1856, this young lady is to be married, and will retire into private life.

FIRST PREMIUM MELODEONS, The Very Best now Manufactured.

S. D. & H. W. SMITH respectfully call the attention of the public to their IMPROVED MELODEONS, constantly on exhibition at their Warerooms,

No. 417 Washington Street,

By means of a new method of voicing, known only to themselves, they have succeeded in removing the harsh and buzzing sound which formerly characterized the instrument, rendering the tones full, clear and organ-like. The action is prompt and reliable, enabling the performer to execute the most rapid music without obscuring the tones. The swell is arranged to give great expression.

The manufacturers received the First Premium, over all competitors, at the Fair of the Massachusetts Charitable Mechanic Association; also at the Metropolitan Mechanics' Fair, held at Washington, D. C.

For the Parlor, instruments are furnished at prices varying from $45 to $150.

Larger instruments, with two banks of keys, for chapels and small churches, from $150 to $300.

This last instrument, known as the ORGAN HARMONIUM, has been essentially improved by Messrs. Smith, and they have secured a patent therefor.

Persons who wish to hire Melodeons with a view of purchasing at the end of the year, can have the rents credited as part payment of the purchase money.

BROWN, and amongst those engaged are LONGFELLOW, BAYARD TAYLOR, GEO. W. CURTIS, Rev. H. W. BEECHER, Rev. SAMUEL OSOOD, Rev. H. W. BELLows, Hon. CHARLES SUMNER, and others of our most eminent writers. A series of papers by RUSKIN, and essays left by the eminent sculptor, HORATIO GREENOUGH, add to the interest of The Crayon.

From the Cincinnati Gazette.

We have already strongly recommended THE CRAYON, and every succeeding number proves it to be more and more worthy of all we have said in its praise. No Journal, devoted to Art, has ever been so ably conducted, in this country; and if it meets with the support it so richly deserves, we have no doubt that it will exert a most wholesome influence upon the taste of the country.

During the three years since it was established, this Journal has met with continually increasing favor, and it entered upon its SEVENTH VOLUME with the number for Saturday, April 7th.

Its contents relate mainly to the Art of Music, but with glances at the whole World of Art and of Polite Literature; including, from time to time—1. Critical Reviews of Concerts, Oratorios, Operas; with timely Analyses of the notable Works performed, accounts of their Composers, &c. 2. Notices of New Music. 3. Musical News from all parts. 4. Correspondence from musical persons and places. 5. Essays on musical styles, schools, periods, authors, compositions, instruments, theories; on Musical Education; on Music in its Moral, Social, and Religious bearings; on Music in the Church, the Concert-room, the Theatre, the Chamber, and the Street, &c. 6. Translations from the best German and French writers upon Music and Art. 7. Occasional Notices of Sculpture, Painting, &c. 8. Original and Selected Poems, &c.

The Piano-Forte.

[We translate the following from the Musikalische Briefe, &c., von einem Wohlbekannten (Letters about Musical Art and Artists by "One Well-known"), a work which appeared in Leipzig in 1852, and has excited a good deal of discussion throughout Germany. Prof. LOBE, the same who reports the conversations with MENDELSSOHN, copied in our recent numbers, is understood to be the author.]

The Piano-Forte is the true and genuine type and emblem of our time; it characterizes the shallow knowingness, the culture which has "licked all the world," but which can achieve nothing true, nothing whole. So the piano-forte can give you a little of everything, but in the whole nothing true, nothing whole, complete.

Indeed this instrument, which clinks and clatters through all houses, from the basement to the garret, like the loom in a manufacturing town, characterizes our time also in the respect that it is a mechanical and manufacturing time. As the piano itself amongst all musical instruments is in its structure the highest triumph of mechanics, so there is no instrument which has done so much to make music mechanical and soul-less, as the piano.

No wonder then, that the influence of its universal reign has been the most corrupting to true Art.

The dazzling facility which the player may acquire on the piano, and the surprising mechanical execution; the triumphal processions which certain individuals have held on account of this mechanical finger-facility, and the golden harvests they have reaped, have led all sorts of talents to that instrument and kept them there exclusively. These talents, which might have accomplished something great, have had to sell themselves body and soul to this "music-devil," that they might get from him what they sought; they have had to devote the greatest part of their time to soul-killing finger-exercises, and thereby to slight or wholly disregard those serious studies which qualified the earlier masters for their great creations and gave them mastery of form, the technique of creation, as these finger exercises give the technique of delivery.

Moreover the piano-forte itself composes; for the long practiced musical phrases come uncalled, mechanically, into the fingers and then are taken for one's own thoughts. Perhaps, too, the more advanced stage of mechanical facility, the power of making faster runs, wider and bolder leaps, fuller hand-fuls of chords, several trills at once, &c., gives sometimes other forms of thought, which the player takes for new thoughts.

The feeling for sustained, simple melody vanishes by degrees, because the piano has it not. In this way disappears for instance the Sonata, a genuine Art form, choked by an importunate Mazurkas, Fantasias, Etudes, &c.

The art of instrumentation is as good as lost, because this exclusive occupation with the piano leaves no time to study that. But since every piano virtuoso thinks he can compose, and actually can do so for the piano, he thinks himself also competent for all the rest. The musical figures of the piano, which he knows exclusively, he transfers to other instruments and thereby produces a confused blur of sounds. Since on the piano the harmony does not keep on sounding after the keys are struck, such composers, bond slaves to the Piano-forte devil, venture the most unheard of things, even in Quartets, in Opera, &c. But here the harmonies sound on, and their composition becomes ear-rending. In the present rapid finger virtuosity, the hearer is frequently unable to perceive false relations of harmony on the piano; for the notes and figures chase each other past him like a flying army. Who will recognize a single blemish among so many? But let such composers transfer their misappreciation of the laws of pure composition to orchestral works, and then their lameness becomes all too manifest.

The piano-forte composers are eternally hunting and catching after "new harmonies," because their instrument affords nothing else. They forget entirely, that harmony is nothing else and can be nothing but the imitation of the feelings in man; that the true, intelligent artist does not set out to discover new feelings and new modulations of feeling, but simply to represent the eternally old and eternally young as truly and beautifully as possible, so that not merely and not always furious passions may rage through the human heart, but that tranquil, simple feelings too may dwell there, by the excitement of which with simplest harmonies something that is great and powerful may be effected. Think of WEBER's "Through the forests, through the meadows, &c." There you find the most familiar harmonies, and yet what expression, what power of excitement!

Since such Piano heroes cannot acquire the mastery of beautiful, clear form, they pronounce it unessential, or they seek new forms and then labor to represent novelty of form as the essential thing in Art.

When they see their medley Piano-scrawl in print,—the product more of their finger-mechanism than of the knowledge and consciousness of Art, and in which you may find every thing but soul,—they fancy themselves great composers, men of genius, and this imagination drives them to let their genius shine in all the branches of their Art. There you have the explanation of so many Piano heroes and composers trying their hand at the composition of Operas, Symphonies, &c. Think of THALBERG and the rest. They hold the art of composition as an accessory to virtuosity, and think they have only to stretch forth their nimble-fingered hands, to pluck the fairest fruits already ripe.

Then if the public justly and reasonably enough receives such labors coldly, seeking in them truth, character, melody, and not instrumented études and fantasias, their creators fancy themselves unappreciated geniuses—at all events geniuses—whom only a later future will know how to comprehend and value. They despise the present public, the same whose favor they have courted on the Piano in all sorts of ways, even the most superficial clap-trap.

While the Piano-forte was still called the Clavier and was so, true Art bloomed; with the modern Piano came the aberration of the Art. No great composer was a great virtuoso, and no great virtuoso becomes a great composer. MOZART is not to be counted, for every beginner now-a-days laughs at the means by which he excited the wonder of his time. WEBER, MENDELSSOHN and others, who were distinguished Piano-forte players, never wished to shine as virtuosos. With them playing was the means to an end, and not the end itself.

But do these wild Piano-forte affairs please the persons who can play them? Them perhaps, but alas! not their hearers—and the reason? The delight they feel in their pieces pertains not to the pieces in themselves, but to the triumph over difficulties overcome.

GENIUS.—We pardon the diamond its sharp edges; it costs too much to round them off.

A New Life of Gluck.

(Concluded from last week.)

Gluck had scarcely announced his new style of composition, in which all the studies and desires and experiences of many years were, so to say, summed up and expressed, than the fame thereof reached Paris, and he was summoned to France, as the man of men whom the salons wanted—a man of genius, a man of system, a man of antagonism, all in one!—a man, moreover, whose genius, system, and self-assertion precisely chimed in with the moods and sympathies of a large number of French philosophers and thinkers and lovers of Art. To enter into any of the details or anecdotes touching the great controversy of Gluck versus Piccini would be superfluous,—since the subject has been a favorite one, especially with those who have loved to dwell upon it as one more folly of Parisian Fashion. * * Doubtless, there was much nonsense in the strife. * * But there was a certain amount of truth and of principle at the bottom of the effervescence. In all the historical accounts of this Gluck and Piccini quarrel—a quarrel rather brewed for the antagonistic composers than by them—it has been too universally overlooked that the contest was not one betwixt a German and an Italian composer, so much as a struggle to maintain French opera in its old spirit, though in a modern dress. Folly and fashion—the Court and the Court's enemies—the latter rapidly rising into acrimony and activity—brought into the King's and the Queen's corner of the Académie as much irrational folly, on their respective sides, as we have heard vented in London drawing-rooms concerning the unprecedented perfections of Mdlle. Jenny Lind, or the right of Signor Mario to be capricious and sing indolently. But, apart from all partizanship—setting aside those who wished to affront Marie Antoinette through her German protégé, and allowing for the preferences of those less virulent folk, whose musical taste amounted to only an appetite for melody—the real matter in debate resolved itself into the question whether or not the requirements of Music, as an Art of symmetry and number—an Art which included vocal seduction as well as scientific knowledge—could be conciliated with those stage-properties, or unities, for which the French have been always such sturdy sticklers. What Gluck perfected, Lulli and Rameau had both indicated—and both had submitted their genius to the requisitions of the public for which they wrought—even as in later years Sacchini, Spontini, Signor Rossini, and M. Meyerbeer have been compelled—have been content—to do. The controversy, of course, was complicated by references to that mischievous document, Gluck's well-known preface to 'Alceste.'—for mischievous is that document beyond most stage prefaces, announcing as it does theories and purposes which were not, in practice, respected by the composer himself. After having announced "war to the knife" against the whole race of singers and their requirements—after having declared his resolution not to flatter the ear by Da capos, ritornels, and such like prettinesses—the student might naturally expect to find an entire renunciation of all constituted forms in Gluck's stage works. He will in proportion be puzzled on seeing that the only essential difference betwixt Alceste, and other operas of its time lies in the weight, grandeur, and vivacity given to its chorus, in the surpassing beauty and brilliancy of its airs de ballet, and the composer's abstinence from florid exhibition or expression. There is no abrogation of form in it,—no absence of melody,—no education of the ear by the discipline of disappointment, which, in deference to stage-truth, (so called), withholds that which the ear has expected. Though Gluck talked loudly of Drama, he wrote as a musician,—and Music is a science of numbers as well as an Art of beauty. Take the one or the other away, and neither science nor Art is left,—a coarse, brute noise, little superior in pertinence, or in the intellectual and poetical satisfactions it awakens, to the shrieks of the savage or the "harsh saw of the carpenter," is all that will remain.

To proceed a few lines further.—Let us preach that the folly of preaching against conventionality in an entertainment so inevitably conventional as opera can be proved, from the very works of the school, the boast of which has been to maintain dramatic truth and propriety as the requisites and principles most necessary to the work of Art. Those who could protest most roundly against the cavatina or rondo, which was introduced to flatter the vanity of favorite singers, nevertheless admitted chaconne, menuetto, sarabanda, bourrée, and every other arbitrary and formal composition of the kind, in order to exhibit and indulge the dancers—mere episodical creatures thrust into the musical drama as so many pageant-figures. Thus also, the innovators of modern Germany, whose boast it is to employ the truth-and-nature principle broached by Gluck, in its most extreme and severe rigidity, while they ignore vocal fascination and accomplishment as so much meretricious "sing-song," labor at orchestral complication, delicacy—in a word, at instrumental convention. The tenor or soprano who indulges in a trill is denounced by them as a fool, or worse,—the composer who permits a vocal scale to disfigure his score, is held to be frivolous and ignorant. But the flute may shake whenever orchestral brilliancy requires it, and the horsehair may be worn off the violin bows in racing through passages chromatic or diatonic, without any one seeming to recollect that "biling and cooing" are as untruthful to Nature before, as they are behind, the foot-lights; and that if Desdemona is forbidden to rush up or down two octaves of demi-semiquavers in her song, the prohibition might consistently be applied to the stringed instruments that support Desdemona in the course of her terror and despair. There are, in every art, ebbings and flowings—periods during which means and ends are strangely confounded. During these, Indolence is allowed to wear the frown of false severity, and because it will not take the pains to discover, to learn and select, is permitted to denounce every charm and beauty as mere superfluous prettiness. But even during these periods there must be in some points vast concessions—somewhere counterbalances admitted in arbitrary disproportion. The Pre-Raphaelites, who enjoy uncouthness of form, revel in gorgeous variety of color. The fact of one quality or feature being dwelt on to excess does not establish its inherent monstrosity. When Gluck's tirades against the follies of vocal exhibition are used perpetually as text to a crusade against vocal art, they may be pointed out as mischievous,—and doubly so as having been invented by an opera-composer who conceded as much as did ever Hasse, or Galuppi, or Winci, to the limitations which it suited his fancy and the feeling of his public, to respect.

We have expatiated on this passage of Gluck's life—on the real meaning and bearing of his efforts, and the controversy to which they gave rise,—because, at the time present, distorted sense and specious nonsense are endeavoring, by misuse of the old party cries, to upturn Music under pretext of regenerating it.—There is little trace of other than opera-music by Gluck. Herr Schmid, it is true, mentions a 'De Profundis,' and confirms the anecdote lately circulated of the composer having taken up the 'Herrmannschlacht' of Klopstock as a task. But he faltered over it, and, like his opera of 'Les Danaïdes, which Salieri was commissioned to finish, it was left incomplete at his death.

All that we know concerning Gluck as a man is attractive rather than otherwise. The days in which he lived were days when kings and rulers wore authoritative wigs—days when fame and greatness were asserted by a tyrannical and solemn behavior. The Johnsonian humor tinged other worlds besides the literary circles who frequented our London clubs and coffee-houses. The great musicians were not all of them sheepish idiots, or coxcombical fops, or repulsive bores, when they were taken away from their organs and fiddles. Some of the monarchs of Art were able to stand face to face with Rank and Intellect, without discredit to their pursuits. Handel was a man of thought, of pertinent replies and poetical sallies, as well as a hero of chords and of pedals.

Each gathered round him an amount of personal respect which no reputation for special science alone could have secured to him, Gluck is described by Burney as pompous, but intelligent,—showing an obliging cordiality to those by whom he felt himself appreciated. He seems at Vienna to have kept the best company. At Paris he was dragged into the whirlpool of wit and repartee, philosophical definition and paradoxical rhapsody, without being taken off his feet or losing his head. Some arrogance there must have been in him,—some self-confidence and self-occupation,—to have borne him through so many years of doubtful success and undecided creation. But he was amiable in his home, and high-minded as concerns his Art. These being Gluck's position and qualities, it must seem strange to persons who have given the peoples of Germany credit for an enthusiastic love of their great men, on the strength of their sentimental protestations, that the memory of Gluck should be so utterly neglected in Vienna, that his burial-place, like his birth-place, was till lately a matter of doubt. We "put our poets in a corner," it is true, (as Mr. Jerrold's heroine innocently remarked the other day,)—but we also keep an altar of constancy for them in the affections of ourselves and of our children's children. Our "cousins" are more fickle, it may be feared. If they come back to an old shrine, it is sometimes with as much condescension to ancestral superstition as reverence for the faith of their forefathers. Books, however, like Herr Schmid's must be accepted as testimonies on the sounder side of the argument. It is tiresome, but it is sincere in its reverence.—London Athenæum.

For Dwight's Journal of Music.

Music and its Uses.

In expressing our imperfect views upon Music, as an exponent of emotion, we referred to its uses, as a portion of practical education.

In this country the whole design of education seems to be utilitarian, and no scheme of literary instruction can expect to receive much favor with the public that patronizes our educational institutions, unless its tendencies are of some tangible value.

The pupil must acquire that which is immediately available as one of the means of conducting the great business of life, and the sparse gatherings of his promiscuous knowledge must have reference, in most cases, to worldly acquisition.

When, however, we consider the indisputable fact, that out of the sum of academical knowledge, nine-tenths are lost to the memory, and a very considerable portion operates with very questionable tendencies upon the understanding of the pupil, after he has directed his thought into a practical or, so called, useful direction; we have every reason to inquire why so many superfluities are sought after by the student of science, and whether there could not be some other mode of laying up treasures of a more abiding intellectual wealth.

That the system of literary training in vogue in this country, viewed in the light of a training, is a false and superficial one, and fraught with erroneous aims, few thinking and earnest minds will deny.

What these defects may be, it is not our aim to explain, this being somewhat foreign to the subject in hand. All we desire in this place is to notice that, in the programmes of our popular academies, no adequate provision is made for Music.

At a very early age, a direction should be given to the emotional tendencies of the youthful mind, as the whole usefulness, (and we adopt this phrase from popular motives,) of the future character dependa, more upon the full and lively development of the heart, than upon that of the intellect.

That this latter idea is entirely ignored by the great body of instructors, that parents overlook the principle of emotional training, and the high value of musical susceptibilities as a guide to the intellect and a lamp to the general happiness of life, is evident from the loose mode in which literary schools are conducted, and from the high estimation set upon the glitter of human knowledge.

It is true, among the simple, homely and unpretending schools of town and country, singing, as an opening and close of the day's exercises, has long been a standing practice, and its good results, although unknown and unseen by the pupil himself, have probably, in all cases, worked their silent way into the recesses of his heart, and set off some portion of his later character with a radiant gem, of which the world took note. Yet what has here been effected in the obscurity of a village school, and on a small scale, we would propose as an object of imitation in our larger academies and even in our proud halls of learning.

Why Music, as a useful and indispensable branch of elementary education, has been neglected, is owing chiefly to the indifference with which the educator views the emotional principle and its bearings upon the intellect.

To this we must add the false and erroneous estimate placed upon all utilitarian studies, and the misapprehension that youth are acquiring at school that which they are but learning to acquire.

As feeling, as well as thought, enters largely into the companionship and guidance of life, why should we not make early provision for all its indulgencies and requirements, and thus familiarize ourselves with the sunny side of existence? Why should we not, at an early stage, take exercises in one of these forms of a heavenly poesy, where tone becomes the companion of rhythm, and the whole earth gladdens to the sight, when the soul makes its expression audible in this wise?

We would not pretend, to point out, in detail, the various phases of a musical development, as that history forms the secret of each individual's own experience of inner enjoyment, and, as a world of perception, is exclusively his own. We would surmise, however, that to the uncultivated mind, the first influence of Music were merely pathological. On this all the exhilaration excited by a tone performance seems to be founded, in the early and crude stages of musical emotion.

Many, very many indeed, never get beyond this stage of musical perception. In our concert halls and opera houses, we have often observed conversations most perseveringly carried on during the performance of the best passages, and have no doubt that the music exercised the same influence on such persons, as if they had been listening with a view to read the language of the composer. The effect in these cases is purely pathological. The nerves vibrate and the system becomes animated, but the actual understanding remains probably where that of a native of Loo Choo would be on hearing Beethoven's Ninth Symphony. Out of this pathological, or crude physical feeling, therefore, the pupil has to be led, at a susceptible age,—at a time when emotion and intellect are pliant and can be trained up together.

It has been a subject of philosophical inquiry, whether Music has any real contents. (German, Inhalt). Where the individual imbibes tone-conceptions pathologically, we presume there are no contents, no subject of mental thought to dwell upon.

To this class Music leaves no detailed impression, and its performances must vanish away, like mist before the sun, without even charging the memory with any distinct form of thought or trace of emotion. No sooner, however, does the pathological pass over to the psychological, than all musical designs become a subject of study, the mind is absorbed in active thought, and the realms of an infinite poesy are laid open to us.

To build up this structure of musical invention, the material itself must be musical—its whole being springs out of itself. When tone-creations have thus formed an alliance with the memory and occupy one of the distinct departments, as we are accustomed to view them, we are led to infer that the composition constitutes a subject of actual operative thought, and that Music has its contents.

To the unlettered mind, the Pons Asinorum, in Geometry, presents a meaningless figure; to him it possesses no contents, and it passes off from his recollection as would any fanciful diagram of straight lines, squares or triangles. To the mathematician, however, its study lays open a sphere of pregnant thought, and the very exercise of the master-piece of geometrical analysis gives an important direction to his mathematical development. In a similar manner, to the untaught and unmusical fancy, a well conceived Sonata, with its primitive tone-idea carried through a diversity of striking chords, varied by many beautiful contrasting harmonies, now lost amid the masses of tone and now appearing again in its well known identity, possesses no contents (signification) whatever. It forms no subject of after-thought, nothing whatever for the mind to dissect, but acts upon his ear as do many of the attractions of the natural world upon the uneducated and callous being, calling no portion of the purely intellectual element into play.

Whereas, to him who has come within the enthralment of a tone-life, whose inner being is sustained by the sustenance of those mysterious imaginings which the composer draws forth from the depths of harmony and musical conception, there is no subject of loftier meaning or more important or significant contents than Music affords. Music, therefore, being thus shown to be a science of substantial contents, a subject which lays open to the human mind a field of unlimited development, and not merely a pleasing diversion for vacant hours, or a superficial accomplishment, belonging to a conventional education, we infer that it should occupy a more engrossing portion of elementary education. Unfortunately, however, before placing it in the showy programme of an academical course, the public has to be convinced of its utility: that being the grand touchstone in the recommendations of all modern and popular science, arising, as we have already said, from the impression that what is learned at school is the chapter of knowledge, instead of being in fact but the contents of the chapter. We maintain that in an American education musical instruction is an especial desideratum, and the attention is based upon emotional considerations. Our pursuits place wealth so readily within our grasp, its acquisition becomes so incorporated with the tone of the national character, and its indulgences are so strongly fostered from early youth upwards, that the whole tendency of society becomes materialistic.

Whenever the emotional offices of life are performed, they are apt to be mixed up with external and conventional forms to such a degree, as to deaden the soul of genuine poesy. Without this counteracting influence of a national poesy, a strict devotion to the various forms of an emotional life, in the amenities of social intercourse, the study of the arts, enthusiastic love of music, all the degrees of a divine cultus, wherein emotion exhibits its various rhythmical features, the nation must look forward to an early decadence. We can easily foresee that the mercantile character will long be predominant in this country, and how its tendencies operate upon the cause of Art, is shown in the history of the past.

It is indispensable that Art should bask in the sunshine of wealth, as it is there it derives its aliment. But it here happens to be of too sudden creation, and its glory, when acquired, is, too short-lived to enable it to render essential service to the genius of Music and Painting. If wealth were synonymous with education and æsthetic culture, the arts would have a more propitious future before them. Then the demonstrations of life would be less materialistic and we should not find such a universal indulgence in evanescent architectural forms that lend their monotony to a soulless existence.

The cultivation of Music should be preparatory to that of the Arts among us, since here the emotional character, upon which both the love for, and the emanations of Art are grounded, receives its strongest and earliest impulse. Germany, France and Italy, the countries where Art embellishes and is embellished by a sacred cultus, and is itself, in a great measure, the object of worship, are essentially musical. Music, with those peoples, is a spiritual element. On an early emotional culture, having its direction, in most cases, towards Music, that national poesy and festive gaiety of the European is founded. The time here devoted to recreation is usually considered a loss, and it is computed by dollars and cents; there, it is regarded as a gain, and forms a part of the grand scheme of life.

As to the method of an early promotion of a love of melody among the pupils of our elementary schools, a difficulty presents itself in the diversity of capacities for the art. The purposes of musical instruction could be most easily sustained by adopting the plan, now in vogue in many village schools, of choral exercises. From this moral enjoyment of the art, or rather this observance of a moral duty, the mind is insensibly led from the mere feeling to the intellectual perception of Music, which is its ultimate and highest attainment.

In these choral exercises the unmusical can be drawn into the Art, and duty will become a pleasure. By these vocal exercises imposed upon all the pupils, musical instruction becomes a useful feature of intellectual training, acting on the intellect by the medium of the emotions. In the German schools and universities, the students who cannot sing form rare exceptions; their choruses are rich and melodious, and leave endearing traces within the memory and pleasing reminiscences of the Alma Mater, while, at the same time, they carry back the imagination to the desolate castles and vine-clad hills of the Vaterland, where they have so often associated themselves with outward scenes.

The impressions left by these songs of college years never leave the heart, but flourish, true and lively, throughout all the subsequent storms of after-life.

By such an educational process, whereby the humanizing influences of a musical discipline are made to operate upon the mind, the visible effects of the study of the laws and the conceptions of tone, from its simplest to its more enlarged scale of beauty, would be made manifest in various features of the personal character. We would not have all men to be poets, nor painters, nor musicians, since these are born and not made; yet we would have that radiant halo which they diffuse around them to be more generally illuminative, lighting up all the avocations of life and purifying it of that grossness and sensuality which is alarmingly characteristic.

Without the aid of the poesy of Art, to ornament and give a spiritual vitality to the intercourse and attractions of social life, its ceremonials and its pastimes become frigid, and the inclinations sensual. In the worship of architecture and those household gods, called furniture, we live among symbols which do not contribute to positive happiness; neither does this symbolical intercourse admit of progress. In true Art, however, there is a spirit of progress, all its manifestations are a constant evolution of new forms, the one growing out of the other. It is ever active and its march is onward, and as a portion of the scheme of education, we think its doors should be opened to all, in order to refine the popular taste and curb our national propensities.

J. H.

Miss Adelaide Phillips.

This young lady, who went abroad about three years since, to obtain those advantages in the study of Music and the Drama which cannot yet be had here, is on her return home, and will soon arrive at the scene of her early efforts and successes; and as her re-appearance is calculated to occasion some interest, we take leave to say a word of what may justly be expected of her in the future, and to allude very briefly to her past life.

She was born in Bristol, England, and came here by way of Canada when between seven and eight years old. She had already made her debut elsewhere, was at once engaged at the Museum, and continued a member of that establishment nearly up to the moment of her leaving home, a period of about eight years—sustaining the duties of phenomenon, &c., being constantly on the stage, and always a favorite with the public for her intelligence and amiable manners, and for her sprightly dancing.

When about fifteen years old, it was discovered that she had a voice of unusual compass and power, and as her temper was remarkable for vivacity and sweetness, and her mind very bright and worthy of the most careful cultivation, she soon found devoted and valuable friends, who were determined that she should lack no advantage which they could secure for her by perseverance. Her voice had been in training nearly a year, when Mlle. Jenny Lind came, and the friends of the young Adelaide procured for her an opportunity to sing before that great artist, who was ever glad of a chance to encourage struggling merit. No suggestions were made to Jenny, she was merely begged for an opinion. One attribute of Miss Phillips has been to rise with every occasion, and to do better in any emergency than her friends could have anticipated. Jenny Lind pronounced her voice valuable, and said it ought not to suffer for want of the best training. Her action in this case was one in consonance with her whole course. After satisfying herself that assistance would be well bestowed, she recommended a subscription in behalf of Miss Phillips, and headed it with a thousand dollars. Thus this noble woman confirmed in a moment the cherished hopes of many people, and made the education of the young aspirant a sure thing. Jenny's lead was followed at a respectable distance, and the subscription flourished. For a few months before her departure Miss Phillips gave concerts successfully in many of the larger towns of the Commonwealth, and even visited Philadelphia on a liberal offer.

Thus a fund was amassed large enough to permit her to start upon her somewhat uncertain and arduous course. She went, in charge of her father and an aunt, to London, and was placed, in deference to Jenny Lind's especial recommendation, under Garcia, with whom she studied more than a year. It was then thought best to transfer the scene of her studies to Italy, but her funds began to fall short, and a chance such as he was always eager to embrace was presented to the late Mr. Chickering, of performing an act of quiet generosity. The necessary sum was furnished, and Miss Phillips proceeded to Italy, where she pursued her tasks under the most eminent maestri. At length she felt that she need not fear to appear at any theatre, and sought a scitura. But an engagement in Italy is first very hard to obtain, and then exceedingly difficult to turn to account; so that it was many months after her positive engagement ere she had the longed for opportunity to appear. After one appearance, however, matters went more smoothly, and she has performed engagements at five theatres in Italy, sustaining the rôles of La Bella Rosina, Arsace, Elisa (in Giuramento), and many others, and with good applause, which in that land is not easily won. The press generally speak of her performances with enthusiasm, and one, the Eco della Borsa, di Milano, we will quote, as, from our recollection of her quality and capacity of voice and of her talents, we are disposed to accept in good faith the award of this critic. After saying that many native artists leave Italy for other lands in quest of easier triumphs and greater gains, to be replaced by others of foreign production, not always to the advantage of Italy, he goes on to say, "In the past week we have happened to hear a youthful artista di canto, born and educated in distant lands, in whose behalf we are obliged to unsay what we have just remarked. Signorina Adelaide Phillips was born in England, bred in North America, &c., has delighted for many evenings at the Carcano theatre select audiences, by whom she was saluted with signs of admiration, and with applause and well-merited honors. A beautiful voice, incomparable facility, perfect intonation, an exquisite feeling which manifests itself in modulations, accents and gestures, nobly expressive; such are the gifts which, united with graces of person and countenance, distinguish this eminent cantante, for whom we prognosticate, with intimate conviction, a splendid future."

Before the subject of the above praise had left Boston, she displayed a voice which for body, compass and facility, was equally remarkable, a nature of deep feeling, a mind very bright, a countenance of great nobility, and a charming person, peculiarly pleasing, by the way, in male attire, in which she had often appeared, and will again, since the quality of her organ inclines to contralto, though she can sing Verdi's music with ease. She showed material for becoming a distinguished woman, and such as would repay the utmost cultivation; and therefore enthusiasm like that quoted here does not seem extravagant, to those who are familiar with the promise of her early life, not yet counting twenty years.

We speak of her as a public singer and artist, yet we do not think that a single word regarding her character will be esteemed de trop: this has always been better than merely irreproachable. She has always been known as a perfect daughter and sister; and there will be nothing to hinder her taking as high a position as Jenny Lind, so far as character is concerned.

She arrived in London a few weeks since, too late to make any engagement for this season, but she has under consideration offers for next year from the Royal Italian Opera, and from the English Opera Company.

She will have a warm welcome back to her own land, and there will no doubt be much interest felt to hear her, in the concert room, and as soon as may be in opera.—Daily Advertiser.

TO THE CICADA.

BY MELEAGER.

From the Greek Anthology.

Cicada! drunk with drops of dew,
What musician equals you
In the rural solitude?
On a perch amidst the wood,
Scraping to your heart's desire
Dusky sides with notchy feet,
Shrilling, thrilling, fast and sweet,
Like the music of a lyre.
Dear Cicada! I enreat,
Sing the Dryads something new;
So from thick-embower'd seat
Pan himself may answer you,
Till every inmost glade rejoices
With your loud alternate voices;
And I listen, and forget
All the thorns, the doubts and fears,
Love in lover's heart may set;
Listen, and forget them all.
And so, with music in mine ears,
Where the plane-tree-shadows steep
The ground with coldness, softly fall
Into a noontide sleep. Allingham.

WISHING.

A NURSERY SONG.

Ring-ting! I wish I were a Primrose,
A bright yellow Primrose blowing in the Spring!
The stooping boughs above me,
The wandering bee to love me,
The fern and moss to creep across,
And the Elm-tree for our king!

Nay—stay! I wish I were an Elm-tree,
A great lofty Elm-tree, with green leaves gay!
The winds would set them dancing,
The sun and moonshine glance in,
The Birds would house among the boughs,
And sweetly sing!

O—no! I wish I were a Robin,
A Robin or a little Wren, everywhere to go;
Through forest, field or garden,
And ask no leave or pardon,
Till Winter comes with icy thumbs
To ruffle up our wing!

Well—tell! Where should I fly to,
Where go to sleep in the dark wood or dell?
Before a day was over,
Home comes the rover,
For Mother's kiss,—sweeter this
Than any other thing! Allidgham.

Posthumous Works of Fred. Chopin.

From the Musical Review, (New York).

It was the general belief that Chopin had left no unpublished compositions. Even Liszt says in his biography of this composer: "He has left nothing of finished manuscripts but a last nocturno and a very short waltz." Happily, this is not so; for just now, in the sixth year after his death, (17th October, 1849,) there appears a valuable collection of hitherto unknown compositions, which may be considered without any shadow of doubt as genuine emanations of Chopin's genius. The title is as follows;

Œuvres Posthumes pour le Piano de Fred. Chopin, publiées sur Manuscrits Originaux, avec Autorisation de sa Famille par Jules Fontana. Berlin, chez A. M. Schlesinger. (Paris, I. Meissonnier Fils.)

The collection, the eight parts of which can be had separately, is adorned with the portrait of Chopin, lithographed by Waldow after the celebrated Ary Scheffer, besides a fac-simile in notes and letters of the author. The price is 5 thalers, (about $4.) As the preface is important by the historical facts it gives, we let it follow in extracts.

"Warsaw, where Chopin's family resided, possessed until 1830 a conservatory of music, under the direction of Jos. Elsner. With the aid of the latter learned composer, the young Chopin, who was already a distinguished pianist, went through a full course of counterpoint and composition. We had there the pleasure of being his fellow-scholar, and enjoyed since that time the advantage of his artistic influence. Long years of companionship in Paris united us still closer, and bestowed upon us the inclination and confidence of the artist. A proof of it may be the circumstance that he generally claimed our aid for the publication of his works; yes, that he left this entirely to our care when he was absent from Paris. His family, fully aware of these circumstances, honored us with the order to gather the musical treasures he had left, to make a choice of them, and to publish them. Whether Chopin himself in his last hour would have confided to us his unpublished compositions, as he had done before, we can not say, as we were at the time of his death far from France. Be it as it may, we heard him uttering often enough the wish to publish one or the other piece of the present collection.

"As yet some of these compositions were only written as souvenirs for friends, he would out of delicacy not have them published. Others remained in his portefeuille, as he had the habit of preserving his manuscripts for a long time before he thought of publication, and sometimes of neglecting them altogether. To-day this publication becomes the more urgent, as on the one hand speculators threaten by mere greediness to injure the remembrance of the artist, and on the other hand as friends of him are in the habit of procuring copies of his posthumous works, which present not at all the true character of the latter. It is so, that mere speculation and the anxiety of his friends produce the same result. We have seen and heard some pieces of the present collection which were mutilated in the most miserable manner, and this always by enthusiasts for Chopin. We can even name one concert in Paris, in 1854, where the most shameful mutilation took place, entirely for the pleasure of giving something from the posthumous works of Chopin.

"To prevent this for the future, we had to have recourse to the original manuscripts, and we have only to add that not only have we heard all the pieces of the present collection played by the composer several times, but that we also performed them in his presence, and that we preserved them in our memory just as he created them, and as we publish them now. This last circumstance was a great help for us when we had to choose between two or three variations of writing, all from the hand of Chopin, or to decipher something almost impossible to read.

"It may be allowed to us to add a few details with regard to the youth of the artist. Chopin never had more than one teacher on the piano, namely, Mr. Zywny, who taught him the first principles. The progress of the boy was so immense, that his parents and his master thought it best to leave him at the age of twelve years to his own instincts, and to follow instead of leading him. The then existing school could not suffice him: he then for something higher—an ideal which very soon appeared to him in more distinct outlines. It was thus that he produced his touch and style, which distinguished themselves from every thing which existed before him; and it was by this continual arduous searching after this ideal that he found at last that peculiarity and originality of execution, which since then have challenged the admiration of the world of Art.

"Even from his earliest years, he astonished by the riches of his improvisation on the piano. But he, too, was careful not to make a show of this proficiency. The few chosen ones who heard him improvise for hours without his introducing any phrase from another composer or from one of his own works, will not contradict us when we say that his most beautiful compositions are only reflections and echoes of his improvisation.

"Chopin was born March 1, 1809, and not 1810, as almost all biographers say. When he was nineteen, (1828,) he composed for us the Rondo à deux pianos, which forms the eight number of this collection. In less than a year, we saw him writing La ci darem la mano, the Krakowiak, the Concerto in F minor, the Airs Polonais, and the Concerto in E minor, all pieces with grand orchestra; without counting the trios for piano, violin, and violoncello, and other less important compositions. This was his debut; and although science after that time must have developed in him new resources, we can not think that his inspiration has ever taken a higher flight, was ever purer and more original, than in some of these compositions, especially the Concerto in F minor, (op. 21.) This concerto was written a few months before that in E minor, (op. 11,) and not, as is usually believed, after the latter.

"The pieces of the present collection comprise his whole career till his death. They come, for the greater part, from the papers which his family has gathered after his death; some from the albums of his friends; and the remainder were given to us by the composer at different times. In making our choice, we were conscientiously led by the idea which Chopin himself had of his compositions, laying aside all that he considered valueless; on the other hand, we hold all in honor he cared for, even his artistic fancies, which a friendship of twenty-five years has taught us to appreciate. We considered it useful to preserve the respective dates of his compositions, especially to those who intend to study the different phases of the talent of this great artist. Shortly will also appear sixteen melodies to Polish words, which will form the second and last part of his posthumous works. JULES FONTANA.

"PARIS, May, 1855."

The contents of the eight numbers are as follows:

The first contains a Fantaisie-Improvisation Allegro agitato, in C sharp minor, from the year 1834, nine folio pages long.

The second: four mazurkas from 1835, 1849, 1835, and 1846.

The third, also four mazurkas, from 1830, 1827, 1830, and 1849. The last mazurka, a curious chromatic winding, forty measures long, without an end, (da Capo al Segno senza fine.) is considered by the editor as the last musical thought of Chopin, which he threw on paper shortly before expiring, but which he could not try on the piano, being already too weak. This is, at last, a real dernière pensée of a great master, which may be considered the last respiration of that national Slavic spirit, and that love for his native country which form the principal element of the most original compositions of Chopin.

The fourth and fifth numbers, being five waltzes, from the years 1836, 1829, 1835, 1843, 1830.

The sixth number is the largest. It contains three grand Polonaises. No. 1, in D minor, eight pages; No. 2, in B flat major; No. 3, in F minor, also eight pages long. They are from the years 1827 to 1829; written, therefore, in the eighteenth, nineteenth and twentieth years of his life.

In the seventh number we find a Notturmo in E minor, (1827;) Funeral March in C minor, (1829;) and Three Ecossaises, (1830.)

The eighth number contains the rondo in C, for two pianos, of which Mr. Fontana speaks in his preface.

The artistic value of all these pieces we must defer speaking of till another time. The most interesting feature of these posthumous works will, doubtless, be the promised Polish melodies, as they will show Chopin from a new standpoint. It is quite sure that Chopin has written songs; but hitherto not one has appeared in print. Liszt says about this: "He remained in a sort of musical correspondence with his native country; one brought him new poems to Paris, which, provided with his melodies, went back to his birth-place, and were very soon generally known and admired, without any body being able to tell the name of the composer. As the number of these melodies became quite considerable, he intended, in the later years of his life, to have them gathered and published."

DEATH OF PIERRE ERARD.—The Paris papers report the death of this distinguished manufacturer of harps and pianos. The following is from Galignani's Messenger:

In the death of Mr. Erard the musical world has sustained a severe loss. To the genius of his uncle and of himself we owe the present perfection both of the harp and piano; the improvements of which commenced at the end of the last century, when the firm of MM. Erard was founded by Sebastian, the uncle of the deceased, one of the greatest mechanical geniuses that the musical art ever possessed. He found the harp without pedals in its ancient bardic form, and the piano competing doubtfully with the harpsichord; but with his nephew's assistance, he left the former the splendid instrument we now possess, and the latter endowed with a mechanism which may be said to have produced all the wonderful chefs d'œuvre of Liszt, Thalberg, and the other great virtuosi of our day. M. Pierre Erard, on the death of his uncle Sebastian, succeeded to the entire management of the establishment; and, under his superintendence, inventions and improvements were effected in the harp, and more especially the piano, which, protected by various English and French patents, received the award of seven gold medals, besides the Legion of Honor, which was granted to Sebastian Erard in 1827, and to M. Pierre Erard in 1834. The organ erected by Sebastian in the chapel of the Tuileries in 1829, destroyed by the mob in 1830, and re-erected by M. Pierre Erard, is a monument of their persevering and inventive genius; by an entirely original improvement (lately imitated to some degree, by the Austro-Italian phonochromatic organ in the Exhibition) the utmost degree of expression can be given by the fingers of the performer on this instrument, while in all pre-existing organs, the only imperfect source of expression was the pressure of the foot of the performer upon the "swell." The pedal piano is another improvement lately invented by M. Pierre Erard; who was raised to the grade of Officer de la Légion d'Honneur in 1851, and received the sole Council medal from the jury of the Great London Exhibition of that year, having been declared beyond competition at the Paris Exhibition in 1849, and member of their jury. To him the whole of the great improvements in the tone and stability of the piano are due. In his private character, M. Pierre Erard was liberal, kind, and amiable; the ready friend and benefactor of all real artists, whether French or foreign, and universally esteemed as the father of his workmen; how well this title was deserved, was perhaps best indicated by the appearance of all his various employés and all the musical notabilities now in Paris yesterday at his funeral. In the churches of Passy and the Petits Pères very handsome catafalques were erected, and upwards of 800 workmen and employés attended the mournful cortège on foot, and with not less than fifty mourning and private carriages containing the most distinguished artists and the élite of the musical circles in Paris, with a long list of private friends. It proceeded, after the service at Passy, to the church of the Petits Pères, where a service was performed, and thence to Père-la-Chaise, where funeral orations were pronounced by Baron Taylor, M. Fétis, M. Adolphe Adam, and others; among them a few heartfelt and touching sentences by an employé, in the name of the assembled workmen. M. Erard had purchased the Château de la Muette, at Passy, a favorite residence of Queen Marie Antoinette, and resided there at the period of his death. He has left a very large fortune to his widow and sister, the Countess of St. Andrea (widow of the celebrated composer Spontini), who are almost his only surviving near relatives. M. Erard has left no children.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, SEPT. 15, 1855.

The Piano-Forte.

The article translated from the German on our first page tells some sharp truths, although its tone is somewhat splenetic and one-sided, visiting upon the instrument itself the sins of those who have tried to make too much of it. Because the fleet-fingered, wonder-working virtuosos have sought through the Piano merely to astonish, where the proper end of music is to please, to give expression to the feelings; because they would fain make its key-board speak through all its length at once, and do the work of a whole orchestra,—are we to forget its humbler and more genuine services to Music? Are we to forget that there are such works as BEETHOVEN'S Sonatas, MENDELSSOHN'S Lieder ohne Worte, CHOPIN'S fiery inspirations and delicate dreams of sentiment, and so many products of the purest poetry of sound, written expressly for the piano, inspired in most cases by the piano, as the fingers, wandering over its keys, have wooed from them pregnant response to thoughts and feelings in the player's soul? Who shall say that much of the purest essence of musical thought, the choicest wine of musical inspiration, is not found in such works, written for and discoursed from the vibrating strings of the Piano?

To say that the Piano gives you something of everything in all kinds of music, but not the whole of anything, that it rather sketches and suggests than fills out and realizes great effects of harmony, and so forth, is not necessarily a reproach. There is a point of view, from which this very property of the Piano, this universal, or vulgarly speaking, Jack-of-all-trades serviceableness, becomes a very valuable virtue. In a piece of music, we are to consider not effect only, but also intrinsic character. The latter indeed should be placed always first; it is the essence of the thing; the intrinsic character of a composition remains unchanged whether it be played on one instrument or on another, whether it be perfectly or imperfectly performed, whether it be fully brought out and realized with all possible effectiveness to the sense, the ear, or only sketched to the understanding so as to convey the idea of its whole possible effect to the sympathetic soul, that meets its intention half-way, and only so can truly enter into the spirit of a composition, be it ever so sensuously, vividly or grandly rendered. It is this intrinsic character of the composition, this musico-poetic form and meaning, which the intelligent listener wants chiefly to get at. He can spare some breadth, some large sonority, some richness of orchestral coloring, some sensuous satisfactoriness of tone, if he can only get at the essential characteristic of the work, trace it back to where it sprung from the composer's mind, find the vital Beethoven or Mozart in it, and make intimate, intelligent acquaintance with that, with the beauty of the design, with the spirit and tendency of the work, the real value of its subject, the logical, artistic unity of the whole as it develops into the "express image" of the thought that prompted it. Now it is just here that the Piano-forte becomes invaluable. If it cannot sing, if it cannot prolong and swell a tone, if it cannot do the duty of an orchestra, if there is a limit set both to the volume and the brilliancy and the duration of its sounds, which, somewhat angrily awakened by percussion, explode and lose their being almost instantaneously—still it can give you such a sketch of any, the largest composition, that you may perceive and feel its design as you may that of a great painting through an outline engraving.

To a partial extent, a practised reader may gather the character and merit of a composition from the printed score. But still the ear craves to actually hear something. The imagined tones are tantalizing till they become embodied and are heard. And there is musical tone enough in a good piano to aid the imagination most essentially in this process, and thoroughly to quicken the perception of that residing in the music which may not be heard. To amateurs, to those who are but very partially musicians, in a word to the great class of music-lovers, it is an inestimable help to the understanding and enjoying of a great symphony or overture, to try it over in the intervals of public performance on the piano at home. No matter how thin the arrangement, one will thus seize on the essential features, and make them doubly his own, fix them in the memory, so that he will know what he is listening to the next time he hears the orchestra.

The Piano is a convenient master-key to all the treasures of Music. It enables you to bring them all home to you, without waiting for the rare and remote chances of having them displayed before you in all the breadth and brilliancy of a complete performance. It gives them on a reduced scale to be sure, in miniature, yet so that you can find out what they are. As princes marry by seeing the portraits of their brides, so through the medium of the Piano, by a mere bungling reading, even, which cannot be called playing, you may soon find out how far you can fall in love with a famed far-off miracle of the Art.

Thus "Well-known's" objection to the Piano-forte on the score of its tempting facility for shallow imitation of all kinds of music, though not without its truth, still overlooks a large part of the whole truth. In condemning the abuse of a thing, let us not forget its use. We have here seen one great use of our much abused parlor instrument. When we add the real musical satisfaction of hearing legitimate Piano music played upon it, compositions which do not at all fall into the category of the virtuoso school, but which belong to the pure poetry of the Art; when we add its beautiful accompaniment to the voice, whereby a SCHUBERT may invest a melody with more characteristic, genial, sympathetic clothing, than he could do by any other instrumental mechanism, except on the large scale; when we consider the means of expression contained in its infinite shades of accent, of loud and soft, and its coöperation with our most sensitive and subtle faculty of touch, whereby the soul, musically excited, shoots its volitions to the fingers' ends with lightning-like rapidity, and with nice fidelity to every shade of energy of impulse; when we consider all the uses and properties of the Piano, there certainly does seem to be enough good and legitimate about it left to offset all the mischief done to Music by the whole dazzling crowd of modern virtuosos. While BEETHOVEN remains, are we to judge the Piano only by the Lisztian standard? Rather let us comfort ourselves that THALBERG and LISZT seem to have reached the extreme in their direction, and that Piano-playing henceforth, in order to make progress, must come back to the starting-point of truth and nature, and begin again with a more modest aim and method. This opens a train of speculation in which we may indulge hereafter.

THE FLUTE—The numerous amateurs of this sweet instrument will peruse with interest a pamphlet of some fifty pages, by A. G. BADGER, one of the leading flute manufacturers in New York. It is an "Illustrated History of the Flute," and contains, 1. a history of the steps by which the ordinary flute has reached its present state; 2. an examination into the causes of its imperfections, and a statement of the principles on which flutes are constructed; 3. what has been effected by the Boehm flute. Although we cannot agree with the writer that "the tones of the flute have always been considered superior to any other instrument," that they "have the nearest approach to the human voice," &c., yet there can be no question of its great importance. Mr. Badger tells his story well.

Local.

CARL BERGMANN, as our readers will be pleased to know, is to pass the coming season in Boston. He is engaged as conductor by the MENDELSSOHN CHORAL SOCIETY, who are to give a series of Oratorio and Symphony concerts on Sunday evenings in the Tremont Temple. "St. Paul" and "Elijah" are the oratorios spoken of. Mr. ECKHARDT is to be orchestral leader and Mr. BABCOCK organist.

Mr. BERGMANN is also invited to conduct the first concert and rehearsals of the Philharmonic Society in New York, which he may do without interfering with his duties here, and we have strong hopes that there will be a grand orchestra organized under his direction for Symphony concerts in the Boston Music Hall, upon a footing that will insure success.

MR. GUSTAV SATTER, the talented Pianist, gave a farewell concert, before proceeding to Philadelphia, in the Tremont Temple, on Wednesday evening, assisted by a pupil, Miss JOSSELYN, who played with him on the Piano, and by Herr JUNGNIKKEL, the violencellist.

The HANDEL & HAYDN SOCIETY and the MUSICAL EDUCATION SOCIETY have both commenced their weekly rehearsals, with CARL ZERRAHN as conductor. The former society have taken up Handel's "Solomon," an oratorio never produced here, to our knowledge.

NEW YORK. PARODI and STRAKOSCH have given several more concerts.—Mlle. VESTVALI, on the eve of her departure to Mexico, gave a concert this week, assisted by Sig. BERNARDI, Sig. CERESIO, (a new tenor, much applauded), WILLIAM MASON, the Pianist, and Herr SCHREIBER, the famous cornet-player.—The PYNE and HARRISON troupe still play at Niblo's.

Music Abroad.

England.

This is the year of Musical Festivals, which come round triennially. The reports of those at Hereford and Birmingham fill column upon column of the Times and other newspapers. Our summary must be brief.

The 132d festival of the three choirs of Worcester, Hereford and Gloucester, commenced Tuesday, Aug. 21st. Tuesday, Wednesday, Thursday and Friday mornings were devoted to sacred music at the Cathedral, and the three evenings to secular concerts at the Shire-hall, the whole winding up with a grand full dress ball on Friday evening. The attendance generally was larger than ever, to the joy of clergymen's widows and orphans dependent on that charity. The orchestra, selected from the bands of the Italian Opera and Philharmonic Society, numbered near sixty of the best musicians. The choral force was drawn from the cathedral choirs of Hereford, Gloucester and Worcester, and the choral societies of those places and of Liverpool. The principal vocalists were Madame Grisi, Madame Clara Novello, Mrs. Weiss, Miss Moss, Miss Dolby, Mr. Sims Reeves, Signor Mario, Mr. Montem Smith, Mr. H. Barnby, and Mr. Weiss. Miss Moss and Mr. Barnby are local artists; the latter being of the Hereford Cathedral choir.

Of the first morning's performances the Daily News says:

This morning dawned most auspiciously. At 11 o'clock the great bell of the old cathedral called the people to prayer.

The opening between the nave and the choir being completely filled up by a temporary screen, the nave appeared to be a complete building in itself, and none of the sound of the music was lost in the choir. The orchestra extended from the screen nearly down to the floor. The service was intoned by the Rev. Mr. Goss.

Instead of the "Esther" overture, which has been used almost immemorably to open these festivals, we had that to Spohr's "Last Judgment," which was finely played. The pieces, responses, and chant to the Venite were, as usual, by Tallis; but the psalms were chanted to a new chant by Mr. Townshend Smith, which was much admired. Handel's Dettingen Te Deum went off exceedingly well.

The "Jubilate" was a new one composed expressly for this festival by Mr. Townshend Smith. It is good throughout, and of a thoroughly ecclesiastical school.

After the third collect we had the chorus "The heavens are telling," and trio (Mrs. Weiss, Mr. M. Smith, and Mr. Weiss), from Haydn's "Creation," and before the sermon was introduced the 98th Psalm—a work by Mendelssohn, which, we believe, has not been performed before in this country. It commences with an unaccompanied chorus for eight voices, and is particularly adapted for the cathedral and the occasion. At the words "Praise the Lord with harp," that instrument (by Mr. Trust) is introduced, and also the full band, which, however, pretty well overpowered David's instrument. The work is not too long.

The sermon was preached by the Rev. W. P. Hopton, who took for his text Isaiah 65, v. 1.—"Ho, every one that thirsteth."

The "Hallelujah" chorus from Beethoven's "Mount of Olives" brought the first morning's performance of sacred music to a close.

Of the concert in the evening GRISI and MARIO were the great attraction, who sang Casta Diva, Il mio tesoro, the duet Mira la bianca luna, and in the trio from Lucrezia Borgia. There were also Clara Novello, Sims Reeves, and other singers; there were overtures by Weber and Bennett; there were madrigals and ballads, and there was much ado about an infant phenomenon pianist, Master Arthur Napoleon, who played Thalberg's Mosé fantasia. One is a type of all these miscellaneous evening concerts. Of them the Musical World says:

The same old fashioned miscellaneous jumble presents itself as at the London concerts in or out of season. Miss Clara Novello sings "Ocean thou mighty monster"—as usual; Mr. Weiss sings his own "Village Blacksmith," to which he is naturally attached—as usual; Miss Dolby sings "Over the sea," on whose "azure brow," so far as she is concerned, "time writes no wrinkles"—as usual; duets from Linda di Chamouni, Roberto Devereux, etc., ballads worried to death, sentimental airs, tender trios and quartets, which have seen their best days, indeed, constitute, as usual, the staple commodity of the programmes. Hereford, however, is a long way from London, and the people of North Wales are not supposed to be blases like your metropolitan music-hunters.

Wednesday was the Elijah day. The audience was very large, and the cathedral was surrounded by people anxiously listening to catch at intervals the sound of voices and of instruments—nine out of ten of whom, says the Times, might have been seated inside in the galleries, but for the foolish system of exclusive, aristocratic prices. The execution of the oratorio is pronounced satisfactory in the main. To Mr. Weiss was allotted the part of the prophet, and Clara Novello, Miss Dolby, Mrs. Weiss, Miss Moss, Sims Reeves, and Mr. M. Smith, assisted in the principal solis. The News says there was general disappointment in Mario's rendering of "If with all your hearts," which was "without pathos or feeling." On the contrary the Times says:

Mario sang the recitative and air, "If with all your hearts" for the first time, and gave such unqualified satisfaction that he was compelled to repeat it. His pronunciation of the words was clear and emphatic.

The other encores (at the customary instigation of the Bishop) were awarded to the unaccompanied trio, "Lift thine eyes" (Madame Novello, Mrs. Weiss, and Miss Dolby); "O rest in the Lord" (by Miss Dolby); and "Then shall the righteous," by Mr. Sims Reeves—all fine performances, the last especially, which could not be surpassed in fervor and devotional simplicity of expression. On the whole the oratorio of Elijah has seldom been heard to more advantage in a church and as seldom been more entirely appreciated. Mr. Townsend Smith was conductor, and Mr. Arnott, of Gloucester, at the organ.

The second concert was attended by "about 450 fashionables." The overtures were Egmont and Tell. Reeves sang Beethoven's Adeleide; Clara Novello sang Mozart's Deh vieni; Mme. Weiss, his Dove sono; Grisi, Bell'raggio. Mendelssohn's Loreley fragment, Bellini's quartet: A te o cura, a finale from Euryanthe, and lighter miscellany, made out the programme, which was followed by a ball.

The Standard gives the programme of Thursday morning:

It consisted of Mendelssohn's "Hymn of Praise," Spohr's sacred cantata, "The Christian's Prayer," and Mozart's "Twelfth Service." At the commencement of the second part also was played an overture (St. Polycarp) not generally known in the musical world. It is written by the Rev. F. A. Gore Ouseley, Bart., precentor of Hereford Cathedral, and successor to Sir H. Bishop, at Oxford. Before Mozart's service, we had Luther's hymn most devotionally sung by Clara Novello. The introduction of the trumpet by Harper at the words,

"The trumpet sounds," produced a thrilling effect, and altogether this hymn produced the deepest sensation. Sims Reeves also sang (between the oratorios) the air, "Sound an alarm," from Judas Maccabaeus.

The "Christian's Prayer" is quite new in this part of the country, though it was performed at the Norwich festival in 1836. It is the first work written by Spohr for voices and instruments.

The Times remarks on the performance of the Mozart's Mass:

This very lengthy and interesting performance, which had begun with a grand piece of Protestant music, finished with one essentially Roman Catholic, in the shape of Mozart's Twelfth Mass (in Latin) called "service" in the programmes, but not the less a mass for all that. Not very long ago this innovation would on no account be tolerated; but the public has gradually become more liberal, and now consents to believe that the Catholic masses of Haydn, Mozart, and Beethoven, like the Protestant oratorios and psalms of Mendelssohn and Spohr, may be admired for their musical beauties alone, irrespective of their connexion with religious doctrine and forms of worship. We can only add that the solos in the mass (which is familiar and easy to the band and chorus) were sung to perfection by Madame Grisi, Miss Dolby, Signor Mario, and Mr. Weiss; and that the audience were thoroughly enchanted with the performance.

Of the third and last concert the features were the overture and vocal selections from Der Freyschütz; Qui la voce, (twice) by Grisi; Mendelssohn's "First Violet," (twice) by Miss Dolby; March and Chorus from Beethoven's "Ruins of Athens"; Mozart's Symphony in E flat; Mendelssohn's Rondo brillante, played by Master Napoleon "in a manner as surprisingly genial and spirited as it was mechanically imperfect," &c. &c.,—a long string of ballads, Italian arias and duets, concluding with "God save the Queen," for which some claim a Hereford origin, maintaining that it was composed by old Dr. John Bull, organist of Hereford Cathedral long ago.

Friday morning brought the musical solemnities to a worthy close with Handel's "Messiah." There were 1,111 persons present in the cathedral. The singers (whose performances in the same oratorio have been over and over again described) were Mme. Clara Novello, Miss Dolby, Mrs. Weiss, Miss Moss, Mr. Sims Reeves, Mr. Weiss, and Mr. Montem Smith—all English, and all thoroughly conscientious, where Handel's music is in question.

The Birmingham Festival we must defer to next week.

LEIPSIK.—A rumor is abroad that Herr Schleinitz (active) Director of the "Conservatorium," has resigned his office, which creates no little sensation among the teachers and members of the Academy, by whom he is much respected. He has directed the affairs of the institution since the death of Mendelssohn, of whom he was an intimate friend, and who appointed him to the post.

The Stadt-Theater will shortly again be thrown open to the public. The construction of the heating apparatus is progressing, and the lessee, Herr Wirsing, is travelling in search of an entirely new troupe of singers and actors. Herr Riccius, up to the present time conductor of the Euterpe concerts, which after the Gewandhaus are the best, has been engaged as Kapellmeister. The Gewandhaus concert season is expected to commence this season, as usual, in the beginning of October. Miss Arabella Goddard is engaged for at least one concert.

BERLIN.—The Royal Opera-house has been reopened, but for ballets only, twice a week, until the 11th inst., when the regular season will commence. The interior of the house has undergone some extensive alterations, the parquet being enlarged by the addition of 500 places.

FIRST PREMIUM MELODEONS,

The Very Best now Manufactured.

J. S. D. & H. W. SMITH respectfully call the attention of the public to their IMPROVED MELODEONS, constantly on exhibition at their Warerooms,

No. 417 Washington Street,

By means of a new method of voicing, known only to themselves, they have succeeded in removing the harsh and buzzing sound which formerly characterized the instrument, rendering the tones full, clear and organ-like. The action is prompt and reliable, enabling the performer to execute the most rapid music without obscuring the tones. The swell is arranged to give great expression.

The manufacturers received the First Premium, over all competitors, at the Fair of the Massachusetts Charitable Mechanic Association; also at the Metropolitan Mechanics' Fair, held at Washington, D. C.

For the Parlor, instruments are furnished at prices varying from $45 to $150.

Larger instruments, with two banks of keys, for chapels and small churches, from $150 to $300.

This last instrument, known as the ORGAN HARMONIUM, has been essentially improved by Messrs. Smith, and they have secured a patent therefor.

Persons who wish to hire Melodeons with a view of purchasing at the end of the year, can have the rents credited as part payment of the purchase money.

NEW COURSE OF HARMONY, BY L. H. SOUTHARD.

The Publishers call the attention of the musical profession to this work, as one eminently calculated to lighten the labors of the teacher, and rapidly advance the pupil. It is emphatically a PRACTICAL work, serving both as a Manual of instruction on the one hand, and a Text-book on the other; and it is believed that the peculiar arrangement of the work, together with the very large number of exercises and examples, presents great advantages, to both scholar and teacher, over any similar work of the kind. Teachers highly commend the work. Mr. WILLIAM MASON says it is a work unsurpassed in the language. Mr. GEORGE J. WEISS says that it is a work perplexous in diction, methodical in arrangement, and sufficiently copious to embrace all the essentials of the general doctrine of accord. It can be ordered through any respectable Music-seller, and will be sent through the mail on the receipt of the price, ($1.75), postage prepaid.

Translated for this Journal.

Virtuosos and Virtuosity.

FROM THE GERMAN OF "ONE WELL-KNOWN."

In a preceding letter I have already said, the virtuosos ought to give their concerts by themselves alone. For when a so-called virtuoso, not of the most distinguished, comes on between sterling instrumental works, he is tedious, like every mediocrity, and dulls the audience for the enjoyment of a genuine work of Art. If on the contrary he is one of the first of virtuosos, he disturbs the concert even more; since in the expectation of something extraordinary, in the eager curiosity about a personal notoriety, it is only the very few that pay attention to the pieces of music that precede his coming on; so that for the most part their sound dies out and leaves no impression. And when the performance of the virtuoso is at an end, the audience are so excited, that the succeeding pieces too are disregarded or lose much of the effect they otherwise would have.

The first case is the commonest in our times; since virtuosos, who with their facility are also virtuosos in expression, such as PAGANINI, the sisters MILANOLLO, &c., appear very seldom. The most of our modern virtuosos possess merely execution, are distinguished by their flexibility of fingers, and so forth, and thereby excite admiration; they are nothing but a sort of tight-rope dancers. To be sure, admiration, wonder, is itself an enjoyment, else would all the rope-dancers, as well as all the virtuosos, exert themselves to little purpose to entice and fleece the public; but such an enjoyment of mere wonder is no Art-enjoyment, and consequently virtuosos do not belong to any concert where one seeks enjoyment in the true works of Art.

To such a prodigious pitch of mechanical facility have many carried it in our times, that really the extraordinary has become quite ordinary and the public ceases to wonder, unless all that has been shall be outdone by some new phenomenon, or unless the virtuosity of expression shall be super-added to rare execution. This last, however, cannot be acquired, at least not to the same degree as the mechanical facility; it presupposes a rich soul and an impressive understanding. Hence the arrival of such virtuosos will always have a beneficial influence; for when we speak against virtuoso-dom, we mean only those who abuse their acquired facility, that is, who make it the prime object and neglect all else for that. Virtuosity in itself, the possession of very great facility, is indeed always an advantage, so long as it serves as a means to the end of bringing out more fully the expression of a piece of music, and is not made an end itself. Alas! false virtuosity will never disappear; for if with one generation it be thrust into the background, as it is now in our time, after having played so great a part and blunted the public appetite, still this generation does not remain; we give place to those that come after, and upon these, who come up with a fresh zest for the marvellous, the false virtuosos work anew the same impression which the others made upon their fathers, until they in their turn shall be satiated. If we say, as is now often said: the day of virtuoso-dom is past, we but ascribe our own mood quite unreasonably to our successors; for us indeed the virtuosity, that has been hitherto, is past, since upon us, who have had it to satiety, it makes no longer an impression.

What has operated most injuriously for Art has been especially the virtuosity of the piano-forte heroes, as I have already explained in the letter about the Piano.* This whole virtuoso fever is scarcely comprehensible, especially when we consider that they place the imperfections of their instrument in the clearest light in the performance of Concertos with full orchestra; for very seldom does the piano-forte admit of an artistic union with the orchestra; for the most part the instrument produces a mere rattling compared with the latter, and falls far behind the string and wind instruments in tone.

Strictly there are but two instruments, which can show the higher virtuosity, as the hand-maid of expression: namely the violin and violoncello. All the other instruments are either too gentle in their character, as the flute or clarinet; or disagreeable, like the obœe; or laughable, like the bassoon; or limited, like the horn; or ignoble, like the trumpet; or massive, like the trombone; or odd, like the contrabasso.

Unfortunately almost all the virtuosos fancy themselves also composers. But I maintain, that whoever would be a composer, must not wish to be a virtuoso. The reason is obvious. To acquire that virtuoso facility, which has now reached such a height, that it seems scarcely possible to go any further, one's whole time has to be devoted to exercises, so that no time remains for the more serious studies. For both at once a man's life is not long enough. It was otherwise in MOZART's time.

Few among the moderns have combined virtuosity with composition in a nobler manner than C. M. von WEBER. He wrote, it is well known, capital things not only for the piano, but also for many other instruments, which he continually brought into the foreground both characteristically and expressively. Modern virtuosity, especially the piano-forte virtuosity, has had a great and injurious influence, not only on the whole musical life, but on society in general—an influence not yet sufficiently appreciated. Music has been adopted into education, particularly of the female sex, but in a questionable manner; there seems to be an ambition to make virtuosos of them all, and the piano-forte, as well as singing, is perverted from its true ends. The consequence of this is, that Music, daughter of Heaven, is misused and degraded to the service of vanity and ostentation, especially among ladies. Very few now shrink from sitting down at the piano in company and playing some sort of a "Fantasia" as well or as badly as possible. This occurs far less frequently with gentlemen, who do not devote themselves exclusively to music. Just so it is with singing. Many an otherwise modest maiden, who has enjoyed "a good education", ventures to sing the first best aria di bravura, which demands the powers of a SONTAG for its right delivery. She cannot sing it as it should be sung, precisely because she is no singer by profession; and so she murders both the music and the listeners' ears, and out of etiquette is clapped and complimented. Thus almost every "cultivated" maiden is "musical", she can rattle on the piano and—sing. We love singing in a lady, but only when she sings what is suited to her, when she keeps to what is simple and does not try to be a virtuosa.

We entirely approve the adopting of music into the circle of branches of instruction; but—let us give the young people instruction in the elements of music; teach them what music ought to be and can be; diffuse correct views of the Art and carry it, if possible, so far, that every cultivated person may read music, may be able to make use of his voice or of some instrument—not merely of the piano-forte—and all will be addicted to the Art with deeper and truer love, and find far more enjoyment, than in the present striving to form only virtuosos, whereby all zest and pleasure are taken away from the young people through the soul-killing exercises required by virtuosity. If too much were not sought, far more would be accomplished.

Once it was otherwise, once it was better, and the people had far more simplicity and higher enjoyment in the Art. Almost all educated persons understood how to play the lute—a better instrument than our meagre guitar. In most houses were found stringed instruments of different pitch, and, when they were played together, (an art which many understood, since their pretensions were not great,) there was more euphony than in our piano jingling, and more enjoyment, for they looked more to expression than to virtuoso-like facility. So away with virtuoso-dom, above all in families and in educational establishments!

George Sand's Account of Chopin.

Just as a new interest is awakened in FREDERIC CHOPIN by the posthumous publication of a number of his works (referred to in our last), Mme. GEORGE SAND also has consecrated to him some pages of her Memoirs, now in course of publication in La Presse. The following fragments will be interesting to our readers, especially to those who have read LISZT's interesting account of the same period in his history, (translated in the first volume of our Journal.)

In 1838, the authoress of the Memoirs undertook a voyage for the health of one of her children. Chopin desired to accompany them, and George Sand consented. They met at Perpignan, and went to establish themselves at Majorca, where they found healthy and most picturesque lodgings in a desolated and half-ruined Carthusian monastery. We will now let George Sand speak:

"The poor great artist was a wretched invalid. What I had feared, unfortunately not enough, took place. He was completely demoralized. Enduring pain with considerable courage, he could not conquer the inquietude of his imagination. The cloister was for him full of terrors and of phantoms, even when he was well. He did not tell of it, and I had to divine it. On returning from my nightly explorations in the ruins with my children, I found him, at ten o'clock in the evening, sitting pale before his piano, his eyes haggard and his hair as it were standing up on end upon his head. It was some moments before he could recognize us.

"Then he made an effort to smile, and he played to us sublime things which he had just been composing, or, more properly speaking, terrible and thrilling ideas, which had taken possession of him, as if unawares, in that hour of solitude, of sadness and of terror.

"It was there that he composed the most beautiful of those short pages which he modestly entitled 'Preludes.' They are master-pieces. Several of them present to the thought visions of deceased monks and the hearing of funereal chants that haunted him; others are melancholy and sweet; they came to him in hours of sunshine and of health, to the noise of laughing children under the window, the distant sound of guitars, the song of birds on the moist foliage, and the sight of little roses palely blooming on the snow.

"Others again are of a sullen sadness, and while they charm your ear, they wound your heart. There is one among them that came to him one dismal rainy evening, and which fills the soul with shuddering dismay. We had left him alone that day, Maurice and I, to go to Palma to buy things necessary to our encampment. The rain came down in torrents; we had made three leagues in six hours on our return in the midst of the inundation, and we arrived at midnight, without shoes, abandoned by our vetturino, across unheard of dangers. We made all haste through anxiety for our sick one. She was alive, indeed, but she was as it were fixed in a sort of tranquil despair, and he was playing his admirable prelude in tears. Seeing us enter, he rose, uttering a loud cry, and then said to us, with a bewildered air and a strange tone: 'Ah! I knew very well that you were dead!'

"When he had recovered his wits and saw the state in which we were, he was sick at the retrospective spectacle of our dangers; but then he declared to us that in awaiting us he had seen all that in a dream, and that, confounding that dream with the reality, he had calmed himself and as it were lulled himself to sleep in playing the piano, persuaded that he was dead himself. He saw himself drowned in a lake; drops of water, heavy and icy, fell in measured beat upon his chest, and when I bade him listen to the sound of the rain drops, actually pattering with measured cadence on the roof, he denied having heard them. He was annoyed even that I translated the fact by the language of imitative harmony. He protested with all his might, and he had reason, against the puerility of such imitations for the ear. His genius was full of the mysterious harmonies of nature, translated by sublime equivalents in musical thought, and not by a servile repetition of external sounds.* His composition of that evening was indeed full of rain-drops, which resounded on the sonorous tiles of the chartreuse; but they had translated themselves in his imagination and in his song by tears falling from heaven upon his heart.

"The genius of Chopin is the most profound and the most full of sentiments and of emotions that has ever existed. He has made a single instrument discourse the language of the infinite; he has frequently been able to sum up, in ten lines which a child might play, poems of an immense elevation, dramas of an energy unequalled. He never had need of great material means to utter the word of his genius. He needed neither saxophones, nor ophicleids to fill the soul with terror; nor church-organs, nor human voices to fill it with enthusiasm. He was not known, nor is he yet known by the crowd. There must be great progress in the taste and understanding of the Art, before his works can be popular. A day will come when men will orchestrate his music, without changing anything in his piano score, and when all the world will know that this genius, as vast, as complete, as learned as that of the greatest masters whom he has assimilated to himself, has preserved an individuality even more exquisite than that of SEBASTIAN BACH, more powerful than that of BEETHOVEN, more dramatic than that of WEBER. He is all three together, and yet he is himself, that is to say, more subtle in his taste, more austere in his grandeur, more heart-rending in his grief. MOZART alone is his superior, because Mozart had more-over the tranquillity of health, and consequently the plenitude of life.

"Chopin felt his power and his weakness. His weakness lay in the very excess of that power which he could not regulate. He could not, like Mozart (in fact Mozart alone was ever able to do it) make a chef-d'œuvre with an ordinary tint. His music was full of nuances and of things unexpected. Sometimes, rarely, it was bizarre, mysterious and tormented. Although he had a horror of things one cannot comprehend, his excessive emotions would transport him unawares into spheres known only to himself. I was perhaps a bad criterion for him (for he consulted me as MOLIERE did his servant), because, through long acquaintance with him, I had come to be able to identify myself with every fibre of his organization. For eight years, in initiating me each day into the secret of his inspiration or his musical meditation, his piano revealed to me the raptures, the embarrassments, the victories or the tortures of his thought. I understood him therefore as he understood himself, and a judge more a stranger to him would have forced him to be more intelligible for all.

He had sometimes in his youth ideas that were bright and fully rounded. He has made Polish songs and unpublished romances of a charming bonhomie or an adorable sweetness. Some of his later compositions also are like crystal springs in which the clear sun beholds itself. But how brief and rare are these tranquil ecstasies of his contemplation! The song of the lark above and the rich floating of the swan upon the still waters are for him like lightnings of beauty in the serene sky. The scream of the complaining and famished eagle on the rocks of Majorca, the bitter whistling of the north wind and the sombre desolation of the yew trees, covered with snow, saddened him much longer and more keenly than the perfume of the orange groves, the gracefulness of the leafy vines and the Moorish cantilena of the laborers rejoiced him.

"It was so with his character in all things. Sensible one moment to the sweets of affection and the smiles of destiny, he was ruffled for days, for entire weeks by the maladresse of a careless person or by the petty contrarieties of actual life. And, strange to say, a veritable sorrow did not wound him so much as a slight one. It seemed as if he had not the force to comprehend it at first and to feel it afterwards. The depth of his emotions was not at all proportioned to their causes. As to his deplorable health, he accepted it heroically in real dangers, and he tormented himself wretchedly about it during insignificant changes. This is the history and the destiny of all beings in whom the nervous system is developed to excess.

"With this exaggerated sensitiveness about details, this dread of misery, and the wants of a refined prosperity, he naturally conceived a horror of Majorca after a few days of illness. He was too weak to make the journey back. When he grew better, contrary winds prevailed upon the coast, and for three weeks the steamboat could not leave the port. It was the only embarkation possible, and even that was now cut off.

"Our sojourn at the monastery of Valdemosa therefore was a punishment for him and a torment for me. Pleasant, agreeable, charming in the world, Chopin, sick, was desperate even in the exclusive society of his most intimate friends. No soul was more noble, more delicate, more disinterested; no intercourse more faithful or more loyal, no wit more brilliant in its gayety, no intellect more serious and more complete in all belonging to its own domain; but by way of offset, alas! no humor was more unequal, no imagination more cloudy and more delirious, no susceptibility more impossible to avoid irritating, no exactions of the heart more impossible to satisfy. And nothing of all that was his own fault. It was owing to his illness. His soul was flayed alive; the rumple of a rose leaf, the shadow of a fly made it bleed. With the exception of myself and my children, everything was antipathetic and revolting to him under the sky of Spain. He was dying with impatience to depart, far more than with the inconveniences of his stay.

"We were finally able to get to Barcelona and from there, by sea again, to Marseilles, at the end of the winter. I quitted the monastery with mingled joy and sorrow.

The Marseillaise and its Author.

The Philadelphia correspondent of the Charleston Courier, describing his walk through the picture gallery of that city, refers to a painting which is there of Rouget de Lisle singing The Marseillaise Hymn at the house of the Mayor of Strasbourg, 1792. It will be remembered, he adds, that De Lisle was an officer of engineers at Strasbourg, who relieved the tediousness of a garrison life by writing verses and indulging a love of music. He was a frequent visitor at the house of the Baron de Diedrich, a noble Alsacien of the constitutional party, the Mayor of Strasbourg. The family loved the young officer, and gave new inspiration to his heart in its attachment to music and poetry, and the ladies were in the habit of assisting by their performances the early conceptions of his genius. A famine prevailed at Strasbourg in the winter of 1792. The house of Diedrich was rich at the beginning of the revolution, but was now become poor under the calamities and sacrifices of the time. Its frugal table had always a hospitable place for Rouget de Lisle. He was there morning and evening, as a son, as a brother. One day, when only some slices of ham smoked upon the table, with a supply of camp bread, Diedrich said to De Lisle, in sad serenity, "Plenty is not found at our meals; but no matter—enthusiasm is not wanting at our civic festivals, and our soldiers' hearts are full of courage. We have one more bottle of Rhine wine in the cellar. Let us have it, and we will drink to liberty and the country. Strasbourg will soon have a patriotic fete, and De Lisle must draw from these last drops one of his hymns that will carry his own ardent feelings to the soul of the people." The young ladies applauded the proposal. They brought the wine, and continued to fill the glasses of Diedrich and the young officer until the bottle was empty. The night was cold. De Lisle's head and heart were warm. He then found his way to his lodgings, entered his solitary chamber, and sought for inspiration at one moment in the palpitation of his citizen heart, and at another by touching, as an artist, the keys of his instrument, and striking out alternately portions of an air, and giving utterance to poetic thoughts. He did not himself know which came first; it was impossible for him to separate the poetry from the music, or the sentiment from the words in which it was clothed. He sang altogether, and wrote nothing. In this state of lofty inspiration he went to sleep with his head upon the instrument. The chants of night came upon him in the morning, like the faint impressions of a dream. He wrote down the words, made the notes of the music, and ran to Diedrich's. He found him in the garden digging water lettuces. The wife of the patriot mayor was not yet up; Diedrich awoke her. They called together some friends who were, like themselves, passionately fond of music, and able to execute the compositions of De Lisle. One of the young ladies played, and Rouget sang. At the first stanza, the countenances of the company grew pale—at the second, tears flowed abundantly—at the last, a delirium of enthusiasm broke forth. Diedrich, his wife and the young officer cast themselves in each other's arms. The hymn of the nation was found. Alas! it was destined to become a hymn of terror. The unhappy Diedrich, a few months afterwards, marched to the scaffold by the sounds of the notes first uttered at his hearth, from the heart of his friend and the voice of his wife.

The new song, executed some days afterwards publicly at Strasbourg, flew from town to town through all the orchestras. Marseilles adapted it, to be sung at the opening and adjournment of the clubs; hence it took the name of The Marseillaise Hymn. The old mother of De Lisle, a loyalist and a religious person, alarmed at the reverberation of her son's name, wrote to him: "What is the meaning of this revolutionary hymn, sung by hordes of robbers who pass all over France, with which our name is mixed up?" De Lisle himself, proscribed as a federalist, heard its reëcho upon his ears as a threat of death, as he fled among the paths of Jura. "What is this called?" he inquired of his guide. "The Marseillaise," replied the peasant. It was with difficulty that he escaped.

The Marseillaise was the liquid fire of the revolution. It distilled into the senses and the soul of the people the phrensy of battle. Its notes floated like an ensign dipped in warm blood over a field of combat. Glory and crime, victory and death, seemed interwoven in its strains. It was the song of patriotism, but it was the signal of fury. It accompanied warriors to the field, and victims to the scaffold.

THE BIRMINGHAM TOWN-HALL is of Grecian exterior, with an Italic-Greek interior, and Mr. Ingram's plan has been to assimilate the decorations to the character of the structure itself. The work was commenced about four months ago, and last night it was finally completed. The ceiling is a mixture of Roman and Italian ornaments; the mouldings are of a Greek character, especially in their arrangement. The rosettes are strictly Roman. The ceiling is composed of three circles, each divided into four portions, separated by tapering on which are painted Arabesques in the manner of Raffaele, with musical trophies, vases of flowers, and other ornaments introduced. Each compartment is again divided into nine coffers or sunk pannels, the extreme depth of these being painted in rich crimson, with a gold radiating star. The framework of each compartment is a maize color, with Roman ornaments in soft carmine. The junction of the rib of each circle is a Roman rosette of white and gold, with a rich orange centre upon a blue ground. The first coffer is painted a deeper maize than the framework, with a terra cotta ornament. The next receding coffer is of blue and gold, and the extreme depth of crimson and gold. In all there are thirty-six coffers in each circle, forming a splendid enrichment for the centre, which consists of a sun-light, composed of 430 burners. Of these there are three in the ceiling. The framework of the ceiling is richly decorated with large rosettes, of singular beauty, especially as regards their execution. These are emblazoned with a profusion of gold, and relieved with glowing colors. The cornice is white; the cantelevers and the mouldings are etched with gold; but the peculiar character of the treatment is that every portion is distinct. On the frieze around the building is painted the celebrated honeysuckle ornament from the temple of Jupiter Stator. The walls are Sienna marble, finished in the highest style of art by a process which has gained for M. Ingram a peculiar pre-eminence. The pilasters are highly polished, resembling enamel. The basement of the building is of that peculiar grey tint which brings it in relief to the richer hues of the remainder of the decorations. The front of the gallery is bronze and gold. The decorations of the organ correspond with those of the building. The framework, excepting the base, is elaborately gilded; the pipes are of a rich cobalt blue, diapered with gold. On entering the Hall, the eye is delighted with its light and cheerful aspect. The colors are rich and brilliant, but they are so harmoniously blended that their combined effect is chaste as well as magnificent.

A new mode of illumination—the sun-light—has been adopted. This work, which has been successfully carried out by Messrs. Winfield, will add greatly to the splendor and the ornamentation. One of these lights is placed in each of the three compartments of the ceiling; each is composed of about four hundred burners, beneath which is suspended a glass dish of a prismatic character, about eight feet in diameter, and manufactured by Messrs. Osler. The light produced is clear, mild, and equally diffused. The experiment has been a matter of great anxiety; but the trials since the work has been completed have been in every respect satisfactory; in fact, for the first time the hall is thoroughly lighted in every part. —London News, Aug. 21.

MUSIC BY STEAM.—A Yankee genius has succeeded in harnessing steam to a musical instrument in such a way as to insure perfect execution. The name of the inventor is Joshua C. Stoddard, of Worcester, Mass. The following description will give some idea of the possibilities of the invention:

The instrument is of simple construction, and when once thoroughly put together, will seldom if ever get out of repair. It consists of a horizontal steam chest or cylinder, some six feet in length, and from four to six feet in diameter, which is fed with steam from the boiler in the establishment where it is located. Upon the top of this cylinder is a series of valve chambers placed at equal distance from each other, into which the steam is admitted without obstruction. Each valve chamber contains a double mechanic valve with no packing, yet it sits so closely upon its seat as to allow no steam to escape. To each of these valves is connected a very small piston-rod or stem which passes through the chamber and is operated upon by machinery without. Were it not for this stem the valve would be simply a double balance valve and would remain stationary wherever placed, the pressure of steam being equal on all sides; but a part of one end of the valve being carried outside of the chamber gives it the self-closing power, which is then the nicest part of the whole invention, and perhaps the best patentable feature. With a slight pressure against these rods the valve is opened, and when the valve is removed, it closes as quick as steam can act, which is not much behind electricity.

Directly over each of these valves is placed a common alarm whistle, constructed similar to those used upon locomotives, except that it admits of being lowered, to flatten or sharpen the tone. These whistles are made of different sizes, so as to produce the required tone corresponding with each note, &c. This completes the machine with the exception of a cylinder similar to those used in a common hand organ or music box, containing cogs, which, when properly arranged, will, when tuned by hand or otherwise, operate upon the valves in such a manner as to play any tune desired, by simply changing the position of the cogs, which are intended to be moveable.

One of these instruments can be heard from ten to twenty-five miles on the water, and every note will be perfect and full.

We heard the inventor play "Rosalie" on it, and it looked like "getting off tall notes" mechanically. This invention is so completely under the control of the operator that, were it arranged with a key board similar to a piano, it would obey the slightest touch, and a child could play slow or quick tunes, every note of which might be heard several miles.

It is the design of the inventor to place these instruments upon locomotives and steamboats. It would appear rather novel to John Bull to hear "Yankee Doodle" from one of our ocean steamers as she was about to enter a British port, (say twenty miles,) and it would remind a Yankee of his jack-knife to hear "Sweet Home" from the same vessel on its return from New York or Boston. This invention, if it meets the expectations of most who have seen it, will alter the tone of public demonstration on important occasions very essentially.

BIRMINGHAM FESTIVAL. This triennial festival (first established in 1769, and from the proceeds of which during 76 years nearly 400,000 patients have received assistance in the General Hospital) commenced on Tuesday Aug. 28. The Town Hall (see description in another column) had been redecorated, lighted and ventilated for the purpose. The musical forces are thus summed up in the News:

The instrumental band is at least as strong as it was in 1852; it numbers 145 performers, the bulk of these being selected from the most eminent metropolitan artists. The "quartet" of stringed instruments is 108 strong; the parts for the flutes, oboes, clarinets, trumpets, and horns are doubled, there being four of each instrument; there are three trombones and three harps, an ophicleide, two serpents, and the usual instruments of percussion. The list includes all the orchestral stars of the metropolis. On this occasion every voice has been carefully selected, and the component parts of the choir arranged with the utmost nicety. The vocal host will consist of 324 voices, thus apportioned:—80 sopranos, 80 altos, 82 tenors, and 82 basses. Of the entire number, nearly two hundred are members of the Birmingham Choral Society, who—being kept under active and almost perpetual drill by so exact and pains-taking a man as Mr. Stimpson, the Town Hall organist, is—may be presumed to be well up to the work; indeed, they are in capital discipline and efficiency. In addition to these, 68 are brought from London, and rather more than that number from the neighborhood of Bradford, in Yorkshire, these having gained for themselves a decidedly high reputation.

The opening morning was devoted to Elijah:—the best performance, say the critics, ever yet given in England, and before the largest and most brilliant audience ever assembled on the first day of the festival. Mr. COSTA, the conductor, was received with enthusiastic cheering, after which there was no applause. The part of the prophet was sustained by Mr. WEISS (Herr FORMES being retained for Costa's Eli), a "baritone of the first quality—equally remarkable for power and sweetness," a man "rapidly rising in his Art," and "not surpassed by any singer of his class in Europe." His Elijah is by one pronounced the best since that of the first Elijah, STAUDIGL. The principal tenor part was divided between SIMS REEVES and REICHARDT. For the rest we quote the Times:

The soprano music was divided between Madame Castellan and Madame Rudersdorff. Madame Castellan has lost none of the beauty and freshness of her voice, and pronounces English as well as ever. She never sung better in the affecting episode of the widow and her child, whose life is restored by the prophet, Madame Rudersdorff, to whom the whole of the second part was allotted, displayed all the qualities of a well practised artist: and though, in "Hear, ye, Israel," and "Holy, holy," she rather wanted power, in neither did she exhibit any want of intelligence. Miss Dolby, whose "O rest in the Lord" is always a model of unaffected singing, shared the contralto music with Madame Viardot Garcia. The plaintive air, "Wo unto them," was sung with exquisite feeling by the last named accomplished lady, who also, in the fine declamatory recitatives of Jezabel, rose to the highest point of dramatic expression. From the first chorus ("Help, Lord"), to that burst of ineffable joy, ("Thanks be to God!") who "laveth the thirsty land," the performance was irreproachable—as exact indeed, as a machine that may not go astray, but a machine that can speak eloquently, a machine with a soul. There was scarcely a fault from one end of the first part to the other; and when it is added that the second part was quite as well executed as the first, it may be readily imagined what sort of performance of their favorite oratorio the patrons of the Birmingham Festival enjoyed this day. To a lover of music it was well worth coming from London to Birmingham, if only to listen to the violins, &c.—such an army of stringed instruments as were never before assembled—in such choruses as "Hear, mighty God!" and "Hear and answer, Baal," where the false priests in vain invoke the assistance of their idol, and, best of all, in the one already mentioned, "Thanks be to God," in which the extraordinary descending scale of two octaves and a half allotted to the whole body of violins (which has been poetically compared to a vivid flash of lightning in the midst of the storm) was dashed off with unparalleled force and promptitude. Mr. Costa himself looked round as if surprised at the effect produced. The Birmingham chorus did honor to themselves and the music they had to sing. Not only were they excellent in the chorales, where steady, even singing is required, and in the grander pieces, like those already mentioned, and one almost equal to any of them, "Be not afraid;" but they were equally good in others less easily appreciable and demanding more finesse—such, for example, as the conclusion of the scene where Jezabel excites the people against Elijah, "Woe to him, he shall perish," and "Behold, God the Lord passed by" (Part II)—two of the most wonderful conceptions in the work, and which seldom, the latter especially, go absolutely well. The quiet and delicate choruses were perfect. The ideal beauty of "Blessed are the men that fear Him" (Part I), and of the angelic admonition while Elijah sleeps—"He watching over Israel"—could not have been more satisfactorily revealed.

The first evening's concert opened with Macfarren's cantata Lenora, an elaborate treatment with recitatives, airs, concerted pieces, and choruses, of Bürger's ballad. The second part consisted of Mendelssohn's Hebriden overture; a ballad from Henry Smart's opera of "Bertha," sung by SIMS REEVES; a duet from Rossini's Conte Ory, sung by CASTELLAN (in place of BOSIO, whose health did not permit her to appear) and GARDONI; Qui la voce, by GRISI; the quartet from Rigoletto, the air: Si lo sento, from Spohr's Faust, by MME. RUDERSDORFF; Non piu andrai, by LABLACHE; airs from Don Pasquale and L'Elisir, by MARIO and GARDONI; and the overture to Freyschütz. Part third was equally long and miscellaneous.

On Wednesday evening was the great feature of the festival, the first performance of the popular conductor COSTA's oratorio of Eli. Its reception was triumphant. "Such an ovation," says the Times, "is almost without a parallel. The biographies of the greatest musicians record nothing to compare with it." Yet the Times dissents from the popular verdict, in the following language:

If Mr. Costa possessed the genius of Handel, he could hardly have succeeded in constructing a really effective oratorio upon the materials furnished by the history of Eli, and thrown into the shape of a sacred drama by Mr. Barholomew. The chief personage himself—Eli, the priest—offers no opportunity to the musician for variety of treatment. He is constantly praying, preaching, or admonishing; and this has forced the composer to present him in a succession of slow recitatives and airs, which, long before the end, induce a feeling of monotony not easy to dispel, since Eli has a great deal to declaim and sing and is also constantly prominent. Hannah, the wife of Elkanah, is a character more favorable to music; and Mr. Costa has availed himself with great felicity of the contrast suggested by her first condition, as a woman childless and barren, and her afterwards joyful state, when God has blessed her with a son. The air in which her affliction is portrayed—"Turn Thee unto me, and have mercy upon me"—is devout and beautiful; while that which reveals the abundance of her joy, when, in the Temple of Shiloh, she pours out her gratitude to the Lord for having given her Samuel—"I will extol Thee, O Lord" is extremely happy, and has, moreover, a touch of the Handel bravura about it, both in form and sentiment, by no means unwelcome. The personage of Samuel is, perhaps, the most successfully developed of all. The tranquil piety of the heaven-devoted child is well expressed from the first, and there is not a more chaste and expressive melody than Samuel's morning prayer in the temple, "Lord, from my bed arise." The evening prayer, though graceful, is in a tone less purely devotional; but the whole character of Samuel is marked by a serious purport, and a power of sustaining which is a gift of itself. Mr. Costa has given Eli to a bass (Herr FORMES), Hannah to a soprano, MME. CASTELLAN, and Samuel to a contralto (MME. VIARDOT GARCIA). For a tenor he has been compelled to go over from the Israelites to the Philistines, from the mouth of whose chief, a mighty man of Gath (Mr. SIMS REEVES), we have one of the most vigorous battle songs, with chorus, ever written—viz., "Philistines, hark! the trumpet sounding!" in which the infidel warrior urges on his compatriots to march against the Hebrews. There are two other tenor parts—Elkanah, the husband of Hannah and father of Samuel, and a very small one in the person of a messenger of the Israelites (Herr REICHARDT), who brings the news to Shiloh of their defeat by the Philistines. There is also a second bass, in the Man of God, (Mr. WEISS), who reproaches the Levites for their iniquities, and discloses the awful denunciation of the Lord against the house of Eli. Into the merits of the various recitatives, airs, and concerted pieces distributed among these personages we cannot enter now; suffice it, they exhibit many decided beauties, are all essentially vocal, and, for the most part more or less expressive of the situation in which they occur. On the other hand, they present a mixture of styles, which is still more evident in the choruses, and constitutes, indeed, one of the principal defects of the oratorio. In the choruses, while examples of spirit, brilliancy, and even dramatic power are frequent, there is a singular inequality. Some are evidently written with great care; others seem to have been finished too hastily. Several specimens of fugue are to be found among them, the best of which occurs in the second part of the invocation of the Israelites, when they march against their enemies—on the words, "So persecute them with Thy tempest." This is the most interesting of all, and the best conducted, the florid accompaniments of stringed instruments reminded the hearer of Mendelssohn, while the theme is in the manner of Handel. None of the fugues of Mr. Costa are what is called elaborate. They do not display any great exercise of contrapuntal ingenuity, nor are they remarkable for those cunning devices of augmentation, diminution, inversion, and so forth, of which the fugues of Bach, Handel, and Mendelssohn are so fruitful, and by means of which those gifted musicians delighted to exhibit their learning. But Mr. Costa's fugues have one great distinguishing quality—they are clear, and therefore effective. Besides this, they are all based upon simple and well defined themes. As examples of this clearness, and the strength which is derived from it, we may point to the "Hosanna" in the last chorus of Part I, and to the "Hallelujah, Amen" which brings the oratorio to a close. What may be termed—to employ a common epithet—the descriptive music in Eli, is clever and spirited, but certainly too theatrical for a sacred oratorio. We would instance the scene of the "Ungodly Revel"—where Hophni and Phineas (the sons of Eli) are rioting with the women in the precincts of the Temple—the style of which exceeds all bounds of license, both in the character of the themes and the coloring imparted to them by the orchestral accompaniments. Even the war-song of the Philistine chief is in a great measure open to the same objection; but the natural desire of following Handel's example, in making a forced contrast in the music allotted to pagans and that appertaining to the chosen people, is a plausible excuse, and calculated to arrest criticism.

The execution may be described in a word—perfection. The orchestra and chorus labored with a zeal and unanimity that could only be traced to one source—viz., the regard and esteem they entertain for the conductor. The principal singers were admirable without exception.

The second evening concert consisted of Mendelssohn's "Italian Symphony," Loreley fragment, and march of the priests in Athalie; Beethoven's overture to Leonora; and a great many favorite vocal pieces, Italian, German and English, by the same singers named above. A new song, "Good morning," was sung by MARIO with "surprising purity of English elocution." A choral part-song by Mrs. M. BARTHOLOMEW was loudly encored.

On Thursday morning was a densely crowded audience and a splendid performance of the Messiah, which however was without novelty, except that the audience stood up during two other choruses, as well as the "Hallelujah." In the evening a third of those intolerably long concerts. Beethoven's "Pastoral Symphony;" overtures to Tell and Weber's "Ruler of the Spirits;" Mr. Howard Glover's "Tam O'Shanter" cantata; the sestet from Don Juan, tenor air from Zauberflöte, trio from Così fan tutte; and various songs by the singers before named,—all were sat through by the Birmingham amateurs. Prince Albert's "Invocation to Harmony," for solos and chorus, was of course much applauded.

The fourth day opened with Beethoven's "Mount of Olives," in which the principal singers were Mme. Rudersdorff, Herr Reichardt and Mr. Weiss. This was followed by Mozart's Requiem, the soli parts by Castellan, Miss Dolby, Gardoni and Formes. Then came fragments of Handel's "Israel in Egypt," including many of the airs and recitatives as well as choruses, but in promiscuous order. The national anthem concluded, as it had inaugurated the musical performances.

SIG. GORDIGIANI'S CONCERT.—(From the Athenæum, Aug. 4.)—Could an audience be gathered at this late period of the season to hear the most gracious and tasteful of modern Canzoni elegantly sung, Signor Gordigiani ought to have had a crowded room on Tuesday, instead of the scanty assemblage which answered his call. Truth to say, however, the Signor's compositions come hardly within the domain of concert-music. They belong rather to the oriel,—to the terrace,—to the intimate circle made up of one refined singer and a few listeners,—to our choicest hours of quiet pleasure, in which, while nothing recondite is demanded, nothing that is common-place can be endured. More than ever on Tuesday, when some half-dozen of Signor Gordigiani's compositions were introduced, did we feel their completeness and grace. "Impressione" a delicious romanza sung by Signor Ciabatta—"L'Esule," by Signor Belletti—"Il Giuoco della Morra," by Signor Bettini and Ciabatta—and "E m'è venuto un abbaglione," by Miss Dolby, are all, after their kind, trinkets, if not "gems." As if, moreover, to show how completely Signor Gordigiani may claim credit as founder of a school, two specimens, by Signori Pinsuti and Campana, were added, in which the Tuscan composer's manner has been obviously and fairly well imitated. A Madame Wilhelmy, an average German soprano who is new to London, made her appearance on this occasion. Signor Belletti sang Peter's romance from "L'Etoile" so finely as to make us wish he had sung the entire part here. Herr Halle played, also M. Pague. Signor Gordigiani accompanied his own Canzoni, and, we suppose, he may be allowed to do what he likes with his own property. But how is it that so many Italian maestri, full of grace in their vocal thoughts, are so heavy and cruel in their treatment of the pianoforte? Is it that they do not care?—that they will not hear?—or that they cannot learn to play?

ST. PETERSBURG:—A plan is on foot to establish a musical institution on a grand scale; in which every department of musical knowledge is to be cared for; in order that, at last, all performers, from chorus singers to solo artists, and from instrumental players to composers, shall be natives—a kind of musical Know-nothing movement. The Emperor has accepted the plan. The institution will be supported from the State treasury. Gen. Lvoff, who has lately changed his position from officer to Senator, and is otherwise high at court, has been appointed first in the direction, and is to carry out the plan.

The Russian version of Meyerbeer's Etoile du Nord is completed.

VIENNA.—In the season last closed 17 various operas were performed: namely, the Barber nineteen times; Rigoletto, seven times; Tronatore, seven; Mosè ten times; Linda, twice; Ernani, five times; Lucrezia, five times;

Traviata, (new) twice; Pasquale, three times; Marco Visconti, by Petrella, four times; Cristina de Svezia, by Thalberg, (new) three times; Otello, twice; Maria di Rohan and Lucia, each twice; Don Giovanni, twice. By a comparison of the composers, it will be seen that the grand maestro Rossini still bears away the palm, despite modern composers: namely, Rossini had twenty-six evenings; Verdi, twenty-one evenings; Donizetti, fourteen; Petrella, four; Bellini, three; Thalberg, three; Mozart, two.

The debuts of the opera have followed each other with great rapidity: Fräulein Hoffman, as Leonora in Stradella; Fräulein Weiser as Matilda in Tell; Herr Kubly and Herr Schmidt from Prague. But the most successful debut was that of Fräulein Luise Meyer, from Prague. In her we have a Prima Donna worthy of the name.—N. Y. Musical World.

Musical Chat.

The New York Academy of Music announces a season of forty nights of Opera, to commence the first of October. Besides the singers already mentioned as engaged, rumor mentions Mlle. ALDINI, a mezzo-soprano, and our townsman Mr. H. MILLARD. Miss HENSLEY has already joined the troupe and is to appear in Meyerbeer's Robert, Huguenots, etc. her parts in which she has been industriously studying with her old and faithful teacher in this city, Mme. ARNOULT. Meyerbeer's L'Etoile du Nord is also said to stand upon the programme. Friends of WALLACE too are urging the adoption of two new operas by him. One called the "Amber Witch", with a libretto by CHORLEY, of the Athenæum, he has just finished for Vienna. . . . PARODI goes off concertizing with STRAKOSCH, after giving several much be-praised concerts in New York. By the way, of poor TRUFFI, whom Parodi, by sheer force of that physico-tragic intensity which the Italians admire, unfairly eclipsed, when MARETZKE first brought her to New York to eclipse JENNY LIND(!), we find pleasant news in "L'Aboueyr's" letters to the Evening Gazette. He writes from Milan:

"My first visit in the city was made to our old friends Signor and Signora BENEDETTI (formerly Signora Truffi,) well known throughout America as two of the best operatic artistes who have ever visited our country—and no less worthy of esteem in their private characters, than for their remarkable musical and histrionic ability. They are only passing the summer at Milan on account of its healthiness, Forli, their place of residence, about forty miles from Bologna, being at present one of the towns most severely scourged by the cholera. I received a most cordial greeting from both, and found them in fine condition of health and spirits. They have one beautiful child, a girl of little more than two years old, seemingly the very crown of their happiness. They speak of America in the warmest terms of admiration, and of their many friends there in expressions of the most affectionate remembrance. Signora Benedetti, since her return home, has sung two seasons of about eight months each, with great success, both of esteem and profit—one at Corfu, the last at Bucharest. Benedetti's voice is quite restored, but he has not resumed his profession since his return to Italy. They have both a great desire to revisit America, where I am sure they would receive as warm a welcome as they or their friends could wish for."

The Pittsfield Seminary for young ladies, in which music is recognized as one of the most important branches of a true education, is fortunate in the possession of so able and earnest-minded a teacher, as Mr. E. B. OLIVER. At a recent examination of the school, prizes were awarded for musical proficiency, and the exercises had their finale in a musical entertainment, furnished from the unaided resources of the pupils and with a programme of a much higher order than we had learned to expect from boarding schools. Among the pieces played were the overtures to Tancredi and "Magic Flute" for six and eight hands, a Sonata by Beethoven, a Sonatina by Kuhlau, and lighter pieces; and there were sung a two-part song by Mendelssohn, German songs by Abt and Kücken, a trio: "Summer," by Horn, &c. The Congregationalist closes a report of it in these words:

"And when we add, that the whole passed off without any approach to failure in a single part, that difficult overtures arranged for two, three and four performers upon the piano, were given with almost perfect precision, it must be allowed to show much aptness and skill in the pupils and ability and thoroughness on the part of their instructors. The selection of music was in a high degree classical, and whether vocal or instrumental, was executed with much correctness and taste, the piano playing of the young ladies especially exhibiting a neatness, delicacy and force, not often found in similar circumstances. I believe there was but one feeling on the part of those who listened to the entertainment, that of delightful admiration."

Some of our readers will be interested by the following paragraph in the London Athenæum, about one of our old concert favorites:

"The music written for Mr. C. Kean's edition of King Henry the Eighth, by Mr. J. L. HATTON, and published in Pianoforte arrangement by Messrs. Campell, Ransford & Co., is good enough to claim notice out of the theatre. It consists of an overture, entr'actes, pageant music, and the part-song 'Orpheus with his lute.' This last we set aside, because, pleasing and graceful though it be, there was no necessity for it to supersede former settings of Shakespeare's exquisite lyric by Linley and Bishop:—the last, one of Sir Henry's best two-part-songs. But the instrumental music is of good quality, as regards the ideas, and not second hand German,—in part, because Mr Hatton has properly wrought up old English themes and metres,—but in part, also, because there is a certain stuff of nationality in him. Why this should not have been developed more freely and forcibly than is the case,—why Mr. Hatton, who writes such fresh English glees and such clever English incidental stage-music, should not yet have approached English opera nearer than his 'Pascal Bruno,' which was produced at Vienna,—we need not now inquire. Enough to say that this music to 'Henry the Eighth' is calculated to do credit both to the composer and to the theatre which commissioned the composer to write it.

VIEUXTEMPS, the most classical of violinists, and SERVATS, the violoncellist, have been giving concerts in Paris to the delight of the truest music-lovers, but to far smaller houses than the clap-trap virtuosos draw. The Gazette Musicale says that in their unworlly artist-like simplicity they compete at disadvantage with the dazzling humbugs of the day and need some shrewd caterer to prepare the way for them; and suggests that some Barnum, who should give eight or ten Quartet soirées in a year, with four such artists as SERVATS, SIVORI, VIEUXTEMPS and ALARD, the three last taking first and second violin and alto by turns, would richly remunerate both them and himself; for classical chamber music "has in Paris its public, its dilettanti, who are as little learned and as ridiculous as those of the Théâtre Italien, but who nevertheless serve the propagation of the fine works of Mozart, Weber and Beethoven."

We have not yet heard and seen RACHEL, but we cannot doubt that there is much truth in the following remarks of the Musical Review:

"Mlle. Rachel belongs to music as much as the French recitative style, from Lully to Meyerbeer, belongs to music, or as the great dramatic singers of the French opera, the Duprezs, the Nourrits, the Rogers, do. Not only this, but we think also, that only considered from this point of view can she be fully understood. For, if you will adopt the modern principle of acting, you would be sometimes at a loss to understand how Mlle. Rachel can throw, with an immense volubility, like the Italian parlando style, two or three lines of her author into your ears, with one breath, while, immediately afterwards, she is as slow as a "grave" piece of the old masters. The more we think about it, the oftener we hear her, the more we are inclined to class her with the musical celebrities of the world. The modern Germans have invented, or rather restored, what they call, "Das erhöhte Sprachvermögen," or that music which arises from the strengthened accent of the words, and which may be considered as one of the principal features in dramatic music of the future. If ever this musical drama of the future comes to exist, the modern Germans, in our opinion, will be mostly indebted for it to Mlle. Rachel, who anticipates that "erhöhte Sprachvermögen" more than anybody else. The verses of Corneille and Racine pour into our ears with all the usual musical accessories. There is piano, forte, sometimes a sforzando, which takes your breath away; there is crescendo, decrescendo, and a morendo, which is really dying, and makes your very heart ache. Besides, there is that melodiousness and command of tone which can only be obtained by immense study. Every body who wants to hear variety, brilliancy, and powers of modulation, must go and hear Rachel; she is decidedly the greatest modulatrice existing."

Willis's Journal publishes a circular, issued by a number of the leading American musicians in New York (Messrs. HILL, BRISTOW, DODWORTH, &c.) calling a meeting of professors and amateurs to "take into consideration the practicability of effecting an organization for giving a Musical Festival, on a plan similar to those given in Europe." The meeting was appointed for the 12th; we have not heard the result. . . . The same paper states that Sig. BADIALI, who was reported as about to sail for Europe, will remain in this country. . . . The LAGRANGE troupe, previous to the opening of the Academy, have been giving, or rather, it would seem, announcing and not giving concerts in Cincinnati and elsewhere, as they did here in Boston and Providence. The two dollar tickets would not sell. . . . ERARD, it is said, sent one thousand of his grand pianos yearly to the United States.

Musical Journals, of one class or another, are springing up in all parts of the country with such rapidity that one can scarcely keep the run of them. Most of them are cheap affairs, got up to serve the psalm-book-making or singing-school teaching enterprises of their respective conductors and "professors." And as in most instances we have seen but one or two numbers, and then heard no more of them, the inference would seem to be that they are quite short-lived. They hail from the woods of Maine, from the hills of New Hampshire, from the nutmeg valleys of Connecticut, from the "music of the future" settlements of the far West, as well as from the huge steam factories of psalmody in the big cities. To-day we have to acknowledge the receipt of the first number of one which has at least the merit of overflowing good nature and civility, in refreshing contrast with the bitterness and pettiness of so many of its predecessors. It hails from Gonic, New Hampshire, and bears the title of "Whitehouse's Musical Herald", published monthly. It goes in for the "music of the masses", and with a view particularly to the interests and success of "the New England Bards", to wit, Whitehouse's, whom we take to be one of the numerous companies of travelling minstrels. It commences its career with a most cordial and fraternal greeting to the three established musical Journals of New York and Boston, gratuitously publishing their prospectuses, commending them to still wider patronage, and impartially distributing its "veneration", its "prodigious affection" and its commendation among the three. What can we do less than return thanks and hope that the Musical Herald, all the way from Gonic, New Hampshire, may reap all the success it shall deserve.

The rehearsals of the MENDELSSOHN CHORAL SOCIETY, we understand, commence on Monday evening, Oct. 1st, at Chapman Hall, with Mendelssohn's oratorio of "St. Paul," under the direction of CARL BERGMANN.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, SEPT. 22, 1855.

Musical Prospects of the coming Season.

The disastrous concert season of the last winter in our city seems to have a somewhat paralyzing influence on those organizing efforts which should by this time have entirely ripened, for the first class of concerts in the season fast approaching. And yet every one says, and every one feels, that there is now a strong reaction from the past year's musical indifference, and that any really fine concerts of the highest order, properly arranged and guaranteed, must be quite certain to be welcomed with a keen return of appetite. We speak of course mainly of those concerts, which always constitute the vital pivot on which our whole musical winter turns, of the great Symphony Concerts of a grand orchestra, such as we have had in times past, for twenty years or more, from the old Academy of Music, from the Musical Fund Society, and more recently and most successfully from the Germania Society, alas! now no more. Other concerts, Oratorio, Quartet and Quintet, miscellaneous, we shall doubtless have, and good ones; but it is on the living presence amid all, of a true orchestra, performing the master-pieces of musical Art, that the pervading high tone and enthusiasm of all depends. Without such an orchestra, in the constant practice of such music, of the great symphonies and overtures, the instrumental musicians themselves lose tone, and sink, under the drudgery of theatre and band playing, to the un aspiring level of what the Germans call Musikanten, or hack musicians.

Such an orchestra we cannot doubt we shall yet have. The materials exist; the fit leader exists. Where there is the demand, there must come the supply. There are fine occasions near at hand to give special éclat to such a series of concerts. There is in December a birth-day anniversary of BEETHOVEN, which will become of special interest, if we are to have Crawford's statue of the great composer inaugurated in our Music Hall; and the 27th of next January will be the one hundredth anniversary of the birth-day of MOZART! Shall such providential invitations be neglected?

We are happy to be able to say that there is now a serious movement on foot, whose success admits scarcely of a doubt, for the arrangement of a series of classical orchestra concerts in the Music Hall, with CARL BERGMANN as conductor, with an orchestra of at least fifty members, and with most positive guaranty that whatever programme shall be announced shall be fulfilled to the letter as well as in the spirit. Of course the musical public will be called upon to do their part. We hope to announce more definitely in our next.

If a series of regular evening orchestral concerts gains successful headway, then of course afternoon "Rehearsals," so-called, and all the natural off-shoots from the well-rooted centre, will in due time appear, and we shall again become familiar with great instrumental music given by a sufficiently large as well as well-trained orchestra to tell upon the larger public.

There will of course also be smaller orchestras connected with our choral societies, and we have already stated that the Mendelssohn Society contemplate coupling Symphonies with their choral performances on Sunday evenings, to be played by the orchestra under the same able director above named. Perhaps, too, Mr. ZERRAHN, who conducts the other two societies, and who developed such good powers as a conductor last winter, may see encouragement to revive his "Orchestral Union" afternoon concerts.

So much for orchestras. Of Oratorio concerts the prospect is richer than ever. Our three societies have not been losing time, but are organized and drilling for a hearty campaign. The MENDELSSOHN CHORAL SOCIETY, and the MUSICAL EDUCATION SOCIETY both commence their weekly rehearsals on the first Monday evening of October; the former with Mendelssohn's "St. Paul," the latter with Handel's "Jephtha." The HANDEL and HAYDN SOCIETY, under CARL ZERRAHN, are already rehearsing Handel's "Solomon." "Elijah" is also talked of by the Mendelssohn Choral. The "Messiah" will of course have due honor at Christmas time, and there is talk of the societies combining forces. If they do, we trust they will not neglect the opportunity, before they separate, of also doing justice to Handel's grandest choral work, the "Israel in Egypt."

Of Classical Chamber Music there can be no lack. The MENDELSSOHN QUINTETTE CLUB have no discouraging memories of the last year to damp their ardor. In spite of hard times, theatrical distractions, fickleness of the great public, they found their public true and succeeded in attaching it to them by stronger ties than ever. Of Mlle. DE LAMOTTE's intentions and of the GERMAN TRIO of Messrs. GARTNER and associates, we hear not, but presume they will be in the field, as they were last year. And, what we did not have last year, making that year poorer than its predecessors, the re-assembling of such artistic talent in our city as that of OTTO DRESEL, BERGMANN, SCHULTZE and MEISEL, gives us strong hopes of a revival of those choicest classical soirées, which cannot be forgotten.

Of miscellaneous, "star" concerts, of Italian Opera, &c., our chances are as well known to our readers as to us.

The Piano-Forte.

We spoke last week of the uses and abuses of this most serviceable and, under true conditions, really beautiful instrument. We threw out the suggestion that the Liszts and Thalbergs, the concert virtuosos, the wonder-players, have carried piano-playing to the extreme in one direction, and that, if there is to be a further progress, composers and pianists must come back to the starting-point of simple, natural expression and proceed anew. The mischief done to music by the temptation to mere dazzling mechanical facility, offered by the piano, was strongly stated in the letter from the German, which formed the text for our remarks, and is still more enlarged upon in another letter, which we translate to-day, about the Virtuosos.

The Piano-forte, it must be considered, is a parlor instrument, and does not properly belong to concerts, at least not to concerts on a large scale. To this more showy, public purpose it has been perverted, forced, by virtuosos, into a degree of power and brilliancy, often remarkable indeed, but beginning where the genuine, less ambitious, real musical expression and soulful sweetness of the instrument leave off. It can be, it is made strong, it is made brilliant, it is made to seem to do almost the work of an orchestra, and still more to display the marvellous rapidity of finger, fiery strength of nerve, and preternatural wide grasp of harmonies, of the concert-player, who would keep himself in the foreground; but in doing all this does it not in some sort immolate itself? And has not this concert magnifying of its power engendered a whole false school of compositions remarkable for anything but the true soul of music?

The piano produces its tones originally in an artificial and mechanical manner: namely by the percussion of the hammer, provoking the vibration of the string, so that there leaps out an explosive kind of tone, beginning for the most part too loud and vanishing upon the instant:—a tone which has not its prototype in the agreeable musical sounds of nature, unless exceptionally, since the human voice, the vibration of wind-swept strings, all wind instruments, swell and diminish their tones with a prolonged and audible gradation. And in this very crescendo and diminuendo it is that real musical expression on the part of single tones resides. Not, of course, that there are not legitimate occasions for a more sudden, short and fiery accent, for the style called staccato, &c. But these are properly occasional.

Now the piano, by softer and more gentle usage, within narrower range of audience, does allow truly sweet, expressive, singing music to be wooed from its strings; whereas to make it serve the virtuoso concert end it has to be forced into an exaggeration of its mechanical, percussive principle, and so the loss of simple musical expression has to be made up, or covered up, by lightning-like successions of notes, prodigious arpeggio passages, &c., in a word by the invention of all those modern musical pyrotechnics, which turn the heads of unmusical young people.

With this development of piano-playing, naturally and necessarily the progress of piano-making has kept pace. Hence in the first place the astonishing multiplication of pianos, which sends them into every village in our land, and overhangs the upper part of Washington Street with so many tall, vast, beetling edifices, labelled "piano manufactory," that a stranger must suppose it the main business of Boston. Hence in the next place the tendency to one point, with (allowing for various degrees of excellence) well-nigh equal results in the perfection of the instrument by various makers. The differences are in perfection of material and workmanship, rather than in essential character. Each maker imitates the other. There is one better than another, but none so essentially different from others, that the art of piano-making can be said to have achieved a real progress for a number of years past. And for very much the same reason that it is next to impossible to tell which is the best among the wonderful piano virtuosos, who have so multiplied of late.

There have been a great many so-called "improvements," "attachments," &c., invented to the piano of late years. But they have come to nought, chiefly because they were not legitimate, because they tried to make the piano something else than the piano, instead of making more of what is found in the legitimate vibration of the string struck by hammers. There have of course been improvements enough, and very important ones of a mechanical nature, in perfecting the action, increasing and equalizing the power and brilliancy of the tone. But the poetic, sympathetic, soul-winning character of its tone has certainly not been developed in any thing like the same proportion. It has been a matter of common doubt whether it ever could be. If it ever is to be, is it not natural to look for it in the direction of that softer, sweeter, more expressive, parlor character of the instrument which has been so long eclipsed by virtuosity? Will it not come from that invention which shall purify the primitive tone from all foreign admixture, emancipate it from its wood and iron bondage, reduce the tone, as it were, to its essence, and prolong it to the ear? It was in this point of view that we found ourselves awakened to a new hope by the interesting experiment of Mr. Robinson's "Swell-Mute," briefly noticed in our columns a few weeks since. How much it may lead to, we cannot presume to judge, but that it points in so true a direction as to merit the examination of pianists and piano-makers, seems as clear as day-light.

We had the pleasure of listening one afternoon last week to a Te Deum composed by our townsman, Mr. FRANCIS BOOTT, at present residing in Florence. It was sung, by way of trial, in the Stone Chapel, by a quartet of voices, chiefly belonging to the choir of the chapel, in the presence of a small invited company. The piece opens with a spirited and lively strain of praise, in a simple fugued style that reminded one of some of Calcott's and other old English Glees, yet wanting not in dignity and seriousness. This leads into an elaborate soprano solo, thoroughly Italian, perhaps almost operatic in its manner, yet very beautiful of its kind, and really pathetic; at least so we found it in the exquisite singing of Miss ELISE HENSLEY, whose fine voice we fear we shall not soon have another opportunity to hear in any music apart from Italian opera. Next came a short bass solo, with interjectional choral responses, which made us think very much of Rossini's "Moses" and Sabat Mater, sung by Mr. ADAMS; then a pleasing contralto solo, in the rich voice and chaste style of Miss TWICHELL; and then the finale, a good strong piece of harmony, with some striking modulation, and a good deal of character. As a whole we found the music interesting, and more so on the second hearing. Compared with the severe and plain old English Episcopal models, this Te Deum would be called rather light, bordering on the secular and Italian operatic, and by no means chiming with the notions of our strict friend "Counterpoint". But we have heard a great deal of so-called solemn and severe church music, which had not half so much religious feeling in it. Mr. Boott has certainly a true vein of melody in him, as we knew of old by his clever little songs published under the name of "Telford". And this gift he has been zealously improving by long and careful studies, with the more learned Italian masters, in the contrapuntal science.

FIRST PREMIUM MELODEONS, The Very Best now Manufactured.

S. D. & H. W. SMITH respectfully call the attention of the public to their IMPROVED MELODEONS, constantly on exhibition at their Warerooms,

No. 417 Washington Street,

By means of a new method of voicing, known only to themselves, they have succeeded in removing the harsh and buzzing sound which formerly characterized the instrument, rendering the tones full, clear and organ-like. The action is prompt and reliable, enabling the performer to execute the most rapid music without obscuring the tones. The swell is arranged to give great expression.

The manufacturers received the First Premium, over all competitors, at the Fair of the Massachusetts Charitable Mechanic Association; also at the Metropolitan Mechanics' Fair, held at Washington, D. C.

For the Parlor, instruments are furnished at prices varying from $45 to $150.
Larger instruments, with two banks of keys, for chapels and small churches, from $150 to $300.

This last instrument, known as the ORGAN HARMONIUM, has been essentially improved by Messrs. Smith, and they have secured a patent therefor.

Persons who wish to hire Melodeons with a view of purchasing at the end of the year, can have the rents credited as part payment of the purchase money.

WORKS OF ART.

THE undersigned have associated themselves under the firm of CHANDLER & CLAPP, as DEALERS in WORKS OF ART, to which business they will give their exclusive attention. NEW AESTHETIC JOURNAL.

THE CRAYON,

A Weekly Paper devoted to ART, offers itself to the attention of all who are interested in the elevating and refining influences of Beauty. Among the contributors to THE CRAYON already are BRYANT, LOWELL, STREET, REMBRANDT PALE, A. B. DURAND, President of the National Academy of Design, DANIEL HUNTINGTON, HENRY K. BROWN, and amongst those engaged are LONGFELLOW, BAYARD TAYLOR, GEO. WM. CURTIS, Rev. H. W. BEECHER, Rev. SAMUEL OSOOD, Rev. H. W. BELLOW, Hon. CHARLES SUMNER, and others of our most eminent writers. A series of papers by RUSKIN, and essays left by the eminent sculptor, HORATIO GREENOUGH, add to the interest of The Crayon.

From the Cincinnati Gazette.

We have already strongly recommended THE CRAYON, and every succeeding number proves it to be more and more worthy of all we have said in its praise. No journal, devoted to Art, has ever been so ably conducted, in this country; and if it meets with the support it so richly deserves, we have no doubt that it will exert a most wholesome influence upon the taste of the country.

George Sand's Account of Chopin.

[Concluded from p. 185.]

We conclude the translation of what George Sand has said of Chopin in the last chapter of her interesting Memoirs, published in la Presse.

On their return from Majorca, George Sand hired apartments in the rue Pigale, composed of two pavilions at the bottom of a garden. "Chopin," says the celebrated writer, "installed himself in the rue Tronchet, but his lodging was damp and cold. He recommenced coughing seriously, and I saw myself compelled to resign my office of attendant on the sick, or else pass my life in impossible goings and comings. He, to spare me that, came every day to tell me, with a sorry figure and a smothered voice, that he was marvellously well. He invited himself to dine with us, and he went off in the evening shivering in his fiacré. Seeing how he was affected by the derangement of our domestic life, I offered to let him one of the pavilions, of which I could relinquish to him a part. He accepted it with joy. There he had his apartments, there he received his friends, and there he gave his lessons without annoying me. . . . I lived alternately at Nohant in the summer, and at Paris in the winter. . . . Chopin came to pass three or four months every year at Nohant. I prolonged my stay there pretty well into the winter, and then found at Paris my malade ordinaire, as he used to call himself, desiring my return, but not regretting the country, which he never loved longer than a fortnight and only endured beyond that time out of attachment to me. We had quitted the pavilions of the rue Pigale, which did not please him, to establish ourselves in the square d'Orleans, where the kind and active Marliani had arranged a family life for us. She occupied fine apartments between our two. We had nothing but a large yard, planted and gravelled, always neat, to cross, to bring us together, now at her rooms, now at mine, and now at Chopin's, when he was disposed to play to us. We dined all together with her at the common expense. It was a very nice association, economical like all associations, and permitted me to see society at Mme. Marliani's, my friends more intimately in my own rooms, and to retire to my work whenever I pleased. Chopin rejoiced in thus having a fine isolated saloon, where he could go to compose or dream. But he loved society and did not avail himself of his sanctuary, farther than to give some lessons there. It was only at Nohant that he created and wrote. . . .

"Of all the bitternesses which I had no longer to endure, but to combat, the sufferings of my malade ordinaire were not the least.

"Chopin always wanted Nohant and never could endure Nohant. He was a man of society par excellence, not of society too official and too numerous, but of intimate society, of salons of twenty persons, in the hour when the crowd goes off and when the habitués press around the artist to snatch from him by amiable importunities his purest inspiration. It was only then that he gave you all his genius and all his talent. It was then too that, after plunging his audience into a deep recollection or a mournful sadness, (for his music sometimes put atrocious discouragements into your soul, especially when he improvised,) all of a sudden, as if to remove the impression and the memory of his sorrow from himself and others, he would turn towards a glass, by stealth, arrange his hair and his cravat, and show himself suddenly transformed into a phlegmatic Englishman, into an impertinent old man, into a sentimental and ridiculous English lady, into a sordid Jew. They were always sad types, however comical they might be, but perfectly comprehended and so delicately rendered that one could not leave off admiring them.

"All these sublime, charming or bizarres things, which he knew how to draw from himself, made him the soul of select circles, and one literally tore oneself away from him, since his noble character, his disinterestedness, his pride, his clear self-respect, the enemy of all vanity of bad taste, of all insolent display, his social reliableness and the exquisite delicacies of his savoir-vivre made him a friend as serious as he was agreeable.

"To snatch Chopin away from so many indulgences, to connect him with a simple, uniform and studious life, who had been brought up on the knees of princesses, was to deprive him of what enabled him to live; of a factitious life, to be sure, for like a painted woman he laid down his verve and power when he went home in the evening, to give the night to feverishness and want of sleep; but of a life more short and animated than one more retired, within an intimacy restricted to the uniform circle of a single family. At Paris, he visited several circles every day, or at least he chose each evening from among them a different atmosphere to breathe in. He had thus by turns some twenty or thirty saloons to intoxicate or charm by his presence.

"Chopin was not born exclusive in his affections; he was so only in relation to those which he exacted. His soul, impressible to all beauty, to all grace, to every smile, surrendered itself with an unheard of facility and spontaneity. It is true that it soon recovered itself; an unlucky word, an equivocal smile disenchanted him even to excess. He was passionately in love with three women in the same evening party, and he went away all alone, not thinking of either of them, leaving them all three each convinced that she exclusively had charmed him.

"He was the same in friendship, enthusiastic at first sight, soon getting out of conceit with it, continually recovering himself, living upon fondnesses full of charms for those who were the objects of them, and of secret discontents which poisoned his dearest affections.

"An incident, which he related to me himself, proves how little he proportioned what he granted of his heart to what he exacted of the same from others.

"He was deeply smitten by the granddaughter of a celebrated master; he thought to demand her in marriage at the same time that he was pursuing the thought of another marriage of love in Poland, his loyalty not being engaged on either side, but his fickle soul fluctuating from one passion to the other. The young Parisienne received him well, and all went on in the best way, when one day as he entered her house with another musician more celebrated in Paris than he himself yet was, she saw fit to offer a chair to the latter before she thought of bidding Chopin to be seated. He never saw her again, and forthwith forgot her.

"It was not that his soul was impotent or cold. So far from that, it was ardent and devoted, only not exclusively and constantly towards this or that person. It gave itself up alternately to five or six affections which conflicted in him and of which each in turn overcame all the others.

"He surely was not made—this extreme type of the artist—to live a long time in this world. He was devoured here by the dream of an ideal which no toleration of philosophy or pity, as the world goes, could resist. He never liked to deal with human nature. He accepted nothing of reality; therein lay his vice and his virtue, his greatness and his misery. Implacable towards the least stain, he had an immense enthusiasm for the least light, his exalted imagination going all lengths to behold a sun there.

"It was therefore at once sweet and cruel to be the object of his preference, for he credited you with usury for the slightest clearness, and overwhelmed you with his disenchantment at the passing of the smallest shadow.

"Some have supposed that I have portrayed his character with great exactness of analysis in one of my romances. They have been deceived, because they have thought they recognized certain traits of his; and, proceeding by this system too convenient to be certain, LISZT himself, in a "Life of Chopin", a little exuberant in style, but filled nevertheless with very good things and with very beautiful pages, has erred in good faith.

"I have traced, in the Prince Karol, the character of a man determined in his nature, exclusive in his requirements.

"Such was not Chopin. Nature does not design like Art, however realistic it may be. She has caprices, inconsistencies, not real probably, but very mysterious. Art does not rectify these inconsistencies except because it is too limited to render them.

"Chopin was a résumé of those magnificent inconsistencies which God alone can permit himself to create and which have their peculiar logic. He was modest from principle and gentle by habit, but he was imperious by instinct and full of a legitimate pride, which was ignorant of itself. Hence sufferings, about which he could not reason, and which did not fix themselves upon a determinate object.

"Besides, Prince Karol is not an artist. He is a dreamer, and nothing more; having no genius, he has not the rights of genius. He is a personage more true than loveable, and this is so little the portrait of a great artist, that Chopin, in reading the manuscript every day upon my desk, would not have had the least wish to deceive himself there—he so suspicious too!

"And yet afterwards, by reaction, he did imagine himself meant, I have been told. Enemies (I had such before him, who called themselves his friends, as if to exasperate a suffering heart were not the same as murder) enemies made him believe that this romance was a revelation of his character. Undoubtedly at that moment his memory was weakened: he had forgotten the book; that he should not have re-read it!

"This history was so little ours! It was altogether the reverse. There never were between us either the same infatuations, or the same sufferings. Our history, between us, had nothing of a romance; its foundation was too simple and too serious for us ever to have had occasion for a quarrel with one another, or about one another. I accepted the whole life of Chopin just as it went on outside of my own. Having neither his tastes nor his ideas, outside of Art, nor his political principles, nor his appreciation of matters of fact, I undertook no modification of his being. I respected his individuality, as I respected that of Delacroix and my other friends engaged in a different path from mine.

"On another side, Chopin granted me, and I may say honored me with a kind of friendship, which formed an exception in his life. He was always the same for me. He had no doubt few illusions on my account, since he never made me redescend in his esteem. It was that probably which made our good harmony endure so long.

"A stranger to my studies, to my researches, and consequently, to my convictions, shut up as he was within the Catholic dogma, he said of me, like the mother Alicia in the last days of her life: Bah! bah! I am quite sure that she loves God!

"We never, then, addressed to each other a mutual reproach, except one single time, which was, alas! the first time and the last. An affection so elevated could only break, and could not accustom itself to combats unworthy of itself.

"But if Chopin was with me the personification of devotedness, of forethought, of graciousness, obligingness and deference, he had not, for all that, abjured the asperities of his character towards those that surrounded me. With them, the inequalities of his soul, by turns generous and fantastical, had full career, passing always from fondness to aversion, and reciprocally. Nothing appeared, nothing ever has appeared of his interior life, of which his chefs-d'œuvre were the mysterious and vague expression, but of which his lips never betrayed the suffering. At least such was his reserve for seven years, that I alone could divine them, soothe them and retard their explosion.

"Why did not a continuation of events external to us separate us from one another before the eighth year?

"My attachment could not have performed this miracle of rendering him a little calm and happy, without God had consented to it in preserving in him a little health. Meanwhile he was visibly declining, and I no longer knew what remedies to employ to combat the increasing irritation of his nerves. The death of his friend, Dr. Mathuzinski, and then that of his own father, were two terrible blows to him. The Catholic dogma throws atrocious terrors over death. Chopin, instead of dreaming of a better world for those poor souls, had only fearful visions, and I was obliged to pass many nights in a chamber next to his, always ready to get up a hundred times from my labor to chase away the spectres of his sleeping or waking dreams. The idea of his own death appeared to him escorted by all the superstitious imaginations of Slavonic poesy. A Pole, he lived under the nightmare of legends. Phantoms called to him, embraced him, and instead of seeing his father and his friend smile to him in the light of faith, he repulsed their fleshless faces from his own and wrestled from the grasp of their icy hands.

"He had acquired an antipathy for Nohant. His return, in spring, intoxicated him for a few moments. But as soon as he applied himself to work, everything grew sombre about him. His creations were spontaneous, miraculous. He found them without seeking them, without foreseeing them. They came upon his piano, sudden, complete, sublime; or they sang themselves in his head during a walk, and he hastened to make them audible to himself by throwing them upon the instrument. But then commenced the labor, the most painful at which I was ever present. It was a succession of efforts, irresolutions and impatiences to seize again certain details of the theme heard in his mind; what he had conceived as a whole all at once, he analyzed too much in wishing to write it down, and his regret at not recovering it precisely enough, as he thought, plunged him into a sort of despair. He shut himself up in his chamber for whole days, weeping, walking up and down, breaking his pens, repeating and changing a measure a hundred times, writing it and effacing it as often, and recommencing the next day with a minute and desperate perseverance. He spent six weeks upon one page, only to go back and write it just as he had sketched it at the first draught.

"For a long time I had influence enough with him to make him consent to trust himself to this first gush of inspiration. But when he was no longer disposed to believe me, he gently reproached me with having spoiled him, and with not being sufficiently severe for him. I endeavored to distract his mind, to get him out to ride. Sometimes taking out my whole brood in a country carriage, I snatched him from this agony in spite of himself, I led him to the banks of the Creuse, and in the course of two or three days, exposed to the sun and rain in frightful roads, we arrived, laughing and hungry, at some magnificent site, where he seemed to revive. He was beaten out with the fatigues of the first day, but he slept! The last day, he was all reanimated, rejuvenated upon returning to Nohant, and he found the solution of his labor without too much effort; but it was not always possible to determine him to quit that piano which was much oftener his torment than his joy, and by little and little he manifested ill humor when I disturbed him. I dared not insist. Chopin was terrible, and as he always contained himself with me, he seemed ready to suffocate and die.

"My life, always active and cheerful on the surface, had become internally more sad than ever. I despaired at not being able to give to others that happiness which I had renounced forever on my own account; for I had more than one subject of profound chagrin against which I strove to react. Chopin's friendship had never been a refuge to me in sadness. He had enough of his own calamities to support. Mine would have crushed him, so he knew them only vaguely and understood them not at all. He would have estimated all things from a very different point of view from mine.

"In consequence of the last relapses of the invalid, his spirits had become extremely sombre, and Maurice, who had loved him tenderly till that time, was suddenly wounded by him in an unexpected manner on a futile occasion. They embraced a moment after, but the grain of sand had fallen into the tranquil lake, and gradually the stones fell also one by one. Chopin was often irritated without any motives, and sometimes unjustly irritated against good intentions. I saw the evil growing aggravated and extending itself to my other children; rarely to Solange, whom Chopin preferred, for the reason that she alone had not spoiled him, but to Augustine with a frightful bitterness, and to Lambert even, who never could imagine why. Augustine, the most gentle, the most inoffensive of us all, decidedly, was frightened by him. He had at first been so good to her; but finally, one day, Maurice, tired of being pricked with pins, spoke of quitting the place. That could not and ought not to be. Chopin did not bear my legitimate and necessary intervention. He drooped his head and declared that I no longer loved him.

"What blasphemy after those eight years of maternal devotion! But the poor ruffled heart was not conscious of its delirium. I thought that some months passed in retirement and silence would cure the wound and render friendship calm and memory equitable. But the revolution of February arrived, and Paris became for the time being odious to a mind incapable of bending itself to any disturbance whatsoever in the social forms. Free to return into Poland, or certain to be tolerated there, he had preferred languishing ten years away from his family, whom he adored, to the pain of seeing his country transformed and demoralized.

"I saw him again for an instant in March 1848. I clasped his trembling and icy hand. I wanted to speak to him; he escaped. It was my turn to say that he no longer loved me. I spared him that suffering, and I committed all into the hands of Providence and of the future.

"I was not destined ever to see him again. There were bad hearts between us. There were also good ones, who knew not what to do. There were frivolous ones, who preferred not to meddle with delicate affairs. GUTMANN was not there.*

"I have been told that he had called for me, regretted me, loved me filially to the end. They had seen fit to conceal it from me until then. They had seen fit to conceal from him, too, that I was ready to run to him. They have done well, if the emotion of seeing me would have abridged his life a single day, or an hour only. I am not of those who believe that things settle themselves in this world. They only commence it perhaps, and certainly they do not finish it. This life here below is a veil which suffering and sickness render more thick to certain souls, which only lifts itself at moments for the most solid organizations, and which Death rends asunder for all."

"God save the King."

Several journals have lately asserted that the English national anthem, "God save the King," which, as is well known, passes generally as one of Händel's productions, was composed by the Frenchman, Lully. This assertion is, however, not so recent as our readers might imagine, for it is contained in the Mémoires of Mlle. de Créqui, with a string of commentaries and evidence, intended to prove its truth. The account of the matter, incidentally given in the course of a grand reception of Louis XIV. in the Chapel of St. Cyr, is as follows:—

"One of the most ineffaceable impressions was that produced by the voices of all the young maidens, who, when the King appeared in his tribune, struck up, in unison, a kind of motet, or rather national anthem and song of praise, the words by Mlle. de Brinon, and the music by the celebrated Lully. If you should feel any curiosity on the subject, there would be no difficulty in procuring the music for you, as a German, of the name of Händel, obtained possession of it on his journey to Paris, and dedicated it, for a certain sum, to King George of Hanover, and the English have openly adopted it as their national anthem."

This assertion that the English took their National Anthem from the French, found great favor with the latter, who regarded the matter as settled. A feuilletoniste of the Indépendance Belge has just demonstrated the improbability of such a supposition, if only from the fact that the character of the music of "God save the King" is completely different from that of Lully's compositions. The Belgian author goes on to say that this in no way justifies any claims of Händel upon the English National Anthem. The admirers of that great composer wanted to ascribe the music to him at all hazards, but the writer of the Indépendance says that it is quite certain George the First's composer never contemplated composing any such hymn, and that in his manuscripts, which have been preserved with the greatest reverence, there is not the slightest trace of it to be found. But all doubt as to the composer of the English National Anthem is dispelled by Mr. Richard Clark, who, in a special pamphlet, adduces irrefutable and authentic proofs. The composer was—we are not joking—John Bull. This person was a well-known composer in England. He was born in the year 1563, in the county of Somerset, and, having evinced a great disposition for the art at an early age, was received, while still very young, as a doctor of music at the University of Oxford. He was appointed by Queen Elizabeth, royal organist and professor at Gresham College. James I., Elizabeth's successor, appointed him his private organist. It is to this period that we must refer the composition of "God save the King," which John Bull composed in celebration of King James's wonderful escape from the famous Gunpowder Plot. It is a singular fact that John Bull subsequently left England for the purpose of seeking his fortune in foreign lands. Hitherto, it was never known what became of him. This gap, has, however, been now filled up by the feuilletoniste of the Belgian paper, who proves, from the archives of the Cathedral at Antwerp, that John Bull went to that city in 1617, was made organist to the Cathedral, and died at Antwerp in the year 1628.—Neue Berliner Musikzeitung.

Costa's Oratorio.

The great "event" of the Birmingham Festival has taken place, and judgment has been pronounced on Eli. As everybody anticipated, the success of Mr. Costa's new oratorio yesterday was almost unprecedented. I do not remember to have witnessed such a demonstration in favor of any individual connected with the artistic world since the Jenny Lind nights or Macready's last performances. The enthusiasm displayed in 1846, when Elijah was first produced here, was at least equalled, and Mr. Costa has been placed on a pedestal about half-an-inch higher than Mendelssohn, by the people of Birmingham, the committee of the Birmingham Festival, and the dignitaries of the Sacred Harmonic Society. Chacun à son goût. Mr. Costa has cause to be proud of his success, and I only hope it may not turn his brain. Something akin to the exhibition of yesterday occurred at the Olympic some years ago, when Mr. Brooke made his first appearance in London. The audience went frantic, and, with some exceptions, pronounced him the successor of Edmund Kean. To say the least, they had better have waited. It is ill to swallow one's own words. The public had to swallow theirs, nevertheless. Mr. Brooke is now, by universal assent, placed among third-rate actors. I do not compare Mr. Costa with Mr. Brooke—Heaven forbid! But surely the extravagant praises lavished upon Eli may, by a stretch of imagination, be compared to those formerly bestowed on Mr. Brooke. It is easier, however, to account for the favor shown to Mr. Costa, who has done a great deal for the Birmingham Festival by his talents and energy. An important work from his pen was, therefore, entitled to consideration, although attempting something out of his line, and although his antecedents counted for little. The Birmingham folk, however, detected indications of genius in Mr. Costa, or they would never have invited him to compose an oratorio—the most difficult of all tasks for a musician—and Mr. Costa must have agreed with the people of Birmingham, or he would not have accepted the invitation. That Mr. Costa applied himself heart and soul to his task I have not the least doubt, nor that he has done his best. And this is his chief praise. He has labored conscientiously, and given the world the result of his labor. What that may be is a distinct question.

But how to describe a demonstration which baffles description! Words might be found to afford some idea of the reception accorded to Mr. Costa on his entrance into the orchestra; but, for the end, the tongue can find no language. How vociferous were the cheers, and how long they endured, must be left to the reader's imagination. No wonder Mr. Costa was overpowered by emotion—he must else have been made of granite. The excitement would have disturbed the equanimity of one of even sterner mould. When all was finished, four ladies of the chorus were deputed to demand from Mr. Costa the gloves he wore in conducting Eli, as a memento. The gloves were granted, the ladies in question cut them in pieces, and divided them among their companions to be worn as insignia during the rest of the Festival.

Of the performance it is easy to speak. The band, chorus, and principals, were perfect, from first to last. The execution of Eli was almost as wonderful as that of Elijah the preceding day, and everything was done that could be done to place it in a favorable light. Never were greater zeal and energy displayed; one feeling only seemed to actuate the mass—that of doing the utmost to achieve a triumphant success.

I cannot speak with confidence of the music, after the unqualified encomiums I have listened to. The merits of Eli, nevertheless, are not so universally acknowledged as I was led to imagine. There are many who dissent from the general opinion of the crowd. While some laud the new oratorio to the skies, there are others who criticize it severely, and these are chiefly among musicians. My own impression, after two hearings, to both of which I paid particular attention, is: that Mr. Costa has written an exceedingly clever work; that he has proved himself thoroughly acquainted with the resources of his art; that he has command over the orchestra and writes admirably for voices; that his music is to the purpose; and that he has great fluency. Something more than this, however, is required to produce a masterpiece (as Eli has been denominated), and this the composer does not possess. He displays neither imagination nor originality; he is wanting in elevation of style; even when he soars, he cannot sustain himself; and that harmony of purpose, which spreads such a halo round the compositions of the great masters, is not to be found in the new oratorio. But what surprised me most was the absence of melody, new or old. The phrases are rhythmical and flowing, but I did not catch one original thought. This is singular for an Italian—the author, too, of Don Carlos and Malek Adel. Did Mr. Costa deem it requisite to abandon tune in the sacred oratorio? If so, he thought very differently from Händel and Mendelssohn, whose sacred works abound in "absolute melody."

Mr. Costa, however, had much to contend with in the composition of Eli. The libretto—if I may so call the book of an oratorio—is bad. The story—a digest of which has already appeared in the Musical World—is disjointed; and the incidents, few and far between, are by no means favorable to musical illustration. The composer was therefore compelled to give a fragmentary shape to his music and to break the interest into pieces. There are two situations, however, which offer great scope to the musician, and of these Mr. Costa has availed himself melodramatically. The first is when Eli overhears his two sons, Hophni and Phinehas, riotously singing with the women assembled at the door of the tabernacle; the second is where "Saph"—a valiant warrior of Gath—summons the Philistines to battle. Mr. Costa has illustrated both of these with effect, although, as I have said, melodramatically. The employment of the tabret—a sort of Indian drum or banjo played with a stick—is questionable, at least in sacred music. The second situation, the call to battle, is represented with similar contempt of "severity." The singing, however, of Mr. Sims Reeves and the chorus induced the audience to overthrow the barriers of etiquette, and take from the hands of the president the assumed right of encoring. With these exceptions the situations are unsuggestive and the composer, it must be owned, has had up-hill work.

For many reasons I have refrained from entering into an analysis of the music. No doubt a future opportunity will be found for an elaborate consideration of its merits. It remains, therefore, to speak of the performance, or rather of the effect produced, since I have already stated that the execution was perfect.

The overture and introduction passed off quietly. The first encore was awarded to the chorus, "The Lord is God," a round, with a simple theme, accompanied by three harps in the orchestra. The singing of the chorus, more especially of the females, was inimitable. The chorus of the ungodly revellers, "For everything there is a season," was as fine a performance in another way, and the music is far more interesting and difficult, but the President allowed it to pass unnoticed. The solo and chorus, "Philistines, hark, the trumpet sounding," carried everything before it, and the audience could not suppress their emotions. Mr. Sims Reeves gave the solos with electrical effect, and the chorus answered in a voice of thunder. The applause was renewed at the end of the repeat, and Lord Willoughby de Broke consented. I forgot to mention the air for soprano voice, "Turn thee unto me," immediately following the introduction, a graceful and flowing melody, admirably sung by Madame Castellan. This really deserved an encore, but the President made no sign. Mlle. Castellan was encored in the second air, "I will extol thee," written something after the manner of Händel. At the end of the first part, the fugued chorus, "Hosanna in the Highest," was received with uproarious applause. There are three fugues, or attempts at fugues, in the first part—the overture, the chorus, "Blessed be the Lord," and the final chorus.

The second part opens with a morning prayer for Samuel, "Lord, from my bed again I rise," one of the most attractive tunes in the oratorio, written with skill for the contralto voice, and exquisitely sung by Madame Viardot. This created a genuine impression; Lord de Broke gave the signal for repetition, and it was repeated with increased effect. The trio, "Thou shalt love the Lord," sung by Mesdames Castellan, Viardot, and Mr. Sims Reeves, was applauded by part of the audience, but suppressed—the President remaining quiescent—silence, contrary to the adage, giving no consent. The trio—a sort of round, with a harp accompaniment—was sung to perfection. Still better, if possible, was the unaccompanied quartet, "We bless you in the name of the Lord," by Mesdames Castellan and Viardot, Mr. Sims Reeves and Herr Formes, the performance of which was irresistible and an encore inevitable. The orchestral march of the Israelites, which follows, sounds better when it is given subsequently to the chorus. The tune is very primitive. The chorus, "Hold not thy peace," is one of the best pieces. It was a prodigious performance. The air, "This night I lift my heart to thee"—calm and expressive, but not very original—was entitled to notice on account of Madame Viardot's singing, than which nothing could be more artistic and finished. The dropping of the voice as Samuel falls asleep was worthy of the greatest of singers. The chorus "No evil shall befall thee," with triple harp accompaniment, was redemanded, chiefly on account of execution. The pianissimos and crescendos were managed with wonderful effect. The remainder of the oratorio was listened to in silence, but the execution was no less extraordinary than what had gone before.

I have scarcely spoken in terms of sufficient praise of the principal singers. I have mentioned Madame Viardot, Mr. Sims Reeves, and Madame Castellan. Herr Formes, however, has a most difficult and ungrateful part in Eli. His music is of the same sombre and grave character throughout, and presents very few opportunities for effect. The declamatory powers of the German basso, however, had frequent occasions for display, and of these he made the best use. The recitatives were finely given, and the words of the prophet received double force from his earnest and impressive delivery. Herr Reichardt had little to do, but that little he did well, as usual. He is always pains-taking, and always equal to what he undertakes.

The oratorio of Eli finishes with a fugued chorus, "Blessed be the Lord God of Israel," during the performance of which, yesterday, the audience remained standing.

The Elder Garcia.

MANUEL DEL POPULO VINCENTE GARCIA was born at Seville, the 21st of January, 1775. At six years old he was received into the choir of the cathedral, and commenced his musical studies under the instruction of Don Antonio Bipa and Juan Almarcha. At this time there was no theatre in Seville, and sacred music was in high estimation; the vocal corps belonging to the cathedral was not only strong in number, but contained, also, some distinguished performers, particularly a tenor and a male soprano. Garcia, having a very agreeable voice and extraordinary talents for music, was soon distinguished among his compeers, and by the time he was seventeen, his fame not only as a singer, but also as a composer and chef d'orchestre, had spread far beyond the limits of his native city. The manager of the Cadiz Theatre engaged him, and brought him forward in a toccadilla, in which the young debutant sang several pieces of his own composition. Here he obtained considerable reputation as a singer. His voice—a fine tenor—very flexible, and very extensive, particularly in the upper part, was much admired; but his action was so embarrassed and cold, that the most discerning spectator could never have detected in the awkward youth before him even the germ of that dramatic talent which afterwards classed him so high among acting singers. From Cadiz, Garcia proceeded to Madrid, where, arriving during Lent, he appeared in an oratorio, the only species of music allowed to be performed in that season in Spain. His residence in Madrid was of considerable duration; and he there composed several toccadillas.

When Garcia at length quitted Madrid, he proceeded to Malaga, in which city he composed his first opera, entitled El Preso, the libretto of which was borrowed from a French piece called "The Prisoner, or the Likeness." While he was at Malaga an epidemic fever raged there with such virulence as nearly to depopulate whole districts, but Garcia was fortunate enough to escape its ravages and get back safe to Madrid. On his return to the capital, he brought into fashion a species of operettas, in one or two acts, similar to those which were then in vogue in France; the plots, indeed, were chiefly taken from French pieces. These operas made the rounds of the Spanish theatres, and were almost all received with great applause. Garcia is one of the few Spanish composers who have written in the style of the national music of the country, which, as is well known, possesses a character entirely distinct from that of either Italy, Germany, or France. Several of his airs became highly popular; one in particular called Lo Cavallo, sung by him in the character of a smuggler, is as well known throughout Spain as Charmante Gabrielle in France, or God save the King in England. Some persons have denied Garcia's claim to be considered the composer of this most original melody; it is true the names of those who write popular airs are quickly forgotten, but in this case the fact is of easy proof, for there are many amateurs still living in Madrid who well remember the effect made by the air Yo che soy contrabandista, when Garcia sang it for the first time not thirty years ago.

On the 11th of February, 1808, Garcia made his appearance in Paris, selecting for his debut the Griselda of Paer, being the first time he had ever performed in an Italian opera. A journalist, whose criticisms carried much weight with them at that time, says of him—"Don Garcia is a young artist of distinguished talent; his countenance is agreeable and expressive—his delivery correct—his action natural and animated; his voice is sweet-toned, graceful, of very extensive compass and extreme flexibility. It is evident that he is a man of great ability and experience in his art; his singing is rich in ornament, but frequently too much embroidered." In point of fact, however, Garcia owed all his talents as a singer to himself alone; he had never really studied it as an Art, but he had merely listened, imitated, and practised. On the 15th March, 1809, he gave for his benefit a Spanish monologue operetta, called El Poeta Calculista, (the first and only Spanish opera that has ever been performed in Paris,) with such decided success, that it was repeated several times running, until the excessive fatigue of supporting alone a piece in which four compositions out of the seven comprised, were constantly encored, obliged him to suspend the representations.

Garcia continued in Paris until the commencement of 1811, when he went to Italy, and appeared successively on the theatres of Turin, Naples, and Rome. He was elected an academician of the Philharmonic Society at Bologna, and appointed by Murat principal tenor of his chamber and chapel. It was at this period that he became acquainted with Anzani, one of the most celebrated tenors in Italy, from whose instructions and example he acquired those secrets in the art of singing which were long monopolized by the old Italian masters for their own profit, or that of a few privileged scholars. In 1812, he brought out with great success at the St. Carlo an opera in two acts, imitated from the French, Il Califo di Bagdad. In 1816 Rossini wrote for him the parts of Almaviva in the Barber of Seville and of Otello. The air with variations now sung as a finale to the Cenerentola, was composed originally for Garcia in Almaviva, and placed at the end of the second act of Il Barbiere, but only sung by him at Rome. In the autumn of the same year he returned to Paris, being engaged by Madame Catalani, at that time directress of the Théâtre Italique, and made his debut on the 17th October in Il Matrimonio Segreto. He afterwards performed in his own opera, Il Califo di Bagdad, in Griselda, Così fan tutte, Le Nozze di Figaro, Portogallo's Semiramide, and several others, with equal distinction as an actor and a singer. By selecting Mad. Cinti to represent the principal female character in the Calif he gave that charming singer, who had hitherto been confined to secondary parts, the first opportunity of displaying her talents in a favorable light. The piece, the actor, and the actress, enjoyed a moment of popularity, when all at once Garcia and his Calif disappeared. It was whispered that his chief offence was having called down as much applause in Semiramide, as the Queen of Babylon herself, and so reducing that august princess to the necessity of playing, for several days, the character of La finta Ammalata (the pretended patient). However this may be, Garcia, tired and ashamed of eternally haggling for sixpences, left Paris and went to London, where he made his debut on the 10th March, 1818, in the favorite part of Almaviva, and remained until the end of the ensuing season, 1819, when he returned to Paris.

It is to Garcia that the Parisian audiences owe their first acquaintance with the music of Rossini; and if the public knew the green-room intrigues had been resorted to, and all the obstacles Garcia had to encounter before he succeeded in having that great composer's operas performed, its sense of obligation for the eminent services he at length succeeded in rendering them would not be small. In 1817 he had played Lindoro in the Italiana in Algeri, the first opera of Rossini's ever performed in Paris; but when he wished to bring out the Barber of Seville for his own benefit, the opera was judged unworthy of the capital of France, and the singer forced to select another piece. Better instructed this time, he made the bringing out of Il Barbiere the sine qua non of his engagement, and thus to his perseverance Paris owes the hearing of this masterpiece of the comic opera within three years of its being composed.

The period between the autumn of 1819 and the beginning of 1824, which Garcia spent in Paris, formed the most brilliant portion of his musical career. As an actor and singer he enjoyed the highest popularity, especially in the parts of Almaviva, Otello, and Don Juan. As a composer, he wrote La Mort du Tasse and Florestan for the French opera; Il Fazzolletto for the Théatre Italien and for the Gymnasium La Meunière; finally, as a professor of singing, he numbered among his pupils Adolphe Nourrit, the Countess Merlin, Mad. Favelli, and Mad. Méric Lalande. About this time he was also appointed first tenor of the chamber and chapel to the king. In 1824, Garcia was again engaged for the London opera, and returned to England. It was in London that Garcia completed the education of his gifted daughter, the present Mad. Malibran. In London he also opened an academy for singing. In the autumn of 1825, the Garcias left London; made a tour of the midland and northern parts of England; sang at some concerts and music-meetings at Manchester, Derby, and York, and finally embarked at Liverpool, on an excursion to the western continent.

To recount the whole of Garcia's adventures in the New World; to lay before the reader the state of music in New York and Mexico at the moment he arrived in those cities; to paint all the difficulties he had to surmount, or speculate on the effect his residence amongst them had upon a population to whom the arts were quite new, would require too much space; a few of the principal events in his active and brilliant career is all we can afford room for. The company with which he crossed the Atlantic consisted of himself and the younger Crivelli, tenors; his son Manuel Garcia, and Angrisani bassi cantanti; Rosich, buffo caricato; with Mad. Barbieri, Mad. Garcia, and her daughter Marietta, soprani. Il Barbiere, the opera which they chose as their introduction to an American audience, was almost entirely performed by the family party; Garcia playing Almaviva, his daughter Rosina, his son Figaro, and his wife Berta. In the course of the season they successively brought forward Otello, Romeo, Il Turco in Italia, Don Giovanni, Tancredi, La Cenerentola, and two operas of Garcia's composition, L'Amante Astuto, and La Figlia dell' Aria,—the latter written expressly for his daughter and Angrisani.

The air of New York did not agree with an Andalusian constitution, and Garcia removed, in search of a more congenial climate, from the United States to Mexico. Instead of finding in the capital of New Spain the repose which he had promised himself, he was soon compelled to sing and compose more than ever. Three Italian operas had been got up with the original words; but the Mexicans, though they had taste enough to relish the music, were not satisfied with performances of which they did not understand a single syllable. Garcia had no resource but to compose Spanish operas, or adapt Spanish words to the Italian; he did both. Amongst the operas written by him for the Mexican theatre, Semiramide and Abu-farez may be particularly mentioned; and he adapted Spanish words to his own Amante Astuto, which was performed several nights running. The Mexican company, half native and half foreign, was nothing remarkable before Garcia arrived amongst them; he soon found that the duties of composer, director, chief of the orchestra, singing-master, chorus leader, and even machinist and decorator, must all centre in himself. His indefatigable activity was rewarded with such success, that he often said, 'I would exhibit my Mexican performers now before a Parisian audience, and they would not be unworthy the honor.'

Notwithstanding the favorable reception he had met with in Mexico, Garcia could not avoid being uneasy at the daily increasing symptoms of animosity between the natives and the Spaniards. Foreseeing a speedy rupture between them, he resolved to return to Europe; he had great difficulty in obtaining passports, but at length succeeded, and set off for Vera Cruz, provided with a guard of soldiers, which, however, proved too weak, or too faithless, to protect him and his goods. At a place called Tepeyagualco, his convoy was attacked by brigands, and himself obliged to lie flat on his face, while his baggage was plundered of 1000 ounces of gold—the savings of his industry and economy. He came off with his life, however, and succeeded in getting once more to Paris, where he determined to dedicate the rest of his days to teaching. He appeared again at the Théâtre Italien, but declined very advantageous offers of an engagement at the Scala, and applied himself with new ardor to the instruction of his pupils.* The last, whose education he completed were Madame Raimbeaux, Mademoiselle Edwige, and Madame Rutz Garcia. Garcia died on the 9th of June, 1832, after a short illness, which was not at first considered at all dangerous.

To the last moment of his life Garcia was incessantly occupied with the Art to which the whole of that life had been dedicated, enjoying a wonderful facility and an activity of mind not less astonishing. He has left behind him an immense number of manuscripts. Besides the operas already mentioned in the course of this narrative, he was the author of numerous others, most of which have not been brought out.

Musical Correspondence.

NEW YORK, Sept. 25.—Our opera is about to commence again and it is time for me to resume my correspondence.

Before I speak of Music proper, let me say a word as to the great artistic treat we New Yorkers are enjoying in the presence of RACHEL. Though I had heard her abroad, her performance here has most agreeably disappointed my recollections. And every time one sees her, the more her splendid acting is enjoyed. I am in great hopes that her visit will have a good effect upon the American stage, and I am glad to see so many of our rising actors among the audience. Last night was the first of the low prices, and it fully answered expectations, the house being very well filled. To-night the great actress reads selections from several plays, at the Tabernacle. I wish we could have a chance of seeing her in Ponsard's charming little comedy of Horace et Lydie, one of the most delightful of her parts. You Bostonians will have her with you before long.

The Academy commences on Monday under the liberal and enterprising management of Mr. PAYNE, who, besides re-engaging LAGRANGE, HENSELER, BRIGNOLI, MORELLI and AMODIO, has secured the following new artists, concerning whom I quote the Daily Times:

1. The celebrated soprano CASTELLAN, from the London Covent Garden, for whom MEYERBEER wrote the part of Bertha in the "Prophet". This lady, it will be remembered, began her career some ten years since, in Mexico, when a girl of only 19. She afterwards passed through the United States, and made a powerful sensation as a concert singer. She arrived in London in 1846, and rapidly rose to the high position she at present enjoys in Europe.

2. Signorina ALDINI—a young, pretty and fresh contralto, 22 years of age—une blonde piquante, with a sympathetic voice and good method. She will appear in the "Trovatore" as Azucena, to LAGRANGE's Leonora.

3. SALVIANI—one of the most promising of tenors, 32 years of age. Voice powerful, with true "tenor" ring. Said to be a first rate musician—possessing a remarkable flexibility for Rossinian music, although his forte is the Meyerbeerian dramatic style. He sang in the "Prophet" last season in Florence, and, after ROGER and TAMBERLIK, is considered the best representative of this rôle.

4. CASPANI—a young basso, with an extraordinary voice. Said to be in every respect superior to SUSINI.

The season is to comprise forty nights, and I have no doubt that Mr. Payne will make it the most brilliant and successful one we have yet had. In my next I will give you an account of the opening performance.

The Philharmonic rehearsals do not commence till the end of October, those of the first concert (and I hope the rest) to be under Mr. BERGMANN's direction.

BRISTOW's "Rip Van Winkle" is finally to be given at Niblo's next Thursday. It has been long enough in preparation to be well brought out.

* The fact is, that his voice, which had for years past been much impaired, had now almost entirely deserted him.

Buckley's troupe have re-opened in their newly-decorated house, with a new prima donna, Miss MILLEN. I see by the Review that there is a musician in Baltimore named Signor Allbites. Rather suggestive.

When my friend, 'Mister Brown', returns to Gotham, I will take him to see the Düsseldorf Gallery, which he once told me he had seen only either once or not at all, I forget which. To talk of its being the refuse of other collections, while it contains many pictures painted at Mr. Boker's order, for which he was afterwards offered double the purchase money, copies of which hang in the Berlin royal palace and engravings in every other house in Germany; and then to praise Mr. BRYAN's collection of "old masters" as so very fine! O, Mister Brown, do not do that! The New York Gallery is the largest and finest of paintings of the Düsseldorf school in the world. Consul Wagner (in Berlin) has a larger collection, but it is not limited to that school, comprising many of the Dresden, Munich and others, concerning which Mister B. seems to be ignorant. But when Mister B. returns, (which I hope may be soon, I want to see "that hat") I will try to convince him. R.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, SEPT. 29, 1855.

NEW VOLUME.—With our next number (for Oct. 6,) will commence the EIGHTH half-yearly VOLUME of our Journal of Music. The opening at the same time of the Musical Season of 1855-6 makes it a good time for new subscribers to commence. We trust our friends who have kept us company so far, will use a little effort to increase the company, and send us in the names of not a few new readers.

Public Amusements.

Our Boston Music Hall during the two past weeks (we will not look back any further!) has presented two most charming and in every way refining, edifying spectacles, of a nature properly kindred to and in some degree partaking of the Art which built it, as Amphion's lyre built Thebes. The first was the exhibition of the Horticultural Society, which for four days and evenings filled the entire floor and stage of that vast edifice with Flora's and Pomona's delicately distributed harmonies of sight and smell and taste; happy, gentle crowds the while circulating through all the aisles and corridors, or hanging with silent rapture over the scene from the balconies above, while bands of music aided to complete the illusion. This was truly and in many senses an æsthetic use to put that noble hall to; such scenes and festivities tend directly to refine and harmonize and humanize the tastes and sensibilities and manners of the people. The place was admirably fitted for the purpose, and the scene was one of the most beautiful we ever looked upon. In many respects Nature would have looked better for a little more artistic arrangement. But the mere assemblage of so many elements of beauty produced, like the kaleidoscope, an artistic whole, and showed at least how much more may be, doubtless will be, done. In the world of Art, we are always exposed to the demoralizing influence of a great deal of false Art. Nature's fruits are always æsthetic, always beautiful; Nature is always true, in harmony with and suggestive of true Art. Therefore let us invite Flora, Ceres and Pomona, at the season when they have "all their blushing honors thick upon them", into our chief temple and hall of Art, that they may do their part also, with the Muses, in the æsthetic education of the people, in teaching us, rude, anxious, hurrying, feverish utilitarians that we are, "the beauty of holiness."

But fascinating as that fairy scene is in our memory, we were still more delighted and encouraged by what we witnessed in the same place last Wednesday evening. Taking advantage of the removal of the seats from the floor of the Music Hall, the Rev. Mr. BARNARD, (that indefatigable and wise friend of youth, who believes so much and does so much in shutting out the foes of purity by preoccupying the young, ardent social nature with innocent and graceful recreations,) conceived the happy idea of engaging it for a Promenade Concert and Dance for the children and friends of the Warren Street Chapel, an institution which is certainly a blessing to our city. At the low price of twenty-five cents, and for children half price in the afternoon, the hall was thrown open to the public afternoon and evening. The younger children took their turn mainly in the afternoon; yet many of them, under the guardianship of their parents, mingled in the evening in the quadrilles, waltzes, contradances, &c. of the children of "a larger growth." The Germania Serenade Band discussed sweet and enlivening music, now as a brass band, and now with violins and reeds, from a pretty little arbor surmounted by an evergreen pagoda on the stage. The fronts of the balconies were also hung with evergreen. Besides the glow-worm belt of lights around the cornice, new gas burners had been placed under the galleries, and the white reflecting surface of the naked floor, made the place magically light and beautiful. The hall looked larger and more glorious than ever. Certainly the whole country contains no ball-room to compare with it in size and splendor, as well as chaste artistic symmetry.

There must have been by the middle of the evening not far from two thousand happy people, of all ages, assembled in that hall. The balconies were full of pleased spectators of the gay and moving scene below. The whole broad area was covered by parties of dancers, moving simultaneously to the bright music. It was like the particles of sand thrown into symmetrical and shifting figures on a musically vibrating surface. Whatever awkwardness or clumsiness there might have been in individual sets, became graceful in the general effect of so wide-spread a mass set in motion by one rhythmical and cheerful impulse. It was an atmosphere of purity and simple, cordial courtesy. Bad elements sought not to enter the charmed circle. There were simple refreshment tables spread in the corridors, and there was every thing to render happy, without dangerous exposure.

The musical selections were of course light and popular, as for such a scene they should be. Here the object was not Art, but entertainment, with artistic aid. Mightily were the little folks delighted, and vigorously did they clap their hands, after the "Anvil Chorus" and the "Rail-road Galop." The din of "real anvils", it must be confessed, was somewhat stunning, but it pleased the boys. All this is well enough in its place, and it is pretty sure to find its place and occupy unto the utmost limit of the same. Yet there be those (a new crop of such verdure, saucy weeds, springs up here every year) who raise a senseless clamor in the newspapers if any seek to make a place for something higher also!

who would drown the first faint peep of "classical music" with their anvils, and forasmuch as "Poor Pillecuddy" is a pleasant thing, would put us down with Pillecuddy is a finer thing than Shakespeare! The real issue with these people is not, whether we shall have this or that kind of music, but it is whether we shall have Music, or whether we shall have Fun. Why not each in its own season? And if Beethoven is out of place in a gypsy blacksmith's pic-nic, are not the anvils still more out of place where people go to hear Beethoven's symphonies? But this is a digression. Our good friend, Mr. Barnard, and his coadjutors, have of course no sympathy with this puerile nonsense; they advocate popular, promenade concerts, simply, for the good they do, and not controversially, as versus classical Art and the keeping open of deeper fountains for all who may have the thirst to drink thereof.

We trust the Music Hall directors and the public will not be slow to profit by the hint afforded by the entire success of Wednesday. Such entertainments should become frequent. A half day's work at any time will remove the seats from the Music Hall, and thus is opened a new, legitimate, and graceful source of income to the Hall, entirely worthy of its character as one of the ministers to general æsthetic culture, and making it, we trust, never again necessary to extend its hospitality to "Baby Shows" and such Barnumbian abominations, in order to preserve the Hall for those higher uses for which it was originally built, and which by themselves alone cannot yet pay the cost of such luxurious accommodation. To the public, on the other hand, as a mode of innocent recreation, and a means of indirect social culture, such cheap and beautiful festivities, surrounded by such wholesome influences, may be productive of untold benefit, while they will give mere Amusement its own place, wherein it may disport itself to heart's content, without treading surlily and rudely upon the toes of those who would enjoy undisturbed an equally legitimate and useful sphere of "classical" high Art. Success to Mr. Barnard, and to cheap promenade, dance concerts in the most beautiful and noble hall in Boston, or the whole United States!

Musical Chit-Chat.

Of the proposed Orchestral Concerts we can only say that one great obstacle—commonly the greatest obstacle to all such enterprises—has been happily removed, and we trust that we shall soon be able to announce a completed and acceptable arrangement.

The MENDELSSOHN QUINTETTE CLUB announce themselves again ready to engage for series of private Classical Soirées, such as they gave so satisfactorily and with such good effect on musical taste in cultivated home circles last winter in Cambridge, New Bedford, and other of the larger towns. The Club are now absent on a fortnight's concert tour in Maine, accompanied by Mrs. WENTWORTH, in which they will visit Bangor, Belfast, Rockland, Bath, Augusta, Waterville, &c. On their return we may expect their programme for the winter season of delightful Chamber Concerts in Messrs. Chickering's saloon.

Meanwhile Music for the past week in Boston has only shown itself as an auxiliary to the sweet-smelling fruits and flowers, and to the festivities of children, whereof we have taken editorial notice in another column. We would here furthermore throw out the hint, whether the City itself would not discharge its parental duty more effectually by investing in such innocent and graceful amusements of its children a portion of the patriotic fund that annually spits itself away in fire-crackers. We see by the report of expenditures for the past year, that Boston has expended $850 for two months (perhaps $1,000 for the whole season) of music in the evenings on the Common. But the bill for the celebration of the Fourth of July, with its senseless noise and pomp, amounted to $10,000. Four thousand taken out of that would not be missed,—or missed only for the better—while, in place of fire-works blazed away in half an hour, it would maintain a large Civic Band of Music, comprising reeds as well as brass, sufficient to be heard well in the open air, and supply public promenade concerts every pleasant night in the whole summer. Which were the best economy of popular enjoyments at the public expense?
